TO THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD MY LORD ARCH-

TROPOLITANE OF ALL ENGLAND, AND ONE OF her Maiesties most honorable priuie Councell,

JOHN STOVV wisheth increase as well of

THIS NOW NIGH FORTY yeeres (Right reuerend Father) since I first addressed al my cares and cogitations to the studie of Histories and search of Antiquities; the greatest part of which time I haue diligently imploied in collecting such matters of this kingdome, as I thought most woorthie to be recommended both to the present and succeeding age. These laborious collections in so long a time haue now at length grown into a large volume, which I was willing to haue committed to the presse, had not the Printer, for some priuate respects, been more desirous to publish Annales at this present. Wherein I haue condescended to him to publish these, which I submit to your gracious and graue consideration, and to the censure of the courteous Reader and learned Antiquaries: relying wholly vpon this comfort, that the truth and credit of my Authors is in no point injured, how simple and naked soeuer the stile may be iudged. Neither doe I doubt but they may haue free passage in the world, if they be countenanced vnder your honorable name and protection. Vnto whom I offer, and with al dutifull affection I dedicate both my selfe and them: being hereunto induced, both for that your woorthy predeceffor, and my especiall benefactor Archbilhop PARKER animated me in the course of these studies, which otherwise I had long since discontinued; and also that your great loue and entire affection to all good letters in generall, and to the Antiquities in particular hath beene so singular, that all which like and loue good studies, doe iustly esteeme you their principall and gracious patrone.

Thushoping of your fauourable acceptance of this, as but part of that which I intended in a more large volume, I humbly take my leaue.

London this 24. of Nouember 1600.

To the gentle Reader.

Amongst other Bookes which are in this our learned age published in great numbers, there are few, either for the honestie of the matter, or commoditie which they bring to the Common wealth, or for the pleasantnes of the study & reading, to be preferred before the Chronicles and Histories. What examples of men deseruing immortallitie, of exploits woorthy great renoune, of vertuous lining of the posteritie to be imbraced, of wise handling of weightie affaires, diligently to be marked and aptly to be applied: what encouragement of Nobilitie to noble states, what discouragement of vnnaturall subjects from wicked treasons, pernicious rebellions, and damnable doctrines: to conclude, what perswasion to honestie, godlines and vertue of all sorts, what dissuasion from the contrarie is not plentifully in them to bee found? So that it is as hard a matter for the Readers of Chronicles, in my fantasie, to passe without some colours of wisdom, inuitements to vertue, and loathing of naughty fautes, as it is for a well fauoured man to walke up and downe in the hote parching sunne, and not to be therewith sun-burned. They therefore which with long studie, earnest goodwill, and to their great costs and charges haue brought hidden Histories from duskie darknesse to the sight of the world, and haue beene diligent obseruers of Commonwealths, and noted for the posteritie the fleeting manners of the people, and accidents of the times: deserue (at the least) thanks for their paines, and to be misrepord of none, seeing they haue laboured for all. I write not this to complaine of some mens ingratitude towards me (although iustly I might) but to shew the commodities which ensue of the reading of Histories, that seeing they are so great and so many, all men would (as they ought) employ their diligence in the honest, fruitfull, and delectable perusing of the same, and so to account of the Authors, as of men carefull for their Countrie: and to confesse, if neede require, by whome they haue taken profite.

It is now nigh forty yeeres since (I seeing the confuse order of our late English Chronicles, and the ignorant handling of ancient affaires) leauing mine owne peculiar gaines, consecrated my selfe to the search of our famous Antiquities. What I haue done in them before time, the former editions of my Summarie, and other my Chronicles, as also of other mens, wherein I haue bestowed no small labours, may well testifie, but how farre (be it spoken without arrogancie) I haue laboured for the truth more than some other, this last edition (an abstrail of a farre larger worke which I haue gathered, and meant to haue published, will evidently declare. Wherein, that I differ from the inordinate and vnstifull collections of other men, it is no maruell, seeing that I do not fully agree with my selfe, as some malicious persons haue fondly

Note that the vngenerall booke but slayeth three at once, himselfe by his owne malice, him that errecteth his false tales, and him that he backbiteth.

The Preface to the Reader.

fondly charged me: but let it be considered, that there is nothing perfect at the first, and that it is incident to mankind to erre and slippe some times, but onely the point of fantastickall fooles to perseuer and continue in their errors. Wherefore, seeing that the perusing of ancient Records and best approved Histories of all times (not without great difficultie obtained) doe not onely mone me, but for their authority drive me to acknowledge both mine and other mens errors, and in acknowledging to correct them, I trust to obtaine thus much at your hands, that at the lesse if you will call to remembrance a most gentle and wise lawe of the politike Persons, wherein it was enacted, that a man accused to be in their lawes a trespasser, and found guilty of the crime, should not straightway be condemned, but after a diligent inquirie and search of his whole life and conversation (no slander imputed unto him as of importance) if the number of his laudable facts did counterwaile the contrarie, he was full quit of the trespassse. The same law doe I wish the Readers of these my Chronicles to put in minde, that if the errors be not so plentifull, as Histories truly alleaged, they will beare with them: for as I promised, so haue I tried all matters worthy of immortallitie, by the certaine touchstone of best allowed Historiographers: and yet notwithstanding, some faults by misprinting haue escaped the correction, which easily may be seene and amended by the diligent Reader.

A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, WALES, AND CORNWALL.

BRITAIN, or Bruttanne which by two names is called England and Scotland, is an Island in the Ocean Sea, situate right over against France: one part of which the Englishmen do inhabit, another part Scots, the third part Welshmen, and the fourth part Cornishmen. All the either in language, conditions, or lawes, doe differ among themselves.

England (so called of Englishmen, which did winne the same) is the greatest part, and is divided into xl. Counties, which wee call Shires: thereof tenne (that is to say) Kent,

fourte Counties of Shires,

Sussex, Surrey, Southampton, Berkshire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Devonshire and Cornwall, doe containe the first part of that Island: which part bounding toward the South, standeth betwene the Thames and the Sea.

From thence to the river of Trent, which passeth through the middell of England be sixtene shires, whereof the first five (standing Eastward) are Essex, Middlesex, Hertfordshire, Suffolke, and Norfolk, and Cambridge shire: the other ten which stand more in the middle of the Countrey are these: Bedford, Huntingdon, Buckingham, Oxford, Northampton, Rutland, Leicester, Nottingham, Warwick, & Lincoln. After the se there be five which border Westward upon Wales, as Gloucester, Hereford, Worcester, Shropshire, Stafford, Chester, & Monmouth. About the middle of the Region lie Derbyshire, Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Cumberland. On the left hand toward the West is Westmerland. Against the same is the Bishopricke of Durham, & Northumberland, which boundeth upon the North in the Marches of Scotland.

These shires be divided into xlii. Bishopricks, which by a Greek word, be called Dioceses. Of which Dioceses, Canterburie hath Kent. Rochester hath part of Kent. London hath Essex, Middlesex, and part of Hertford. Winchester hath Sussex. Winchester hath Hampshire, Surrey, & the Isle of Wight. Salisbury hath Berkshire, and Wiltshire. Exeter hath Devonshire and Cornwall. Bath and Wells hath Somersetshire. Worcester hath Worcestershire, and part of Warwickshire. Gloucester hath Gloucestershire. Hereford hath part of Shropshire, and Herefordshire. Coventrie and Lichfield hath Staffordshire, Derbyshire, part of Warwickshire, & part of Shropshire. Lincoln which is the greatest, lying betwene the Thames and Humbe, hath Lincoln, Leicestershire, Huntingdon, Bedford, Buckingham, and the residue of Hertford.

of Saint Columbe, by name called Aconia. The same river againe bendeth from Loughdean a countrey adioyning (abundant of all thinges) called the ffrife, in which countrey are many towne, as Donfermle, Cuppe, but the notable towne of Saint Andrew, specially famous for the Vniuersitie, and beautified with the Sea of the Archbishop and Bpimate of all Scotland. On the other side towards the ffrish side Southward, is Niddadale, so called of the River that passeth thereby, where be the strong towne of Douglass and Donfrife.

Vpon the South adioyneth Galloway, more abundant of fodder for Cattel, then of Wheate, where is the towne of Candida Casa, now called Whitherne, and the ancient Temple of saint Pinian, adioyned also with an Episcopall Sea. In those partes besides the towne of Wighton is a lake of a wonderfull nature, because the one side in Winter doth freeze, and the other not. By that standeth the countrey of Carida, once renowned with the towne Caricon, whereof perchance it toke the name. Above Carida towards the West, is Elgonia (by which name Ptoleme calleth the countrey) bordering by on the Ocean, wherein is the lake Lomunde, which is verie broad and large, containing manie Islands, situate at the foot of the mountaine Spantelbelne, eight miles from the castell of Donbryton, besides the river Bobotria, now named Leuinus, entering into the River of Glota or Glude. Here some do contend that the name of Bobotria is not well applied to Leuinus, because it appeareth by Cornelius Tacitus, that Bobotria and Glota haue sundry passages into the sea, and are clearely diuers one from the other, as Leuinus and Glota, are not: wherefore they iudge rather the River now called the ffrish to be that which of old time had to name Bobotria, and to proue the same they adde many other reasons, which here I omit. But a good space on this side Grampius riseth the River of Taus, the greatest in all Scotland, taking his name of a lake from whence it springeth, which falleth by Acholia and Caldonia by manie places, but chiefly by Perichum now called Saint Johns towne, and lastly by Wunde, in time past called Alectum, and there breaketh into the German sea, and at the mouth forceth great estuaries or armes of the sea, whereof Tacitus maketh mention. Against Taus is Anguile, which by meanes of that river is fertile and prosperous, and is deuised from ffrife.

So the same vpon the South adioyneth Athol, not the barrenest countrey, as well for water as for plenty of soile. On the other side Arguile the west it selfe, which being full of lakes, yeildeth greater plenty of fodder then fruits, whose bettermost bounds stretch so farre, as Ireland is not distant past sixtens miles, about which the promontorie or foreland called Lands head standeth. That coast whilome the Silures did inhabit, as Polidor gathereth by these wordes of Plinie in his 4 booke, the 16. chapter.

Ireland being situate over against Brytaine, is distant from the nation of Silures by the shortest cut twentie miles. Whobeth, some other, for that it is manifested by the same Plinie in the same Chapter, and also by other writers, that Brytaine was not in his time well knowne so farre South, suppose he meant not by this, that the Silures should inhabit Arguile, but rather South Wales, Wales, from whence the passage over was better knowne (and as hee might haue vnderstanding) thereof. Where also as well Tacitus as Antoninus seeme to place that people.

Betwene Argile and Leniox Westward lieth the Countrey of Sterling, so called by a towne there. Here the Forrest of Calidonia began on the left doe, which within stretcheth farre and broad. This Forrest sometimes bredde white Bulles, long maned like Lyons, which were so wilde as they could not be tamed, but because the flesh was pleasant and daintie to the mouth, the whole race of them almost is extinguished. There likewise is the Castle of Calydene, situate by Taus called Doucheldine. From a little hill of the Forrest riseth Glota, or Cluid, which by a broad channell falleth into the ffrish Ocean, for stayed in a manner by the bankes of the mountaine Grampius, it slideth into the Sea by great tides, so (as witnesseth Tacitus) the Romanes thought it to be another Island. Of that river the Dale was called Gloteuale, which Countrey that River runneth by; and in the same is the Citie of Glasco, a goodlie Vniuersitie.

Again towards the East is layned the Countrey of Anguile and Meme vpon the Sea coast, wherein Forbune by situation is verie strong, and for the reliques of S. Palladius the Scottish Apostle, famous.

Of the same side of Scotland, is the Countrey of Marre, garnished with a Citie called Aberdone, standing betwene the two rivers of Dona and Dea, with a Schoule also adioyned. Then followeth Morrey, which the two notable Rivers doe compass about, called Nesa and Spea. At the mouth of this last River, standeth the towne of Elgin, about the banks whereof be huge woods replenished with all sortes of wilde beastes. There is a Lake also called Spina, flozed with plenty of Swannes: but in the middle part standeth the broad Country of Rossia, now called Beane Rozen, stretching to the uttermost angle euen to both the Seas, and the further it goeth Eastward, the better it is inhabited. In the same is a bolome of the Sea, now and then to convenient for Sailers, as commonly it is called the port of Health, (or the Haven of Safety) and the towne Thana. The breadth of the Island is verie short, for falling into the forme of a wedge, it is scant xxx. mile over, which defended with three promontories like towers, repelleth the great waues and surges of the Sea: and intironed with two gulfes, which those promontories doe inclose, the entries be quiet and calme, and the water peaceable. The stratte of that land is at this day called Cathanes, coasting vpon the Sea Deucalidon.

Thus much of the particulars of Scotland. But the same is in euerie place full of good Hauens and nauigable entries, Lakes, with sparrowes, fowles, fountaines, verie full of fish, and mountaines, vpon the tops whereof be pleasant plaines, yeolding great store of grasse, and plenty of fodder for Cattel, woods likewise full of wilde beastes. That part of the land is well stocked with commodities, and therefore the people hard to be banquished at any time, by reason the woods and sparrowes be at hand for refuge, and hunger eased with venison and fish. Without Scotland in the ffrish Seas, are manie Islands twelue discovered, to the number of one hundred and fourtie: some of these in length are fiftie miles, but in breadth not above twelue. Amongst them is Iona beautified with the Tombes of the Scottissh kings. The Islanders generally speake Irish, which declareth them to take their originall of the Irish nation. Beyond Scotland toward the North, be the Isles of Orkades, which (as Ptolomie saith) bee threescor in number, some lying in the Deucalion Sea, and some in the Germane Ocean, the principall of which Islands is Pomonia, because it is a Bishoppes Sea, and is vnder the gouernement of Scotland. The Islanders vse the Gothes speech, which argueth them to procede from the Germanes. They be tall of stature, but verie healthie and lustie of bodie and minde, lining verie long, although their chiefe food is fish, for the land almost continually beset with cold, in many places is not able to beare corne, and generally almost without tre or bush. Beyond the Orkades be the Isles of Scotland, vnder the king of Scots obedience, and beyond those standeth Thule, in the frozen sea now called Ireland, to which our merchants repaire for fishing once euery yeare in the Summer. And thus much haue I to saie of the site of Scotland: now of the nature and manners of the people.

The Scots which inhabite in the Southerne part, be well nurtured, and liue in good ciuilitie, and the most ciuill vse the English speech. And for that land there is geason and scant, their common felwell is of a blacke stone, which they dig out of the earth. The other part Northerne, and full of mountaines, a verie rude and homely kinde of people doth inhabite, which are called the Red-thankes or wilde Scots. They be clothed with a mantell and shirte saffroned after the Irish manner, going bare legged to the knee. Their weapons are bolvs and dartes, with a verie broad sword and a dagger, sharpe only at the one side. All speake Irish, feeding on fish, milke, cheese, and flesh, hauing a great number of Cattell. The Scots differ from the English in lawes and customes, because they vse the ciuill lawe as almost other Countreies doe. The English haue their owne lawes and edictes. In certaine other conditions they be not farre unlike, but their language is one, their habite and complexion like, one courage in battell, and in the societie one desire & pregnancie in hunting. The Countrey houses bee narrowe, covered with strawe and reede, wherein the people and beastes doe lodge together. Their Townes besides Saint Johns Colone are unwalled, which is to be ascribed to their animositie and hardi- nesse, firing all their succour and helpe alwaie in the baliaunce of their bodie. The Scottes are verie wise, as their learning declareth. For to what vntoener Art they do apply themselves, they easily profite in the same. But the idle and slothful, and such chieflie as shun and auoide labour, liue in great poverty, and yet will not sticke to boast of their nobilitie & gentrie, as though it were more famely for the honest to lacke, then comely by exercise of some honest Arte to get their living. But the Scots generally be deuoute obseruers of Religion. And thus much of Scotland.

Whales the third part of Brytaine lieth vpon the left hand, which like a Promontorie or forland, or an Isle (as it were) on euery side is compassed with the maine sea, except it be on the Southeast part with the Riuer of Sa-byrne, commonly called Seuerne, which deuidenth Wales from Englande, although some late writers affirme hereof to be a bound betwene Wales and England, and say, that Wales beginneth at Chepstowe, where the Riuer Wye (augmented with an other Riuer called Lugg) passing by Hereforde, both runne into the sea, which Riuer riseth in the middle of Wales out of that hill (but vncertaine whether out of that spyring that Sabrine doth,) for euery to that place there goeth a great arme of the sea, which passing through the land westward, on the right hand leaueh Cornwell, and on the left Wales: which Topographic or description, although it bee newe, yet I thought good to followe. Therefore Wales is extended from the Colone of Chepstowe, where it beginneth almost by a straight line a little above Shrewsburie, euen to Melchester Northward. Into that part, so manie of the Brytaines as remained aliuie after the slaughter and losse of their Countrey, at the length being driuen to their thistles, did repaire, as ancient writings report, where partly through refuge of the mountaines, and partlie of the woods and marshes, they remained in safetie: which part they enjoy euen to this daie. That land afterwards the Englishmen did call Wales: and the Brytaines the inhabitantes of the same, Walshmen: for amongst the Germanes, Walshman, signifieth a stranger, an alien, an outboine or strange man, that is, such a one, as hath a contrarie language from theirs, for Wal in their tongue is called a stranger boine, as an Italian or Frenchman, which differ in speech from the Germane. Man signifieth Homo, which is a man in English. Therefore Englishmen, a people of Germanie, after they had wonne Brytaine, called the Brytaines, which escaped after the destruction of their Countrey, after their Countrey manner, Walshmen, because they had another tongue or speech besides theirs: and the lande which they inhabited Wales, which name afterward both to the people and Countrey did remaine. By this meane the Brytaines with their kingdome lost their name. But they which affirme that name to be deriued of their King or Quene, without doubt be deceiued. The Countrey sitle towards the sea coast, and in other places in the balles and plaines, is most fertile, which yeldeth both to man and beast great plentie of fruite and grasse: but in other places for the most part it is barraine and lesse fruitfull, because it lacketh tillage: for which cause husbandmen doe liue hardly, eating Watlen cakes, and drincking milke mirt with water. Where be many Towns and strong Castles, and foure Bishopricks, if the Bishopricke of Hereford bee counted in England, as the late Writers declare. The first Bishopricke is Meneue, so called of Meneu, which at this day they call Saint Davids, a Citie verie auncient, situated vpon the sea coast, and boundeth Westward toward Ireland. Another is Lambasse, the third Bangor, and the fourth Saini Asaph, which bee vnder the Archbishop of Canterburie. The Walshmen haue a language from the Englishmen, which (as they saie) they fetch their pedigree from the Troians) both partly sounde of the Troian antiquitie, and partlie of the Greeke. But howsoeuer it is, the Walshmen do not pronounce their speech so pleasantly and gently as the Englishmen do, because they speake more in the throte: and contrariwise, the Englishmen rightly fol-holding the Latines, doe expresse their voice somewhat within the lips, which to the hearers seemeth pleasant and sweete. And thus much of Wales, the third part of Brytaine.

Cornwall.

Now followeth the fourth and last part of Brytaine named Cornwall. This part beginneth on that side which standeth toward Spaine Westward: Toward the East, it is of breadth fourescore and ten miles, extending a little beyond S. Germaines, which is a verie famous villiage, situate on the right hand upon the Sea coast, where the greatest breadth of that Countrey is but twenty miles: for this parcell of land on the right hand is compassed with the coast of the maine Sea: and on the left hand with that arme of the Sea, which (as before is declared) parteth the land, and runneth by to Chepstowe, where the countrey is in forme of a boine: for at the first it is narrow, and then groweth broader a little beyond the said towne of S. Germain. Eastward it bordereth upon England: West, South, and North, the maine sea is round about it: it is a very barren soile, yielding fruit more through trauell of the tillers and husbandmen, then through the goodness of the ground: but there is great plenty of Lead and Tinne, in the myning and digging whereof both specially consist the living and sustentation of the inhabitants. Their tongue is farre dissimant from English, but it is much like to the Walsh tongue, because they haue many wordes common to both tongues: yet this difference there is between them, when a Walsh man speaketh, the Cornish man rather vnderstandeth many wordes spoken by the Walshman, then the whole tale he telleth; whereby it is manifest, that those three people doe vnderstand one another, in like manner as the Southern Scots doe perceiue and vnderstand the Northern. But it is a thing very rare and marvellous, that in one Island there should be such variety of speeches. Cornwall is in the Diocesse of Exeter, which was once worthy to be counted the fourth part of the Island, for the contrarietie of the language. Afterwards the Normans, which constituted a kingdome of all those 3. parts, reckened Cornwall to be one of the Counttes or Shires of the Countrey. Thus much of the particular description of Brytaine, that the whole bodie of the Realme (by the members) maie bee the better knoone to some peraduenture that neuer heard the same before.

S. Germain.

The forme of the Island is Triquetra, or three cornered, hauing three corners, or three sides: two whereof, that is to say, the corner toward the East, and the other toward the West (both extending Northwards) are the longest.

The third side which is the South side, is farre shorter then the other: for the Island is greater of length then of breadth. And as in the other two partes is contained the length, even so in the last, the breadth, in which place the breadth beginneth: and so continuing from the South part to the North, it is but narrow. The first and right corner of which Island Eastward, is in Kent, at Dover and Sandwich. From whence to Calais or Boloigne in France, is the distance of thirty miles. From this Angle, which is against France, to the third Angle, which is in the North in Scotland, the maine whereof boundeth upon Germanie, but no land seen, (and there the Island is like vnto a wedge euen at the very Angle of the lande in Scotland,) the length is seauen hundred miles. Againe, gaue, the length from this corner at Dover in Kent, to the uttermost part of Cornwall, being S. Withels mount (which is the West part or West Angle) is supposed to bee three hundred miles. From this left Angle being the West part and the uttermost part of Cornwall, which hath a prospect towardes Spaine, in which part also standeth Ireland, situate betwene Brytaine and Spaine to the North Angle in the further part of Scotland, in which part the Island doeth end, the length is eight hundred miles, in which part there be very good hauens, and safe harboroughes for shippes, and apt passages into Ireland, being not past one daies sayling: but the shortest passage is from Wales to Waterford, a towne in Ireland upon the Sea coast, much like to that passage betwene Dover and Calais, or somewhat more: but the shortest passage of all, is out of Scotland, from this last Angle to Hampton, which is a towne upon the sea coast, with a haven so called toward the South, and therefore called Southampton, betwene the Angles of Kent and Cornwall, they do measure by straight line the whole length of the Island, and doe saie, that it containeth eight hundred miles, as the breadth from Meneus or S. Dauids to Harmouth, which is in the uttermost part of the Island towardes the East, doth containe two hundred miles, for the breadth of the Island is in the South part, which part is the front and beginning of the land, and endeth narrow, or as it were in a straight. So the circuite or compasse of the Island is, 1800. miles, which is 200. lesse then Caesar doeth reckon or accompt.

Of

Of the first habitation of this Iland, a short note to the Reader.

Genes. 10.

Here it is recorded by the sacred and most auncient Historie, that after the vniuersall flood, the isles of the Gentiles were diuided by the posterity of Iapheth the son of Noah, we doubt not but this Isle of Brytaine was also then peopled by his progenie, the history of whome, as it is to bee wished and appertinent to this purpose, to sith it is irrecoverable, not onely vnto vs, but also to other nations, I thinke it better to say nothing therein, then to set downe here Samoths, Magus, Sarron, Druijs, and Bardus for his successours, which are vpholden and bolstered onely by the credite and authoritie of a newe small pamphlet falsely forged, & thrust into the world vnder the title of the auncient Historian Berosus. For that is the censure of all the best learned as concerning our common Berosus, which at his first appearing, about one hundred yeeres since, was partly suspect by Lodowicus Vives, afterward conuincd to be fabulous by the learned Gaf. Varerius, in a seuerall Treatise, and nowe vniuersally reiected of all skillfull Antiquaries, as a meere fable, vniuersally the name of Berosus. Therefore I dare not ground the beginning of our Historie vpon the credite thereof, vnlesse I would be preiudiciall to the truth, whereunto I leuell all my induour. I hope it shall be sufficient in this History for the Brytainestime, to follow the authoritie of the receiued Brytish History, which Geoffrey Archdeacon of Mormouth translated out of the Brytish tongue about 400. yeeres since, beginning with Brute, who after the progenie of Iapheth seemeth to be first discouerer, namer, and Ruler of this land. Yet before we enter into the Historie of Brute, it shall not bee impertinent to note here, that whereas Pomponius Melamentioneth that one Hercules killed Albion a giant about the mouth of Rhodie in France, many learned men haue iudged the said Albion to haue ruled here, (sith the Greeke monuments doe alway call this Isle Albion), and after his death that Hercules came hither, Lilius Giraldus writteth. An auncient Altar also containing the inscription of a vow found in the vttermoost North part of Brytaine 1500. yeeres since, as Solinus reporteth, plainly prouoed that Vlysses the renowned Græcian in histennye yeeres traueles, after the sacking of Troy, arriued in this our country.

And thus much is found onely in approved Histories, as concerning Brytaine before the arriual of Brutus.

The race of the Kinges of Brytaine after the common receiued opinion since Brute, &c: and in the margent are placed the yeeres before Christ his birth, when euery King began their reignes, till Cunobelinus, in whose time Christ the Sauour of the worlde was borne, and then following, the yeeres from Christ his birth are placed.

R V T E the sonne of Syluius, the sonne of Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas, after the death of his father, being banished into Greece, deliuered there the remnant of the Troians from the long captiuitie, wherein they were detained vnder the Grecian, with whom he departed thence for to sake some habitation: and associating to himselfe Corineus with his Troians whome he found in the waile, after a long and wearie iourney, and manie notable actes atchieued in Aquitaine, hee arriued in this Iland, which was called Albion at a place now called Totnes in Devonshire, the yere of the world, 2855. the yere before Christes natiuitie, 1108. where in hee first beganne to raigne, and named it Brytaine (as some wyte) or rather after his owne name Brutaine, as Aethicus that wonderfull Philosopher (a Scythian by race, but an Italian by Countrey) translated by Saint Hierom about a thousand yeres past, termeth both it and the Isles adiacent Insulas Brutanicas. And for more proufe of this restored name, not onely the said Philosopher (who traueled through many landes, and in this land taught the knowledge of mynerall workes) may be alleadged, but sundrie other, as the Sibils Oracles, wherein the name of the Brytaines is written with y that is the Grækes little u, which Oracles although they were not the Sibils owne worke, as some suspect, yet are they verie auncient indubie, and that they might seeme more auncient, vnder the most auncient name of Countreies and peoples. And some English writers more then two hundred yeres since, vsuallie doe name it Brutaine, and not otherwise, through a large hisorie of this lande, translated out of French, Brute builded the citie of new Troy, now called London, hee stablished therein the Trojan lawes, and gaue the vttermoost Westerne part of the Realme to his companion Corineus, of whose name it was called Corinea, and to this daie Cornewall. John Harding saith, that Brute bare Coles, two Lyons rampant enbossed on a shield. Also a banner vert, a Diana of gold fitchel crownded and inthronised, that wore Aeneas armes, when he entered the land of Latins. John Hanuile in Archirenio, and Nicholas Vpton, and other our auncient Heraulds saie hee bare on a shield, a Lyon passant, Coles, &c. apant are desirous (saith Aeneas Siluius) to knowe howe the name of Heraulds came first in vse, who first ordeined them, and what office, and authority they beare amongst men. but as the nature of man is to desire knowledge of many things, and seeking to be satisfied therein, I found in the newesrie, or treasure of S. Pauls Church in London, (in anno 1451.) an olde historie written (as the Title did specifie) 600. yeres before. Which if it be true, it may both satisfie my desire, and others in the premises: the Author of the booke, was Thucydides the Grecian, but the translation name was not therein noted: but truly it was right eloquently set forth in the Latine tongue. The content of the two booke I doe not now well remember, but the tenure of the sentence, was well nere in this sort, as I shall declare. Heraulds be they, which our Elders were wont to call Heroes, that is to saie, those which were greater or surpassing all men in maiestie, and yet inferiours to the gods. For whom the people of antiquity did perceiue to be notable, and surmounting all others in his acts, and feates, renowned in vertues, and friendly, or gracious vnto them: him would they magnifie and exalt in the highest degree, and as it were, with their god words make them consins to God almightie, placing them amongst the Gods, if it so were, that they had wrought some miraculous feate above the common course of nature. But if there were no such miraculous or wonderfull dooers, but that through their vertues they seemed wonderfull and honourable: then thought they to call such persons, not altogether gods, no; yet simple men, but inuented out a meane word and name for them, calling them Heroes, as it were halfe gods. And of this word Heroes or Heros, groweth by corruption of sle this name Heraulds. Albeit some saie that those Heroes were olde souldiers, that had spent all their age weelmore in the warres: out of the which sort the Heraulds ought to be chosen, and so the terme Heraulds seemeth to bee a Dutch word, and to sounde as much as an olde souldier, or man of war. But the first that beganne and ordeyned this order, was Dionysius, the which was the first also that invaded Italia with an armed power, and gathered the rude people there together, which liued in woodes and desartes like wilde beastes, feeding on leaues, barkes of trees, and rawe fleshe: teaching them to liue after a ciuile order and fashion: also to build Townes and villages, to worship the gods, to till and plowe the earth, to plant vineyards, and make wine, to weare apparel, to anoint and trim their bodies, and to be thort, to liue after a humane maner. And now following the common opinion, after Geoffrey Monmouth.

Brute deuised the whole Island among his three sonnes, which hee had by Innogen his wife, Locrine, Camber, and Albanact. Vnto Locrine he gaue the middle part betwene Humber and Seuerne, which of him was called Loegria. To Camber he gaue all the region beyond Seuern, which of him take the name of Cambria, and is now called Wales. To Albanact he gaue all the landes beyond Humber, which of his name was called Albania: after which partition he deceased, when he had reigned foure and twenty yeres, and was buried at new Troy.

Locrine, the eldest sonne of Brute, reigned twentie yeres: hee chased the Hunnes, which invaded this realme; and pursued them so sharply, that many of them with their king, were drowned in a riuer which then parted Eng- land and Scotland. And so much as the king of Hunnes, named Humber, was

was there drowned, the riuer is till this day named Humber. This king Locrine had to wife Guendoline, daughter of Corineus, Duke of Cornwall, by whom he had a sonne named Madan. He also kept as Paramour, the beautiful Lady Estride, by whom he had a daughter named Sabine. And after the death of Corineus, he put from him the said Guendoline, and wedded Estride: but Guendoline repaiued to Cornwall, where she gathered a great power, and fought with king Locrine, and slewe him. He was buried at new Troy. So hee drowned the Lady Estride, with her daughter Sabine in a riuer, that after the young maidens name is call Seuerne.

Guendoline the daughter of Corineus and wife to Locrine (so much as Madan her sonne was too young to gouerne the land) was by common assent of all the Brytains, made ruler of the whole Ile of Brytan, which she well and discretely ruled, to the comfort of her subjects, fifteen yeres, and then left the same to her sonne Madan.

Madan, the sonne of Locrine and Guendoline, was made ruler of Brytaine: hee vied great pyrrany among his Brytains; and being at his disposal of hunting, he was deuoured by wilde Wolues, when he had reigned xl. yeres. He left two sons, named Memprius and Manlius.

Memprius, the sonne of Madan, being king, by treason slewe his brother Manlius, after whose death hee liued in more tranquillitie, where through he fell in sloth, and so to lechery, taking the wives and daughters of his subjects: and lastly, became to euill, that hee forsooke his wife and concubines, and fell to the sinne of Sodomitie with beastes, whereby hee became odious to God and man: And going on hunting, hee lost his companie, and was deuoured of wilde Wolues, whereof the land was then full, when he had reigned threene yeres.

Ebranke, the sonne of Memprius, was made ruler of Brytaine, he had xxi. wives, of whom hee receiued xx. sonnes, and xxx. daughters: which were sent by their fathers to Alba Siluius, the fourth king of Albanos in Italy, to be married to the Albanes. This Ebranke first after Brutus attempted to invade France with an armie, as Iacobus Bergomas saith in his list of his Chronicles, and Iacobus Lessabeus in the description of Henault affirmeth the same, and that he was driven backe by Brunchildis Lord of Henault with no small losse of his men. Alfaracus the second sonne of Ebranke, with the rest of his younger brethren 18 at the least, by the aide of Alba Siluius, conquered all Germanie, which was then no great matter, for then Europe was verie small inhabited, saue onely about the Sea coasts, as Dalmatia, Italie and the coasts of France, as in reading the histories may easily be seen how the East people at sundry times came swarming into Europe. Of the brethren had Germanie the name, a Germanis fratribus, that had subdued it. Ebranke was a founder of manie Cities (saith Bergomas) as Aclais in Albania (nowe Scotland) which is after Hector Boetius, Dunbretaine, but other thinke the same to be cleane destroyed. He made the Castell of apaldens called Denbrough. Hee made also the Castell of Wamburgh. In the xlii. yere of his raigne hee builded Harpynke, since by the Saxons called Nozwiike, now corruptly Nozke, where in Leil the sonne of Brute Greenechilde, being a lover of peace, builded Carlelle and repaied Carleon, which was since by the Romaines reedified, when a legion of souldiers was sent thither, and by them named The City of Legions, now called Chester, of the ancient building with banlikes and towers, each house like a Castell, which sometime had bene of great pleasure. A legion of the Romaines (as Vigeius reporteth) contained 6000. warriors or more: which legion was deuised into tenne bandes, but the first passed all the rest, both in number of souldiers, and also in estimation: for this bande bare the Eagle, which was the chiefeest standarde of the Romaines. This first bande contained 1105. footemen, heavy armed horsemen 132. and was named Cohors milliaria, that is to saie, a companie of a thousand and more souldiers. This bande is the head of all the legion: whensoever they must fight, these begin the battaile, and are first set in order in the front of the battaile. The second bande containeth 555. footemen, and 66. horsemen of heauie armour, and this bande is called Cohors quingestaria, that is to saie, a companie of 500. and more souldiers. The third bande likewise hath 555. footemen, and 66. horsemen. The fourth bande hath 555. footemen, and 66. horsemen. The fifth bande hath as manie. These five bandes are set in aray in the first battaile. The first bande hath 555. footemen, and 66. horsemen. The seventh bande hath 555. footemen, 66. horsemen. The eighth bande hath 555. footemen, 66. horsemen. The ninth bande hath 555. footemen, 66. horsemen. The tenth bande hath 555. footemen, 66. horsemen. These tenne bandes make a full and perfect legion, containing, 6100. footemen, and 726. horsemen. King Leil in the ende of his reigne fell to sloth and lust of the bodie, by meane whereof ciuill strife was raised, and not in his daies ended. Hee reigned xlv. yeres, and was buried at Carlelle alias Chester.

Canterburie, Winchester, and Bath built.

Rudhudibras, alias Cicuber, the sonne of Leil, builded Caergant, of the Englishmen called Canterbury, (that is to saie, the Court of the Catholikes) Caergant, now Winchester, and Caerlepton now called Bath: buris buris, wherein he builded three Temples, and placed in the same Flamines. He reigned xxx. yeres.

By Leil the sonne of Rudhudibras, who had long studied at Athens brought with him some Philosophers, to keepe schools in Brytaine: for the which hee builded Stamford, and made it an Vniuersity, wherein he had great number of scholars studying in all the seven liberrall Sciences: which Vniuersitie lasted to the coming of S. Augustine. At which time the Bishop of Rome interdicted it for heresies that set among the Saxons: Brytains together myrr, so saith Harding. He builded Caer Wadon or Bath, and made there a temple to Apollo, and placed there a Flamme: he made also the hote Bathes, and practised his Pyromancie: hee decked himselfe in feathers, and pyramed to sle, but by falling on his temple, he brake his necke, when he had reigned xx. yeres.

Leir the sonne of Bladud succeeded his father. He builded Caer Lear vpon the Riuer of Soze, now called Leicester, and made there a Temple of Ianus, placing a flame to gouerne the same, he had three daughters, Gonoril, Regan, and Cordeilla, which Cordeilla for her vertue and wisdom towarde her father, succeeded him in the kingdome. When he had reigned xl. yeres hee deceased, and was buried vnder the channel of the Riuer Soze, within Leicester. This vault vnder the earth was built in honour of Ianus Bifrons. There all the workmen of that Citie, when the solemnitie of the daie came, begonne all things that they had to do the yere following.

Cordeilla, the youngest daughter of Leir, succeeding her father, was seuered by her two nephews, Morgan of Albany, and Cunedagius of Camber and Cornwall, who at the length tooke and cast her in prison: where shee being in dispaire of recovering her estate, slew her selfe, when shee had reigned v. yeres, and was buried at Leicester.

Morgan, the eldest sonne of Dame Gonorilla, claimed Brytain, and warred on his nephew Cunedagius, that was king of Camber (that now is Wales) of Cornwall: but Cunedagius met with Morgan in Wales, & there slew him: which place is called Glamorgan til this day. And then Cunedagius was king of all Brytain. He builded a Temple of Mars at Perth, that now is St. Johns towne in Scotland, & placed there a flame: hee builded another of Minerua in Wales, which now is named Bangor. The thirde hee made of Mercurie in Cornwall, where he was borne, he reigned xxxiii. yeres, and was buried at new Trop.

Riualus, sonne of Cunedagius, succeeded his father, in whose time it rained blood 3. daies: after which tempest ensued a great multitude of venemous bites, which slew much people, & then a great mortality throughout this land, caused almost desolation of the same. Thus cruelly was the blood and house of Bruce destroyed, when this Realme by the space of 616. yeres had bene governed by that lynage.

After this Realme was deuided with ciuill warres, for lacke of one soueraine gouernour, untill Dunwallo reduced the same into one Monarchie.

Mulmutius Dunwallo, the sonne of Cloten, Duke of Cornwall, reduced this Realme into one Monarchie, being before by ciuill warres and dissention diuised and brought into diuers dominions: he was the first that wore a crowne of gold: hee constituted good lawes, which long after were called Mulmutius Lawes, these lawes holy Gildas wrote out of the Brytish speech into Latine. He gaue priuiledges vnto Temples, and ploughes, and began to make the foure notable waies in Brytaine. He reigned xl. yeres, leaving after him two sonnes, Belinus and Brennus.

Vnto the other the North part beyond Humber: this Brennus, a young man, desirous of glory and dominion, raised warre against Beline. But in the conclusion by the meanes of their mother, they were accorded, and Brennus being wholly giuen to the studie of wars, left his countrey to the gouernance of his brother, and went into France as amongst the Galles, where for his excellent qualities he was greatly esteemed, & made of them their soueraine Captaine, with whom he passed into Italy, sacked Rome, and expelling the Tuscanes, builded Spillaine, Vercellia, Como, Bergamo, Vincenza, Trent, and Merona, which he called after his owne name Brenna. After this (as writeth Trogus Pompeius, abridged by Iulius) Brennus leader of the Galles, (he nameth him not a Brytaine) raised an host of 150000. footemen, and 15000. horsemen, and inuaded Spacedone againe. Whom when Sothenes sawe how they waied the Countrey and villages, he met them with his host of Spacedones well appointed. But by reason they were fewe, and their enemies many, they were sone put to the worser. Wherefore while the Spacedones being beaten, kept them within the walles of their cities, Brennus like a conquerour, against whome no man durst shewe his head to make resistance, foraged all the Iles of Spacedone. And from thence as though those booties and spoiles seemed to bafe and simple in his eye, he turned his minde to the Temples of the Gods immortal, malapertly scoffing that the Gods were rich, and ought to depart liberally to men. Wherefore hee took his iourney towards Delphos, setting more by the gaine of the golde that had bene offered to the Gods, then by their displeasure.

The Temple of Apollo at Delphos, is situate in the mount Parnassus, vpon a cliffe on euery side falling steepe downe. Where the confluence of men hath made a populous Citie. Moreover both the Temple and the towne are enclosed with the steepenesse of the rocke. The middle part of the rocke inward is in fashion like a Theatre, by meanes whereof when men make anie shouting, or any trumpet is sounded, the same breaketh and reboundeth in such wise vpon the stones from one to another, that the Echo is heard double and triple, the noise resounding farre louder then it went forth. The which causeth the ignorant to stand in more feare, thinking it to be the presence of the Godhead. In the winding of the rocke, almost midwaie to the toppe of the hill, there is a little plaine, and in the same a deepe hole into the ground, which seemeth to giue oracles: out of the which a certaine colde breath ascending vppward, stirreth the mindes of the Prophets into a madnesse, and so compelleth them to giue answer to such as come for counsaile. In the same place therefore, there are to be seene manie and rich giftes of kings and peoples. Wherefore when Brennus came within the view of the Temple, he was in doubt a great while, whether he were better to attempt the matter forthwith, or giue his souldiours that nights respite to rest them. Euridanus and Theisalonus, who for couetousnesse of the pray, had sopened themselves with him, willed to cut off all debate, while their enemies were vnprovided, whereas by giuing them that nights respite, their enemies should perchance get both courage and succour: but the common souldiers of the Frenchmen, when after long penurie, they found a Countrey replenished with wine, and all other kinde of victualles, they dispersed themselves in the fieldes, making haucke of all things like Conquerours, by which meanes the Delphians had respite to lay for themselves, and manned the towne by the helpe of their neighbours, or neuer the Frenchmen could be called from the wine sat to the standard. Brennus had thyscote and five thousand chosen footemen of the best in all his host, whereas the Delphians were in all but 40000. fighting men. In dislike of which small handfull Brennus to the intent to sharpen the mindes of his men, shewed them all, what a rich and plentifull praye they shoulde haue. The Frenchmen being by this vouching of their Captaine, or rather by their owne beholding, stirred vp, and also wounded with the wine they had poloyed in the day before, without respect of any danger ran headlong to the encounter. On the contrarie part, the Delphians putting more trust in God then in their owne strength, resisted their enemies, and what with stones, and what with their weapons, shewed the Frenchmen (as they scaled) headlong from the top of the mountaine. While the two parts were thus striving one with another, suddenly the Priests of the Temples, and the Prophets, with their haire about their eares, &c. like men distracted and out of their wits, came running into the forefront of the battaile, crying out, that while they were all making their supplications to God for aide, they met a young man of beauty and personage, far exceeding any mortall creature, and in his company two Virgins in armor, wherefore they besought them, seeing the gods did garde their standarde, they should not sticke to dispatch their enemies. And therewithall they forthwith perceived that God was present on their side. For both a peece of the mountaine being broken off, by a sodaine earthquake, overthrewed the French hoste, and the thickest of their enemies (not without great slaughter) were opened and put to flight. In the necke where of there ensued a tempest, with haile, thunder and lightning, consuming as marte as were any thing sore wounded. The capitaine Brennus himselfe not being able to abide the smarte of his wounds, took a sword and killed himselfe. Thus farre abridged out of Iustine.

Being in the meane time (saith Gaufride) both in ciuill iustice and also Religion, greatly increased his Realme. He made three Archbishops, whose Sees were at new Troy, Baybriank and Baylegion. He finished the four great waies begonne by his father: he subdued and made tributary vnto him Denmarke. In new Troy he made the haucn, which at this day retaineth the name of him, called Belines gate: He married his daughter Cambria vnto a Prince of Almaine called Antenor, of whom these people were called Cymbri, and Sycambri.

Finally, after he had reigned with his brother and alone xviij. yeeres, he died: and after the Pagan manner, with great pompe was burned, and his ashes in a vessel of brasse set on a high pinnacle ouer Belines gate. He builded Carheon vpon the riuer Aske, which since by a legion of the Romanes there placed, was named Carlegion, now cleane destroyed.

Gurgunus sonne of Beline succeeded his father. I. Rouse saith he builded Caier Merith, that is, Longcastre: he subdued Denmarke, compelling them to continue their tribute, and in his returne home, mette with a flate of Balouises coming from the parts of Spaine, which were seeking for habitations, because their countrey was so populous, and not able to sustaine them, to whom the king granted the Ile of Ireland to inhabit, and to hold the same of him as their Soueraigne Lord: But the Scots wite, that Spaniards arrived before this time in Ireland. This Gurgunus builded Dorchester and Warwicke in the middle of the Realme (saith I. Rouse.) He reigned xix. yeeres, and was buried at Carheon.

Vinchelinus sonne of Gurgunus, was crowned king of Brytaine. A Prince sober and quiet, who had to wife a noble woman named Mercia, of excellent learning and knowledge. Shee druided certaine lawes, which long time among the Brytaines were greatly esteemed, and named Mercian Lawes. This Prince reigned xxij. yeeres, and was buried at new Troy.

Cecilus

Cecilus the sonne of Guintheline and Mercia, reigned vij. yeeres, (as the Scots wite.) In the first yeere of his reigne, a people called Pices, arrived here in Brytain, & possessed those parts, which now be the Marches of both realmes, England and Scotland. Cecilus was buried at Carheon.

Kimarus succeeded Cecilus, who being a wilde young man, and living after the manner of wild beastes.

Elanius, called also Darius, was king of Brytaine nine yeeres.

Morindus, the bastard sonne of Darius, beganne to reigne in Brytaine: he fought with a king who came out of Germanie, and slewe him with all his power. Afterward, out of the Irish seas in his time came forth a wonderfull sposter, which destroyed much people: whereof the king hearing, would of his valiant courage needes fight with it, by whome he was cleane deuoured, when he had reigned eight yeeres.

Gorbomannus, eldest sonne of Morindus, reigned xi. yeeres: a Prince iust and religious: he renewed the Temples of his gods, and gouerned his people in peace and wealth. This Gorbomannus builded Grantham in Lincolnshire. Our English Chronicle saith, he builded both the townes of Cambridge and Grantham: but seeing that Cambridge in ancient Chronicles is called Grant (as it is also Grancheester, Catergrant, and Grantbridge) it was an easie matter (as Grammaticians know) to translate Grantham into Cambridge, and so ascribe the building of both townes to him that builded but one, or neither of them both.

Archigallo, brother to Gorbomannus, was crowned king of Brytaine: he was in conditions unlike to his brother: for he deposed the noblemen, and exalted the vnnoble. He extorted from men their goods to enrich his treasure: for which cause by the estates of the Realme he was depriued of his royall dignitie, when he had reigned v. yeeres.

Eldurus, the third sonne of Morindus, and brother to Archigallo, was elected king of Brytaine: a vertuous and gentle Prince, who gouerned his people iustlie. As he was hunting in a forest, by chance he met with his brother Archigallo, whome most lovinglie he embraced, and found the means to reconcile him to his Lords, and then resigned to him his royall dignitie, when he had reigned v. yeeres.

Archigallo thus restored to his royall estate, ruled the people quietlie and iustlie ten yeeres, and was buried at Poske.

Eldurus afterwards, after the death of his brother Archigallo, for his pietie and iustice, by the generall consent of the Brytaines was againe chosen king. But he reigned not passing ii. yeeres, for his younger brethren Vigenius, and Peredurus raysed warre against him, took him prisoner, and cast him in prison, where he remained during their reigne.

Vigenius and Peredurus, after the taking of their brother, reigned together seven yeeres. Vigenius then died, and Peredurus reigned after alone two yeeres. Hee builded the Towne of Pichering in the north partes of Poskeshire.

Lud

Lud the eldest sonne of Hely succeeded his father: he amended his lawes, and toke away all vices that were naught: mozeouer he repaired the Citie of newe Troy with faire buildings and walles: and builded on the west part thereof, a strong gate, which vnto this time retaineth the name of him and is called Ludgate. Finally, he died, leaving after him two sonnes Androgus, or Auarous, and Theomantius: who not being of the age to gouerne, their vncle Casibelaue obtained the Crowne. London toke the name of Lud, and was called Ludston, as saith Geoffrey.

Casibelaue, the son of Hely, after the death of his brother Lud, was made gouernour of Brytaine, which ruled xix. yeres. In the xiii. yere of his reigne, Julius Caesar comming vnto that part where Caleis and Boloign now stand, determined to make warre into Brytaine, which untill that time remained infrequented and unknowne of the Romanes. His quarrell was, because that in the warres of France, he persecuted the Frenchmen to haue much succour and aide from thence: And because hee couide not vnderstand nor learne the greatnesse or state of the Island, neither what pations they were which inhabited the same, nor what lawes, customes, or kinde of gouernment they vied, nor yet what Hauens they had able to receiue any number of shippes, he sent Caius Volusenus before with a galley, to discouer as much as he couide, concerning those matters, who within fise daies after returned to Caesar, declaring such things as he had learned by coasting alongst the shore, so: he durst not for feare of the Brytains stirre out of his galley. In the meane space there came Embassadors from many Cities of the Isle, and deliuered him hostages, with whome hee sent Cornius of Arras, charging him to crhoit and persuade the rest of the Cities and Counties to do the like. And hee himselfe shortly after hauing prepared lxxx. shippes, sailed into Brytaine, where at the first being wearied with an hard and sharp battaile, and after with sodain tempest his nauy almost destroyed, he returned again into France, there to winter his men.

The next Spring (which was the yere before Christ 55.) his manie being newe rigged and increased, he passed the Seas againe with a greater armie: but whiles he went towarde his enemies on land, his shippes lying at anchor, were broken on the sandes, where they strack fast: or else through beating one against another, with force of the tempest, they were destroyed, so that fourty were lost, the other with much labour were saued. In the meane space Scaxa, one of Caesars souldiers, with foure others, who before in a small vessell were conuied to a rocke nere the Isle, and by ebbing of the Ocean being forsaken, a great number of Brytains fell on a few Romans, and some of his companions (though but few) found meanes to returne by boate, but Scaxa remained without feare in the middell of his enemies barks: first with his speare he resisted them, after with his sword he alone fought against many of them, and when he was both weary and wounded, and had lost his helmet and shield, with two light harinicks, he ran to Caesars tents, and asked pardon of the Emperour for his ouerboldnesse, who not onely forgave him, but honoured him with the office of a Centurion. Upon land Caesars hostmen at the first encounter were vanquished, and Laberius Durus the Tribune slaine in a place now called Ch.

At the second confliit, not without great danger of his men, he put the Byztaynes to flight, from thence he went unto the riuer Thames, on the further side whereof Casibelanus with a great multitude of people was keeping the bankes, who had set all the sayd bankes, and all the shallowe places, vnder the water with sharpe stakes, enery one of them as bigge as a mans thigh, bound about with lead, & piuen so fast into the bottome of the riuer, that they can neuer be removed, (so sayth Bede and Asker) who affirme that in their times the sayde stakes were easily percelued to remaine as aforesaid. But Casibelanus and his Byztaynes not being able to resist the violence and force of the Romanes, hid themselves in woodes, and with sodaine eruptions oftentimes invaded them: but in the meane time, the Trinobants, which is the strongest Citie belmeere of all those contries submitted it selfe, and deliuered hostages to Caesar, who at their request placed Mandubratius to bee their gouernour, whose father called Immanentius, being chiefe Lord or ruler of the Trinobants, Casibelane had before slaine, wherewith Mandubratius fled, and coming to Caesar, not only submitted himselfe, but also was a great meane (as manie do write) for Caesar to subdue the rest: yet did Casibelane send messengers to the four kinges that ruled in the quarters of Kent, that with all their puissance they shoulde set on the Romanes that late hurt them: their names were Cingetorex, Carullius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, who obeying his request were discomfited, and Cingetorex taken, wherewithall Casibelane being dismated after manie losses, was constrained to giue pledges, and to agree that Byztaine shoulde become tributarie to the Romanes. Thus Byztaine became tributarie to the Romanes, the yere of þ world 3913. after the building of Rome 698. before Christs birth 3. Caesars Com.
touching the
of Byztaynes.

Caesar in his Commentaries describeth the Byztaynes thus. The inner part (saith he) is inhabited of such, as by witnesses of their ancient Records were born and bred in the Isle, and the sea coast by such as haue passed thither out of Belgike to fetch booties, and to make war. All the which belmeere, are called by the names of the Cities where they were borne, and from whence they first came, remaining there still when the warre was done, and tilling the ground. The country is marvellously well replenished with people, and there be very many buildings, almost like in fashion to the building of Gallia. There is great store of cattell, the coine they vse is either of brasse, or else ringes of yron used at a certaine weight in stead of money. In the inner parts of the Realme groweth tinne: and in the sea coast groweth yron, but hercof is small store. The brasse that they occupy is brought in from beyond the sea. There is timber of all kinds as in Gallia, sauing beech and firre. They thinke it a hainous matter to taste of a hare, a henne, or a goose: neuertheless they cherish them for the pleasure. The aire is more temperate in those places then in France, & the colde lesser.

Of

Of all the inhabitants of this Isle, the civillest are the Kentishfolke, the which Countrey marcheth altogether vpon the sea, and differeth not greatly from the manner of France. Those that dwell more into the hart of the Realme, for the most part sowe no coyne, but live by milke and flesh, and clothe themselves in leather. All the Byztaynes doe die themselves with wood, which setteth a blewish colour vpon them, and it maketh them more terrible to beholde in battaile. They weare their haire long, and haue all parts of their bodies sauing þ head and the upper lippe. They haue x. or xii. wiues a pce, common among themselves, specially brothers with brothers, and parents with their chilszen, but the issue that cometh of them, is accounted his that first married the mother when she was a maide, &c.

Theomanthus the sonne of Lud, and nephew to Casibelane, succeeded in the Realme of Byztaine, and reigned quiettly xxiii. yeres, paying the tribute to the Romanes which Casibelane had granted.

Ocranius Augustus desiring to be like Iulius Caesar his father (so) so he alwaies termed him) prepared an expedition into Byztaine, but being come forward into France, understanding that the Pannonians lately subdued, rebelled, he turned his power against them, and altered his minde as touching our Countrey.

The fourth yere after, hee opened the Temple of Ianus at Rome, fullis determining to invade Byztaine, but when he had marched on his way, as far as Ariminum, Ambassadors of Byztaine met him, humbly suing for peace, and submitting themselves vnto his obedience and protection. Wherefore he stayed againe to settle some troubles then raised in France.

The yere following, because the covenants betwene him and the Byztaynes could not be agreed vpon, hee made provision for a thirde expedition into this Isle, but an actuall rebellion in Biscay and Saouoy withheld him then also. But shortly after Ambassadors came from Byztaine to Rome, intreating for peace, swearing fealtie in the Temple of Apars, offering giftes in the Capitol to the Gods of the Romanes: and submitted part of the Isle vnto Augustus, so that the Byztaynes began first to paie tolles and tribute without grudging, for all wares which they traded, which were for that time, Quozie bores, tongues, bowches, and other trinkets of Amber and Glasse. And all here were so quiet, that one band of soldiers and a few hozemen, were sufficient to keepe the Isle in the Romane possession.

Vnobelinus, for so is the inscription of his coine, which I haue seene, and Creab, and therefore corruptly called Kymbelinc, the sonne of Theomanthus reigned king in Byztaine xxx. yeres. In the xliii. yeres of his raigne Christ our saulour was borne in Bethlehem of Iuda.

From this place following, the yeres from Christ his birth are placed in the Margent.

When Caesar Augustus the second Emperour by the will of God had established most sure peace through the world, our Redeemer Iesus Christ vertie God and man, was borne in the xliii. yere of the raigne of Augustus, Albeit the Brytaine historie doth here place Aruiragus, yet it is probable that Cunobelinus as yet liued, for about 40. yeres after Christ, Adminus the son of Cunobeline banished out of Brytain by his father, was received into protection by Caius Caligula the fourth Emperour, who was then set forward with great preparation against Brytaine, but when he came into the partes of Holland against Norfolk he staied, writing vaunting letters to the Senate, that all Brytaine was yielded vnto him, because Adminus had so done. Afterward as though he would immediatly fight a field, he cast his men into battels and squadrons vpon the sea coast, disposing all his Engines in most warlike manner (no man knowing what he meant): this done, he himselfe in a Galley launched into the sea, and immediatly returning, he caused the Trumpets to sound to battaile, and subauntelic commaunded them to gather Cockles and Muscle Shelles, and therewith to fill their helmets, saying, they were spoiles due to the Capitoll, and in these spoiles hee greatlie triumphed, as though he had subdued the Ocean. He rewarded his souldiours and returned to Rome, after he had built a high watch Tower in token of his victory against the sea, & ruines therof are great remaining in Holland, but ouerslowed by the water.

Claudius the Emperour dispatched Aulus Plancius with an armie into Brytain, where after diuers conflicts when he had receiued part of the Boduini into his tuition, and had slaine Cataracus and Togodumnus sons of Cunobeline, and thereby had made the Brytains more eager to reuenge, he sent for Claudius himselfe, who with great preparation and Elephants came into Brytain to his army, then incamped neere the Thames, with which he passed euery into Essex, fought with the Brytains, obtained the victory, took the chiefe citie of Cunobeline, and all weapons from the Brytains, and so returned to Rome the fifth month after hee set forth from thence, where hee triumphed, surmounting his soune Brytanicus: to which triumph hee permitted not onelie the the presidentes of prouinces, but also certaine banished prisoners to repaire to Rome: and amidst the spoiles taken from the Brytains, he fired on the top of his pallace a crowne of gold beset with stermes and foyepartes of shippes, in token he had vanquished the Brytish Ocean. He behaued himselfe very courteously towards diuers of his friends, in so much that when Plancius (a notable man) who in his voyage which he made into Brytain, atchieued diuers notable acts, and should triumph for the same, the Emperour himselfe accompanied him, and (the die being such that with his triumph hee should go by into the Capitoll) Claudius gaue him the preheminence, and went on the left hand.

At this time Vespasian who was after Emperour, was sent by Claudius into Brytaine, where he fought 30. times with the Brytains, subdued to the Roman Empire two worthy nations, about 20. towines, and the Isle of Wight.

Storius was appointed lieutenant in Brytaine for the Romanes, who at his first entrie in the beginning of Winter assaileth the Brytains, & purposed to pierce them by and include them with diuers & fortifications, wherefore the Iceni made an insurrection, which when he had pacified with some slaughter, he marched against the Gangi, foraging all the countries as he passed, but was forced by new tumults to turne from the against the Brigants, whome with some slaughter, and promise of pardon, he pacified. Then he made pouison against the Silures which inhabited South-wales, bearing themselves bolde vpon the puissance of Caratacus a valiant Brytaine, who being skilfull of the Countrey, remoued the war into Shropshire, where he fortified amongst craggie mountaines a place strong by situation, where neuertheless the Romans prevailed. The wife, daughter, and brethren of Caratacus were taken, & he flying to Carismandua a D. ruling in North-shire, was by her perswaded captiue to his enemies. 16. yeres after the wars began, who sending him to Rome, was there in open assemble brought before Claudius, with his wife, daughter, brethren, and friends, and such spoiles as had been taken from him, where hee (nothing dismayed in spirit or countenance,) spake after this sort to Claudius.

If my moderation of prosperous successes had bene correspondent to my state and nobilitie, I might haue come to this Citie, rather a friend then a captiue: neither you haue disdained to admit me into league, being descended of noble parentage, & soueraigne over many nations. His present state of mine, as it is villanous toward me, so it is honorable to you. I had hope, men, money, munition, and what wonder is there, If I had lost them unwillingly: For if you will rule and raigne ouer all, of necessity all must come into slavery: If I had yielded at the first, neither my fortune nor thy glory had bin reuolued, and the obliuion of me had ensued immediatly after my execution: but if you saue my life, it shall be an euertlasting crable of your clemency. At these words Claudius remitted his offence, granted him life, & the Senate adiuaged Offorius worthy to triumph: but in the meane time the inhabitants of South-wales to reuenge Caratacus captiuitie intercepted and discomfited certaine bands of the Romanes, amidst which new wars, Offorius fired with trauel, departed this life.

Claudius sent Didius to supply the place of Offorius now departed, but in the meane time the Silures fought fortunately against the legions which was under the conduct of Manlius Valens. In this time warre brake out betwene Cartismandua Q. of the Brigantes, and Venutius her husband, whome she refused, and matched her selfe with Velocatus his Esquire: whereupon Venutius favoured of the people, assailed her territory, and she succoured by the Romans; after she had intercepted by treachery Venutius brother and allies, fought with him. Where after a sharpe fight, she by the aid of the Romans, prevailed, as also Cæsius Nafica did with his legion against the Brytaines in another place: for Didius used others in these matters, because he was aged, and onely kept that which others had heretofore conquered.

61 Claudius being now poisoned by Agrippina his wife, Nero her sonne obtained the Romane Empire, and about the 7 yeere of his raigne Verennus was appointed lieutenant here, who died within the first yeere of his government, saying that hee woulde have subdued provinces, had he reigned but two yeeres, but about this time great slaughter was here of the Romans.

62 Suetonius Paulinus was then sent hither, who at his arrivall purposing to subdue Anglesey, whither many Brytains had withdrawne themselves, hee in vessels with flat boies ferried over his footmen, bringing over his horsemen by some fords, whereas on the shores stood closely together great numbers of Brytains, and among them women gadding up and down frantically in mourning weeds, their haire hanging about their eares, and shaking sleeves; the Draydes also casting by their hands towards heaven hundred out cruell execrations, with which uncomely sights the Romans at first stood dismayed, but after encouraged by the Generals perswasion, they brast in among them, made great slaughter, got the possession of the Isle, and sold to the Romans consecrated to superstitious uses: two cities belonging to the Romans were taken, 80000. of their people slain, and the whole Island revolted, and to the Romans reproch, the slaughter was committed by a woman, being forgot then by many strange signes & tokens. For in the court was heard a noise with much laughter. In the Theatre a great tumult and much wondring, when there was no man there, that either spake or mourned. Besides, in the ruins of the certain houses or buildinges were seene. The Image of the goddess Victoria in the Temple of Camulodunum (which is Spaldon in Essex as W. Camden writeth) turned her backe as though she had yielded to her enemies: the women ranne as mad here and there, saying, and singing, Destruction is at hand.

Finally, betwixt the Island and France, the Ocean sea appeared as it flowed with blood. The occasion of this warre was a confiscation of the Brytains goods, which being remitted by Claudius the Emperour, Decianus Catus then Procurator of the Isle, said that it ought to have bene reneued. To this cause was added, that whereas (against their wills Seneca had lent them fourty Sellenies upon great usurie) he now with great force and all kind of violence compelled them to pay all the whole summe at one payment, and also perswaded them to make warre on the Romans.

Bunduica of Brytaine, a woman of noble birth, not onely with much honour ruled amongst them, but also was the soueraine in their wars, and had in deed a stomacke more manly then womanlike: who having gotten together an army of 120000. men, got her upon her seat made of sparrow turnes, after the manner of the Romanes, and being a tall woman, of comely shape, and severe countenance, sharpe voice, with yellow haire hanging downe to her waistes (Ponticus Virinius saith to her thighs) she wore a great chaine of golde, and had on her backe a coate of sunbeile colours, and a platted kirtle. When she was thus apparelled, and had in her handes a great speare, she spake unto them to this effect.

Ponticus Virinius.

First she commended libertie, shewing them how povertie with libertie, was farre better then great riches in miserie and bondage: on the other side, with great eloquence she declared the mischiefs and calamities they suffered at the handes of the Romanes, who exacting Tributes of payments, so oppressed them, that much better it were once to die, then long to live in such extreme slaueage.

Secondly she reproved them, for not expelling their enemies, as their forefathers had done Julius Cæsar, Claudius and Galigula: And againe she prayed them for their present readines to helpe her, and recover their ancient state.

Thirdly, she disabled the Romanes, for that they were fewe, combred with armour, and so faint of courage, that they had rather fight a farre off, then encounter with them by hand strokes: she commended the Brytaines, to be more in number, of greater valour, and farre more able to abide hunger, cold, thirst, raine, winde, heat, &c. she added the vantage of the place, as being at home, where the woods and rivers, lakes, and all other things were well knowne to euerie one of them.

Lastly, she exhorted them to shew themselves as Dogs and wolues among fearefull Hares and Foxes: wherewithall, she let out of her lap a quicke Hare, thereby to learne the event of her enterprize. The Hare hauing a prosperous passage, all the multitude gaue a great shout, and Bunduica clapping her hands, gaue thanks to her Gods, that she ruled not the Romans, as did Nero, (who though he were a man, yet was in deed but a woman, for that he sang and plaied on the Harpe) but the Brytaines, who esteemed it better to be Martiours then sloughmen, who, as they had all things in common, so had they both wines and chylzen, and that hauing a kingdome amongst such a kinde of people, they paid their dutie aides against a spitefull and wicked kinde of men, if they were to be called men, who used hote bathes, vainty face, wine, ointments, lay in soft beds, and wore bassals to such a wanton spindestall as their Emperour Nero was.

What the Brytains were gient to.

Alceme of the Romanes.

Bunduica hauing spoken these and such like amongst her people, without her posse shee set forward against the Romanes, who at that time were without head or gouernor, for that Paulinus was gone with his armie into Anglesey, (as is before rehearsed,) which is an Island nere Brytaine, by meanes whereof Bunduica took two of their Cities, and committed the notable slaughter before remembred.

She exercised all kinde of crueltie on such men as she took. As for the noble women that shee gate, shee hanged them vp, and cut off their pappes, and selved them to their mouths: besides this, the stretching their bodies out at length, thrust sharpe stakes cleane through them: all which thinges were done in despiht, when they sacrificed and seaded in their Temples, but specially in the wood called Andates.

Paulinus, who had now subdued Anglesey, hearing of the foresaid slaughter, returned to Brytaine, yet would he not adventure the fortune of battaile with them, fearing their number, but when he wanted victuall, and that his enemies approached, he was compelled to abide the battell. Boudicca, who had in her army 230000. men, was her selfe placed in a Chariot, and ordered her men at length: but Paulinus could not stretch his companie so long, for that they were not of anie such number; but at length he divided his armie into three partes, so that at one time they might fight in sundry places, exhorting them not to be abashed at the multitude of their enemies, for both they and their fathers, had with lesse number atchieved greater matters, and gotten greater victories. Adding, that now was the time to plaie the men, to entoy that in quiet, which before their ancestors had won, and recover that which they had lost, or else to live for ever in miserie and shame. Againe, he shewed what crueltie their eyes had seene, by those barbarous people, to such as they had overcome, exhorting them in revenge thereof to fight manfully, and there was no doubt but the Gods (who were alwaies favourable to such as had suffered cruelty) would helpe them: and better it were to die fighting valiantly, then with reproch to be taken, and die in their enemies hands like dogges. Finally (saying he) whether we live or die, Brytaine shall be ours; for, though the other Romanes lose it, yet shall our bones continually keepe it. When he had thus spoken, the signe of the battell was given, and each part prepareth himselfe: the Brytains with great and strange noise, the Romanes in silence came so nere, that they might throwe their dartes to them: and perceiving their enemies to approach, with great violence, rushed in amongst them, and brake their array: but after being compassed with the multitude of their enemies, the battell wared doubtful. The light harnessed men began to smite each other, and those of heaunie armour together with the horsemen encountered, and the Roman Archers fought against the Brytish Chariots. They which fought with out breastplates, were slaine with Darts. This encounter was made in three severall places, and was fought with great courage on both sides. At the last the Romanes departed Conquerors, many were slaine in the battelle, and many were taken. Great numbers which escaped, prepared to fight againe, but in the meane space Boudicca died of a discaie which she had, and they mourned, and buried her verie honourably. After those that remained were easlie overcome and dispersed.

Tacitus saith, that Prasutagus King of the Iceni, a Prince of great wealth, appointed, that Caesar and his owne two daughters should inherit his lands, here by thinking all his life to be more quiet, and being deceived, his wife and daughter should be the more safer by means of such protection: but it fell out farre other wise, for the Centurions gat his Realme, their servants spoiled his house, beate his wife, and destroyed his daughters: besides, the chiefest men of his land were displaced of their inheritances, and handled extremelie. In revenge whereof Boudicca raised the warre, and committed the slaughter before remembred, and at last her armie once overthron by Paulinus, being afraid to fall into her enemies hands, she poisoned her selfe.

Policletus then a servaunt of Nero, was sent hither to surveie the state of Brytaine, who discharged Paulinus Suetonius of the government.

Petronius Turpilianus was sent into Brytaine as a man easie to be entreated, and being not altogether acquainted with offences of the enemies, was the readier to receive them to grace: who setting matters in their former stay, and attempting no further, delivred the Province unto Trebellius Maximus. Trebellius being both faint hearted and too sluggish, and also utterlie unacquainted with experimentes of armes, ruled the Province with a certain mildnes of government. Now had the barbarous people also learned to wincke at inticing bices, and the civill warres of the Romanes then happening, was a cloake to his cowardise: but there presentlie arose discord betwene Rofcius and Caelius, legates of the xx. legion, when the souldiours (accustomed to be employed in expeditions) gave the miselues to lasciviousnes: whereupon Trebellius tooke his flight, and hid his head, to avoide the furie of the armie, and in most base and beastly manner, governed (as it were) by entreatie, so as they might seeme to have compounded, that the souldiours should live in all liberty, and the Generall at his safetie. This time for a yere and halfe there was deably civill warre among the Romanes for the Empire, betwene Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

Vespasian Volanus, then was sent hither by Vitellius, he did not use ante discipline or correction in Brytaine, so as there continued the like slooth and cowardise in the souldiers, toward their enemies, and the Campe still as full of wantonnesse, saying that Volanus was a good and milde man, and thereby made himselfe belovued where he should have borne feare. In this time Vitellius advanced manie souldiours in the Brytaine legions, and Herdonius Flaccus brought unto him 80000. chosen men of warre out of Brytaine. The Brytaines seeing the Romanes thus emboldened with civill warre, began to trouble them, wherefore Volanus would send no succor to Vitellius at his commandement, when Vespasian warred against him for the Empire, and all the Brytaines favoured Vespasian.

When as (with the rest of the world) Vespasian had recovered Brytaine, then were there placed great Captaynes, and notable armies, the enemies hope abated, and Petilius Cerealis brought great feare upon the Brytaines. The Citie of the Brigantes (which was accounted one of the greatest of the land) being by him assailed, he hadde many encounters, and some not without slaughter, where by hee eyther conquered or assailed a great part of their Countrey.

Julius Frontinus, a man as worthy and ballant as was possible, toke then the charge upon him, and subdued the nation of the Silures, being both ballant and warlike, notwithstanding the valour of the enemy and difficulties of the places.

This was the state of Bypitain, and course of the wars, which Agricola found arriving in the middelt of Sommer, the souldiers euen then beginning to retire to their strengths, and the enimie searching for his most advantage.

The Citie of the Ordouices felwe daies before his arrivall almost wholly defeated a company lying upon their borders. This beginning stirred up the pprovince, serving for an example to them, who courted the warres, and yet desired to see what was in their newe Governour. Agricola, although the Sommer were now well spent, the bandes dispersed all about the pprovince, the souldiers had determined to rest for that yeere, the time being late and incummodious to commence the war, thinking it would be better to man the places most suspected: yet he determined neverthelesse to prevent daunger, and gathering together the Standardes of the Legions, with a felwe of his foraine aides, for that the Ordouices durst not take the felde, marched forth against them himselfe in the backward of his armie, that others might take like courage in the same danger, and put almost that whole nation to the sword: then following his good successe, hee invaded Anglesey, (which Suetonius had before attempted) causing certaine Bypitaines that served him, and kinctue the shal- lowes and manner of swimming, with hoise and harness to passe over into the Isle on a sodaine, wherewith the inhabitants were so amazed (who fearing no thing because they sawe no nautie) that they submitted the Isle unto him immediately. Now having some quietnesse, and perceiving that warre would little ppeuaile against the Bypitaines, if they were intirciously handled, he purposed to cut off all causes of quarrell, and first reforming his own familie, did nothing partially, onely respected the vertue of men, loosened tributes, and behaved himselfe most honourably. And thus much the first yeere.

When the Sommer began, he assembled his armes, trained his souldiers, foraged the enimies Countries with sodaine invasions to their great feare, and yet so favorably, as manie Countries willingly yielded unto him, and suffered Castles to be built among them. The Winter following he spent in civill administration, counselling the people privatelie, and helping them probably, to build houses, Temples, and Court houses. He procured noble mens children to study liberall Sciences, and then began the Bypitaines to conforme themselves to Romane fashions and attyre.

The third yeere he discovered people in the North hitherto unknown, euen as far as Tau, terrifying the people, and placing fortresses most wisely to the annoyance of the enimie.

The fourth Sommer he employed getting those Countries which hitherto hee had passed through, euen to Edenborough, Fritch, and Cluid, the narrowe space betwene the which waters he fortified.

The fifth yeere by Sea he discovered and vanquished further nations in the North, and placed garrisons in the coast toward Ireland, wherunto hee also aspired, and to that end retained an Irish Prince with him, that was driven out of his Countrey by civill dissention.

But in the Sommer which began the first yeere of his government, he feared the Spanens by a nautie for that purpose sent to the Sea, fearing least all those nations beyonde had united themselves and kept the passages by lande; but afterward he marched forward, his naucie coasting with his army by land, so as sometime in the same Campe, he had horsemen, footmen, and Seamen, lodged together. It was reported by such as were taken prisoners, that the sight of the naucie much astonished the Bypitaines as men from whom all refuge was cutte off, the secretes of their Seas being discovered: wherefore determining to trie it with hand blowes the inhabitantes of Calidonia with great preparation, although the report thereof were greater (as it often happens in unknown matters,) of their owne accorde, assailed some Castles, and seeing themselves rather to bee assailable then defendantes, put the Romanes in some doubt: whereupon the cowardes pretending pollicie, advised to retire on this side Bodotria, rather then to bee driven thereto by force, when as in the meane while, Agricola knowing that the enimie would charge him in severall troupes and companies, and fearing to bee overmatched and couped in with number, or deceived by the ignorance of the place, divided his army into three battels, and so marched forward: which order marked by his enemies, made them alter their purpose, and in the night killing the watch, brake in upon the ninth legion, halfe a slepe and halfe affrighted, which (as they took it) was the worstest, and so the fight continued within the Campe till it was day light, at which time the Romanes began to gather courage, and the Bypitains were discomfited, so as, had it not bin for the woods and bogges, that victorie had ended the whole strife, after which battell the Roman souldiers bewelme to be of haute courage, crying out to pierce the countrey of Calidonia, that they might finde out the uttermost postes and boundes of Bypitain. The Romanes on the other side, ascribing the praise of this victorie, not to the prowesse of the Roman souldier, but to Fortune and the willnesse of their Captaine, used all meanes possible, to hearten up and arme their youth, bestowing their wives and children in places of safegard, and by sacrifices and holy assemblies unite at their Cities together: upon these resolutions they remoured.

In the beginning of the next Sommer which was the sixth yeere of his charge, Agricola sending his fleet before him, which often put a land and spoiled the Countries, thereby causing a great and uncertaine feare: himselfe with a picked army, wherunto he added of the valiantest Bypitains, came to the mountaine Grampius, whereon his enemies had encamped, for the Bypitaines nothing quailed by the successe of the former encounter, and expecting nothing but a reuenge, or bondage, learning at length, that common danger is onelie to be resisted with common consent) by leagues and embassages had stirred up the mindes of all the Cities about. Nowe were there to be in armes thirtie thousand and upward, unto which number, the youth, and all such as were of strong and lustie yeeres, euerie man bearing his tokens of praise about him, continually repayed from all sides. When amongst many other Captains, Calgacus a man both in nobilitie and valor; about the rest, spake to the assembly in this manner: As often as I behold the causes of this warre and our necessity, my minde gluetly me great hope, that this day and your mutuall consent shall be the beginning of libertie to all Bypaine; for, every one of you hauing tried seruitude, and hauing no other land nor sea, which can saue vs (the Romanes naue being at our elbowed) the verie warre and weapons which are the honour of the worlde, must be the onlie safetie of the faint-hearted.

 With these and manie such reasons drawne from the calamitie of their future seruitude, the pride and tyrannie of their gouernors, the sickle friendship of the strangers seruing in their enemies campe, ready to change vpon any high occasion, and the present remedie of al misery, which, as he said in the beginning, was onely baliaunce, he so stirred vpon all mens minds, that they applauded his oration after their manner, with songs and diuers kind of noises. This oration being ended, as also Agricola his speech to his shouldours, the two armies beganne to encounter. Agricola placed his battails in this order: hee made his maine battaile of the strangers (his aides) which were in number viii. thousand, on each side whereof, for winges he placed his horsemen to the number of thre thousand, and his legions he caused to garde the trenches of his Campe, that if it were possible, the victorie might be gained without the shedding of Roman bloud, or if his main battaile were broken, they might be gathered againe, and the fight restored by his legions. The battaile of the Byptaines (to terrifie their enemies, as also to make their brauery thewe,) stood on higher ground, so as their forward being come vpon the plaine, the rest were on the fote of the hill, their Chariots, in the meane time gallopping vp and downe the fiele, making great howles and cries. Then Agricola perceiving the number of his enemies to bee greater then his owne, and fearing to bee charged both on the face and flanke of his battaile at one time, and that manie thought necessarie to haue the legions advanced forward, remained not withstanding firme in his first resolution, causing his battaile to bee somewhat drawne in length, himselfe alighted from his horse, and stood on fote before his forward. The first fight was with shotte of arrowes and darts, during which time, the Bypaines, both skillfull and couragious with their huge swords and small bucklers, either bare or broke the Romanes shotte, and answered them with an infinite number of the like, untill Agricola was perswaded by bands of Iollanders, and Zabanders, that the matter might be brought to swords and hand strokes, which kinde of fight they were acquainted withall, by long haunting the wars, and the same was verie incommo-dious for their enemies, bearing but small shields, and vnnecessurable swords: for the pointlesse swords of the Bypaines, were vsit for a throng, and where they wanted roue. Wherefore the Iollanders strake thicke together, and thrust them over the bucklers, wounding them in the faces, and hauing broken that battaile, passed forward towarde them which kept the hill, which fane by the rest of the Romanes bandes, they partly moued by cruell of the others glorie, and partly by heate of their owne courages, cutte in pieces those that they first encountred, leauing notwithstanding, some halfe dead, and others not touched, for haste to obtaine a perfect victorie. In the meane while, the troups of the Bypaine horsemen, did take their flight, but the Chariots put themselves pacement among the fote bandes, which kinde

at fight, (at first) seemed somewhat terrible to their enemies, but it long ser-ued not their turnes, being assailed with a thicke paele of their enemies, and the ground not commodious for the Chariots, nor their riders all of the best. So as at the last, their Chariot horses, coursing vp and downe the fiele without guiders, ouerranne many of their owne companie, as they fled for feare from one place to another. The Bypaines, which all this while kept the hill, and came not to the fight, making little reckoning of the small number of the Romanes, beganne by little and little to descend, intending to hemme them in, in the midst of their conquest, which surely they had done, if Agricola, suspecting the same, had not dispatched foure companes of horsemen (which he kept for all sodaines) to encounter with them, who, the more fiercely they assailed, so much the more sharply repulsed them, and sent them to flight:
 whereupon the deuice of the Bypaines turned to their owne harme. Where-after, by Agricola his commandement the winges of the horsemen were taken from the front of his battell, and were made to charge vpon the battell of his enemies, standing ouer-against them. Then might you behold in the open fiele, a grieuous and lamentable spectacle, some followed the chafe, some took prisoners, and after killed them to take others. Some the enemies as euerie one thought best, fledde, some in heapes and armed fled from a smaller number: other, though vnarmed, tarried and were slaine: eu-rie where late weapons, carcases, and limbs cut off, the ground all bloudie:
 sometime the banquetted appoaching neare to Woods, would make dead, and entrappe the hebeleste followers, so as, if Agricola had not caused certaine lustie bandes in the manner of a search, and also diuers horsemen, leauing their horse where the Woods were thicke, and other on horsebacke, where the Woods would suffer, to range them all about, there might haue bene some detriment receiued by too much hardinesse. But when the Bypaines saw themselves pursued in order of battaile, they took againe their flight, not in companie as before, nor tarrying one for another, but here and there, euery as men glad to escape, sought long and by waies. Flight and heauinesse of slaughter ended the chafe. There were slaine of the Bypaines about tenne thousand: of the Romane armie, thre hundred and fortye, among whom Aulus Aricus, Captaine of a bande, whome the beate of his youth, and courage of his horse brought into the hands of his enemies. That night the victors made merrie with the spoile, but the Bypaines wailing vp and downe, men and women lamenting together, wailed and fetcht away their hurt men, assembled together the whole, forsooke their houses, and for anger set fire on them, chafing themselves lurking places, which straight way quapled againe: sometime concealing good hope, which straightway quapled againe: and some were knownen to kill their wives and children, as though they had therein taken compassion vpon them. The next day made the victorie more manifest, in which there was nothing but silence, the hills being then forsaken, and also the holes smooking a farre off.

Agricola sending abroad his espialles, coulde finde no enemy to make head, wherefore Sommer being so farre spent to proceede any further in the warre,

warre, hee had his Souldiours into the coastes of the Horelli, and there taking hostages, called his name to coaste about Bytaine, which at last arrived at the Haven called Trutensis, afterwarde having bestowed his souldiours in their wintering places, departed Bytaine, and left the province in quiet to his succellour.

Simon boyne in Cana Galilee, who for his fervent affection to his Master, & great zeale he toke by all means to the Gospel, was surnamed Zelotes, he having received the holy Ghost from above, travailed through Egypt and Aethiopia, then through Paavitania and all Lybia, preaching the Gospel. And the same Doctrine he brought to the occidentall sea, and the Isles called Brytanie, &c. And in the third Booke the first Chapter, he saith. The holie Apostles (like as we have declared already) being dispersed throughout the whole earth, did divide the provinces amongst them by lot, to preach the Gospel in, Peter undoubtedly first at Jerusalem, then in Galatia, Bythinia, with the higher Asia, Cappadocia, and all Italie, taught the Gospel: John in Asia, who ended his life there: To Andrew fell the provinces on the coaste of Euxine, all Sephia, Byzans, Macedonia, and the firme land of Greece: Thomas amongst the Parthians, Indians, and the Ile of Taprobana did publish the Gospel: Another chose Egypt and Lybia: and ther the bittermost coastes of the Ocean, with the Isles of Bytaine, &c. Dorotheus writeth thus. Simon Zelotes passing through Paavitania, and Africa preached Christ, at length was crucified, slain and buried in Bytaine, or rather Bythania. Also he saith, Aristobulus, whom the Apostle to the Romans remembreth, was made a Bishop in Bytaine or Bythania. George Maior writeth in a preface, that immediatly after Christs resurrection under Claudius the Emperour, the light of the gospel was kindled in Bytaine by Ioseph of Arimathea that buried the body of Christ. Tertullian writting against the Jewes of those times, saith: The Bytaines inhabitants of places unknowen to the Romanes, yet did obey and were subiect to the kingdome of Christ. William of Malmesbury, in his booke of the antiquities of Glasseburie, alleageth Freculphus to write in his second booke and fourth Chapter, as followeth: Philip the Apostle, preaching the worde of God in Gaule (nowe called Fraunce) chose out xii. amongst his Disciples, whome hee sent into Bytaine to preach the worde of life, and upon cuerie one of them, he most devoutly stretched out his right hande: ouer these he appointed for chiefe, his deare friende Ioseph of Arimathea, that buried our Lord. These (saith John Capgrauce, who alleageth Melkin and Merlin) came into this lande the yere of Christs incarnation sicth thre, in the time of Arviragus who gave to them the Ile of Avalon, where they builded an Oratorie of wytten wodes, and after three were buried: which place being since encreased, and newly builded by diuers Princes, was named Glasseburie. For confirmation whereof, King Henry the second (as himselfe in his Charter affirmeth) having diligencie perused the Writalleges and Charters, which hee caused to be presented and read, not onely of William the first, of William the seconde, and Henry the first his Grandfather: but also the Charters of the Princes his predecessours, of moze ancient time, to wit, of Edgar, Edmond, Edward, Elfred, Bringwalthius, Kenethwin, Baldred, Ina, Arthur, & that noble man Cudred, & many other Christian Kings beside, also of Kenewalla, sometime a Heathen and Pagan King, concerning the house of Glasseburie found, that in some of those Charters it is called the Spother of Saintes, of some other, the Graue of the Saintes, and that the sayde place was first builded even by the vertie Disciples of Christ the infelices, and by them dedicated to our Lord, as the first place which hee chose to himselfe in this Realme: all which so to be the foresaid King Henry established by his Charter: which Charter my selfe have seene and read.

Marius sonne of Arviragus, an excellent wise man, was ordained King of Bytaine. At this season Rodrik King of the Pictes, (which were people of Scythia) accompanied with the Scots invaded Bytaine, and spoiled the country with sword & fire, against whom Marius with his knights assembled in a battell, & gave them sharpe battell, wherein Rodrik was slain, with a great number of his souldiours upon Scarnemore, in token of which victory, there was a stone not farre from Carlisle created, with this inscription, In token of Marius victorie. To them which remained Marius gave inhabitation in the further part of Scotland. And forsomuch as the Bytaines disdained to giue to them their daughters in marriage, they acquainted them with the Irishmen, and married their daughters, and grew in procelle of time to a great people. He repayed, walled, and fortified the citie of Caerlegion, now called Chester. He raygned liii. yeres.

two learned men in the Scriptures, with his loving letters to Elutherius Bishoppe of Rome, desiring him to send some devout and learned men, by whose instruction both he and his people might be taught the faith and Religion of Christ: whereof Elutherius being verie glad; baptized these two messengers, making Eluanus a Bishoppe, and Meduinus a teacher, and sent also with them into Brytaine two famous Clarke, Faganus and Denianus, by whose diligence Lucius and his people of Brytaine were baptized and instructed in the faith of Christ, Temples were made Cathedral Churches, and Bishops placed, where flames of fire had bene: at London, York, and Car-far after the common opinion, & writers of that time. True it is that till this date, there remaineth in Somersetsshire, in the Denerie of Dunfor, a parish Church, bearing the name of S. Denianus, as a Church either by him founded, or to him dedicated. To the confirmation thereof, the reuerend Beda writeth thus. In the yere 156. Marcus Aurelius Verus, the 14. Emperour after Augustus governed the Empire, with his brother Aurelius Commodus. In whose time Elutherius, a holie man being Pope of the Church of Rome, Lucius King of Brytaines wrote vnto him, desiring that by his commandement he might be made a Christian: which his request was granted him, whereby the Brytaines receiuing then the faith, kept it sound and vndecked in rest and peace, untill Dioclesian the Emperours time. Thus saith Beda of that matter, which maie suffice to proue the Christian faith, then to be receiued here, but Beda speaeth nothing of such an Epistle, sent by Elutherius to Lucius as some haue fattered vpon him, I onely find the same entered in a booke intituled, Con-

Epistle of Elutherius to Lucius King of Brytaine.
Lib. Const. Lon.

Palms, 45.

The yere after Christ byth 202. Pope Elutherius did write to Lucius king of Brytaine, for the amendment of the kings and the nobility of Brytain as followeth. You required that we should send you the Roman and Imperfall lawes, y you might be the in your kingdome of Brytain, but those lawes we may disproue, & not the lawes of God. You haue receiued lately through Gods goodnesse in your kingdome, the faith and law of Christ, you haue there in your kingdome both Testaments, out of them by Gods grace, and the aduice of your realme take a lawe, and thereby patiently gouerne the kingdome. You are the Vicar of God in your kingdome, according to the kingly Prophet. The earth is the Lordes, and his fullnesse is the whole world, and all that dwell therein: and againe, Whon hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquitie, wherefore God (euen thy God) hath appointed thee with the oyle of gladnesse above thy fellowes. They are the kings children, Christian nations, and people of your kingdome that liue and consist vnder your protection, peace, and kingdome according to the Scripture, as an hen gathereth her chickens vnder her wings, the people, and nations of the kingdome of Brytaine is yours, such as are diuisied you should gather them together to the lawe of Christ: his holy Church, to peace and concord: and cherish, maintaine, protect, gouerne, and defend them from the inuious, malicious and their enemies. What be to that kingdome, kingdome, the King thereof is a childe, and the Princes eate early in the morning. I doe not call a King a childe for his youth or minority, but for his follie, iniquitie, and madnesse, according to the kingly Prophet. The blood-Christie and deceitfull men shall not outliue halfe their daies. By eating we shall understand Gluttonie; by Gluttonie Lururie; by Lururie, all filth, vice, heednesse and mischiefe, according to King Salomon: Whosedome will not enter into a spitefull soule, nor inhabite in a bodie subiect to sinne. A King hath his name of gouerning, and not of his kingdome, so long you shall be a King, as you rule well, otherwisse, you shall not be so named, and lose that name, which God forbid. God graunt that you may so rule your Realme of Brytain, that you may reigne with him euerlastingly, whose Vicar you are in the saide kingdome. To whom with the father, &c.

There remaineth in the Church of Saint Peter vpon Cornhill at London, a Table, wherein is written, that Lucius founded the same Church to be an Archbishops see, and made it the Metropolitane and chiefe Church of his kingdome, which he endured the space of 400. yeres, vnto the coming of Saint Augustine.

The Archbishops names, I finde onely to be set downe by Iocelyn of Fur-

1 Thean (saith he) was the first Archbishop of London, in the time of Lucius, who builded the saide Church of S. Peter in a place called Cornhill in London, by the aide of Ciran, chiefe butler to King Lucius.

2 Eluanus was the second, and he builded a Librarie to the same Church adoptyng: and conuerted manie of the Prydes (learned men in the Pagans lawe) to the Christian faith.

to the iudgement of the learned: for I read of a Bishop of London (not before named) in the yere of Christ, 326. to be present at the second Councell holden at Arlas, in the time of Constantine the Great, who subscribed therunto in these wordes: Ex provincia Britania ciuitate Londinensi Restitutus Episcopus: as plainlie appeareth in the first Tome of the Councelles. He writeth not himselfe Archbishop, and therefore maketh that matter of Archbishops doubtful, or rather overthroweth that opinion.

Comodus after his father Antonius Philosophus succeeded in the Empire with most cruel tyrannie. In his time the Northern Brittaines burst in through the wall, forayed the Countrey, and slew the Romane General with his souldiers, wherefore Vlpus Marcellus was appointed here a carefull vigilant Capitaine: he sore annoyed the Brittaines, which were enemies to the Roman state, and purchasing enuie by his vertue, was shortly dismissed.

Lampridius
Dion.

Then Ceronnis who ruled all vnder Comodus, appointed certaine men of base estate to gouerne the Romane enemies here, wherewith the souldiers being grieved, sent 15000. chosen men out of their number to Rome, who accusing him before Comodus to compasse the Empire, for his sonne, was deliuered vnto them, who immediately mangled him and slew his wife with his two sonnes.

Lampridius.

Comodus then sent Holnius Pertinax into Brittain, and surnamed himselfe Brytanicus thereunto perswaded by flatterers, when the Brittaines were sore will affected toward him, that they would haue nominated some other Emperour against him, and namely Pertinax: but these tumults were appeased by the wisdom of Pertinax, to his great danger, for he was well nere slaine in tumult, and left among the dead, which insurp he after seuerally reuenged, and sued for his discharge, being after ward preferred to the Empire.

Ca. Iulianus.

Capitolinus.

Clodius Albinus was then sent thither by Comodus, who at the first so greatly esteemed of him, that he honored him with the title of a Caesar, which Clodius refused: but afterwards when a false rumor was dispersed, that Comodus was slaine, hee made an Oration to the legions of Brittain, impeaching the government of Emperours, and preferring the Senate, whereupon Comodus being sharped against him, sent Iunius Seuerus to rule here, and shortly after Comodus was slaine.

Pertinax then was chosen Emperour, and within iii. monethes was slaine through the perswasions of Didius Iulianus, who enjoyed the Empire two monethes, and the practise of Clodius Albinus, which then returned into Brittain, and (as it seemeth) recovered his former government.

194

Seuerus after the death of Pertinax was saluted Emperour: he immediately slew Didius Iulianus, and because he feared Clodius Albinus with his Brittain legions, he created him Caesar, and partaker of the Empire, and sent Heraclitus to gouerne this Isle: but after he had subdued Niger who also vsurped the Empire, he moved warre against Albinus, who passing hence into France with the Brittain armie, encountered with Seuerus neare Lions, and was there slaine. Henceforth Seuerus quietly enjoyed the Romane Empire, and made sharpe warres into the Gaillie partes of the world, with great glorie.

But returning to Rome, he undertook of a war raised in Brittain. Wherefore he passed thither with his two sonnes Bassianus and Geta: at his arrivall peace was offered, which he refused, and leaving his yonger sonne Geta to gouerne the prouince, (being the thither part of the Isle) he with Bassianus his eldest sonne entered into the North, & passed the further part of this Island with out any resistance: yet by ambushes, difficultie of the waie, and other inconueniencies, iniences, he lost 50000. men, and then returned, enforced the enemies to conclude a league, and yeld some part of their Countrey.

At conclusion of which league, when hee and his sonne rid to treat with the Caledonians: Northern Brittaines, Bassianus his sonne drawing his sword in the sight of the enemy, was ready to haue slaine him, and had done it, had not some of the companie made an outcry: yet this fault was remitted.

After this league, the Brittaines of the North resorted to the Emperours Court, where Iulia Seuerus wife, objected to a woman of Brittain, the wife of Argentorix the Caledonian, that the Brittain women accompanied with men dishonestly: yea quoth the Brittain woman, wee satisfie the natural lust in better sort then you Romanes, for wee accompanie our selues openly with the best men, and you commit adulterie closely with the most vile persons. But after this league there was a generall reuolt of the Brittaines against the Romanes, which yet was pacified with great slaughter, and then hee built a wall of turfe, to inhibit the Northern Brittaines, from whence when hee returned, at the next lodging, a blacke Spyke that serued him, a notable scoffer, met him with a Crowne of Cypres: he moved with the colour of the man, and the Cypres (which was then used at all burials), as with signes of euill lucke, commanded the man to be sent awaie, wherewith he cried: Thou hast bene all in all, and hast vanquished all, and now of a Conqueror be thou a God. Then comming to the Citie of Poike (as is supposed,) he was by mistaking brought to the Temple of Bellona: blacke beafts also being ordained for sacrifice, folloved him home to his pallace: which things these did then account to be ominous.

Shortly after he departed out of this life at Poike, partly through sickness, and partly through griefe conceiued of his sonnes euill demeanour. At his last gaspe he uttered these wordes: I found the state troublesome euerie where, and leaue it quiet euen vnto the Brittaines.

Herodian witeth that in these warres of Seuerus against the North Brittaines, he found their Countrey full of watery Marshes: by those Marshes did the Brittaines swim and skirmish with their enemies, being couered with water by vnto the ghaull, not caring that men sawe the pynle parts of their naked bodies. Neither did they knowe the vse of apparell, but accustomed to compasse their bellies and necks onlie with yron, which they esteemed an ornament and token of riches, as other barbarous people supposed of Golde. They painted their bodies with diuers pictures and formes of beafts, and therefore wore no garment, least the painting should be hidden, being a nation very valiant, and warlike, grædie of slaughter, and content onely with a small target, a speare, and a chain hanging by their naked sides, ignorant of the vse of shirts of malle and helmets, for they reckned the same comberous vnto them, when they should swimme ouer the lakes, &c.

A grievous disease came vpon Seuerus, being sore appalled with age, so that he was constrained to keepe his chamber and send Antonius vnto the warres: but Antonie not regarding the business of Brittain, endeouored by all means he coude, to win the hearts of the souldiers vnto him, deprauing his brother, to the intent they should onely aide him to the attaining of the Soueraignty. The long maladie of his father, caused him to perswade Physicians to rid the old man out of the world, untill that Seuerus, being consumed, ended his life, who was the most famous of all Emperours in warlike affaires: for none other had obtained so manie victories and conquests, either still against his aduersaries, or forraigne against the barbarous nations. Thus deceased hee, after hee had gouerned the Empire the space of thirtie yeres, leaving his sons for successors in the same: vnto whome he lefte also great abundance of riches, as none of his predecessours had before him done. When Antony had gotten the supreme authoritie, he put to death the Physicians, because they obeyed not his commandement in hastning his fathers death: and seldoe all his owne and his brothers bringers vp and instructors, for that they went about to reconcile them, leaving none alive, that was either of dignitie, or had reuerenced his father. The Captaines of the armie hee enticed, to perswade the souldiours to proclaim him onely Emperour: imagining dalle manifold mischiefs against his brother: but hee could not win the souldiours good willes. Wherefore Antony, hauing taken truce with the Egyptians, remoued towards his mother and brother. Their mother laboured to bring them to agreement, wherein also many prudent counsellours earnestly traueled, Antony thereby was induced, rather of force, then god will, to counterfaite loue. After which done, the two brethren gouerning the Empire with equall honour, launched out of Egyptaine, and sailed with the reliques of their father toward Rome. For when they had burned the bodie (as was the custome of the Romanes) they carried the ashes, intermixed with pleasant odours, in a Vase of Alabastrer to Rome, that it might be there interred amongst the monuments of other Princes. Themselves led thus their armie, as conquerours of Egyptaine, and passed ouer the Ocean vnto the next coast of France, and so hasted towards Rome. When they were entered into Rome, all the people crowned with Laurel, receiued, and the Senate welcommed them. For most roade the Emperours themselves, clothed in Imperiall purple, And next vnto them followed the Corsars bearing the bestell with Seuerus reliques. Which bestell, the people, after they had saluted the new Emperour, did reuerently worship. The Emperours and Consuls being thus accompanied with Princely pompe, carried the same into the Temple, where the diuine monuments of Marcus, and other Emperours are seene. After they had finished the solemne sacrifice, and according to the ancient vsage, celebrated the funerals ceremonies, both the brethren departed into the Imperiall pallace: which they deuided betwene them, closed vp all backe doores, and shutt out the seruants, and met together onely at the outer gates. They chose besides either of them vnto himselfe a hundrie garde, and neuer came together buttles it went sometime for a little while to be seene of the people. Nevertheless, first of all, they accomplished the due Funerals of their father. For the Romans accustome to consecrate with immortallitie, such Emperours, as at their death, leave either children, or successors in the Empire behinde them. And those which are endued with that honour, they canonize amongst the Gods. There is through the Citie, a certaine dolefull lamentation, mixed with fearefull loie. And they use to interre the dead corpes verie sumptuously. But then, they haue an Image, made as like the dead Emperour, as may be. The same, within the porch of the Imperiall Pallace, they laie in a great and high bedde of fustie, covered ouer with cloth of golde. The same Image looketh verie pale, like a diseased patient. About the bed on either side, a great part of the daie, do certaine persons sit: that is to wit, on the left side, the Senate, clothed in blacke garments: and on the right side, many matrons. None of these are seene to weare any clothes, or chaines of gold, but being clad with thin white bestines, they shewe the countenance of mourners. And thus doe they continue the space of 7 daies: during the which, euery day the Emperours Physicians do repaite vnto the bedde, and, as though they had felt the patients pulses, declare that hee is more sicke then before. Finally, when it seemeth that hee is deceased, certaine of the most noble and worthy young men, of the orders of knights and Senators, doe take vp the bedde on their shoulders, and carrie it through the streete, called Sacra via, vnto the olde market place, where the Romane Magistrates are accustomed to render vp their offices. There on both sides, are certaine stages made with steps, vpon the which, on the one side, is a quire of voices, being noble mens sonnes; and on the other side are many beautiful women, singing hymnes and ballades, in praise of the dead Emperour, measured with diuers lamentable verses. When these are finished, the young men doe take vp the bed againe, and beare it out of the Citie, into the field called Campus Martius, in the broadest part thereof, there is created a Tombre foure square, with sides of equall height builded of great tymbre, like vnto a Tabernacle. The same within forth, is filled with dyie chippes and reedes: and on the outer side, it is hanged with Arras clothes of golde, and decked with Images of Iuorie, and sundrie painted pictures. Within it also, is an other lesse Towre, but like in forme, with doores and portalles opened. And ouer that, the third and fourth, with manie other raunces ascending continually, untill they reach vnto the highest, which is lesse then all the other. A man may compare this building vnto Towres, which are set in Heauens with fire on the toppes, to direct shippes which saile by night on the Seas, into their perked portes. The same are commonlie called Phari. Now when they haue put the bed in the second Tabernacle, they gather al kinds of spices and perfumes, with diuers odoriferous fruites, beeries and sugres, the which they throwe on heapes in the tabernacle. Neither is there anye Nation, Citie, or person, which excelleth in honour or dignitie, but at that time will to the uttermost of his power, most honourably celebrate the last funerallies of the Emperour.

When they haue couched a great heape of spices together, and stuffed the building therewith, all the Roman knights do ride about the Towre, with a stiff course and order to and fro: Chariots are also drawne about, wherein many do sit clothed in purple, representing the persons of al noble men being magistrates and captaines of Rome.

The ceremonies being thoroughly ended, the successor in the Empire, taketh

a hand of fire in his hand, and firely therein the tabernacle. After whome, all other that are present, do throwe fire likewise into the same. And immediately, all the building being filled with those fyre sticks and spices, beginneth to burne vehemently. Then out of the highest and least towre, as out of a high steeple, is let forth an Eagle, the which they beleue, doth beare the Emperours soule into heauen. And from thenceforth is that Emperour worshipped as the other gods.

From this time to the raigne of Dioclesian, for the space of 72. yeeres, there is nothing recorded in our histories hitherto published concerning Bytaine; but whereas it is manifest that the soueraintie of Bytaine rested in the Romaine Emperours all that space, I will set them here downe successiuelly.

After Seuerus, Balsianus surnamed Antonius Carracalla, murdering his brother Gera, succeeded in the Empire. He was cruell to his people: hee founded the Bath in Rome, which is called Antonians: he was out of measure giuen to sensualitye, and carnall concupiscence, in so much, that he espoused his mother in law Iuba. He was murdered by Marcialis when he had gouerned six yeeres.

Antoninus Heliogabalus thre yeeres.

223 Alexander Seuerus, who was slaine by his souldiers here in Bytaine, in a battle called Sicila, but other say in France, thirtie yeeres.

238 M. Antonius Gordianus one yeere.

239 Antonius Gordianus the sonne six yeeres.

245 Julius Philippus the first christian Emperour: siue yeeres.

250 Decius two yeeres.

252 Trebonianus Gallus, and Vibius Hostilianus two yeeres.

252 Julius Aemilianus foure moneths.

254 { Licinius Valerianus six.

{ Licinius Gallicinus fiftene.

At this time there arose in diuers countries shertie vsurpers, which are called, the thirtie tyrants, of the which Lollianus Posthumus, Victorianus Tetricus, as it is supposed, kept Bytaine from Gallicinus.

269 Flavius Claudius two.

Aurelianus siue.

276 Tacitus six moneths.

Florianus thre moneths.

277 Aurelius Probus siue yeeres. In which time Bonesus a Bytaine borne, but brought vp in Spaine, fearing lest he should be executed because the Germans had burnt certaine vessels in the Rhene, wherof he had charge, vsurped the Empire with Proculus at Colen, & would haue exempted from the Romanes, Bytaine, Spaine, & part of France, but being banquished by Probus in a long and sore battaile, he strangled himselfe. Some sedition was then raised in Bytaine and appeased by Victorinus, a Monke, by whose motion Probus had made him Regerit of Bytaine, which was cause of this trouble. This Probus permitted the Bytains and others that they might haue wines and make wine. After he had raigned siue yeeres, he was slaine of the souldiours.

Carus was created Augustus, hee made Carinus and Numerianus his sonnes. Carus, to which Carinus he assigned Bytaine, Gaule, Illyricum, Italie, and Spaine, but Carus was slaine by lightning, and the other two within thre yeeres space lost their liues.

Dioclesian was then chosen Emperour, who adioined Maximianus into him in like gouernement.

Carauus was appointed to bee admirall of the Bytaine seas, which were sore troubled by the pirates of the Frankes and Saxons: but when he had oftentimes apprehended the pirates, and neither reserved the prizes, or was accountable for it, neither to the Emperours, nor their deputies, it was suspected, he of set purpose hee permitted those roners to haue recourse through those seas, to the end hee might rife them, and enrich himselfe. Maximianus therefore sent part of his armie to suppress him, in which were manie of the Thebane legion, who in this iourney were slaine by his commandement, and made Sparticus, because they professed Christ. Carauus understanding of the preparation made against him, passed out of Gaule into Bytaine, where bying the countrey to his obedience, he blurred the roabe of an Emperour: whereupon they which were sent to surprize him, returned to Maximianus, who then was incumbered with newe warre in Gaule. In the meane time Carauus built shippes in Bytaine, intercepted certaine companies of souldiours, assembled a great number of barbarous people with spoyle, with hope of whome he purposed to trouble the sea coasts of Gallia and Spaine. Holland also (then holden by certaine Frankes) revolted to Carauus.

Then purposed Maximianus the second time to make warre against Carauus, but by stormy weather, and want of Pilotes, he was enforced to defer his purpose. Shortly after, the two Emperours elected two Cafars, Valerius Maximus, and Constantius Chlorus, to which Constantius they committed the recovery of Bytaine. He immediately passing through Gaule hitherward, so donly surprisid Gesloriacum (now called Bullcin) which Carauus had manned, and so stopped the haueu, that it could stand Carauus in no steade. Then building shippes to passe ouer hither, hee first assailed iuchelle the Hollanders, which had revolted to Carauus, and then slaying for conuenient winde, hee hoouered a while on the sea coast, and in the meane time Carauus was traittously slaine by Alecdus his familiar friend.

Alecdus then vsurped the empire here in Bytaine, against whom Constantine with his former preparation made ready for warre, and launched out in haste, though the wind was contrarie: which when his souldiers understood, they set out also with side winds out of the same and other portes, in such foggy and misty weather, that they passed by Alecdus naue, then hoouering about the Ile of Wight, the one not seeing the other. The Romanes as soone as they landed burnt their shippes, determining eyther to winne, or lose their liues. Which when Alecdus understood, hee left the shore, and prepared himselfe for battaile with his mercenarie barbarous souldiours, in which he was name by Asclepiodatus Lord great master of the Emperours house. In this sight none of the Romanes perished, but here all the field was overspread with dead bodies of the enimies, among whom lay Alecctus himselfe without anie Emperfall ornaments, and scantlie knowne. Other Romanie souldiours also which had lost their company in the mist, arrived at London, nowe in the Citie a great number of barbarous people which escaped from the bat taile, and purposed to have sacked London. Then when Constantius came a land, the Brytaines with their wives & children flockt unto him, and submitted themselves to his rule, being nowe deliuered out of a long thraldome. This expedition of Constantius into Brytaine is ascribed by some to Maximianus, into which error, a false inscription of the Panegyriks hath led them.

Asclepiodatus hauing recovered Brytaine, as is before touched, he beleide the Citie of London with a strong siege (saith Geoffrey Monmouth) and ere it were long by knightlie force and violence, entred the Citie, and slew the Romanes Captain named Linius Gallus, nere unto a brooke there at that time running, into the which brooke he threw him, by reason whereof it is called in Brytish Nant Gallon, since in the Saxon tongue Gallus or Wallus brooke, and to this day the strate where sometime the brooke ran, is called Wallbrooke. The Romanie Historics speake nothing of this Gallus, but of Galerius, which was loined in the empire with Constantius, after the decease of Asclepiodatus, also of the Brytish king Coill, as that he shewed in place conuenient. True it is I grant, that a certaine brooke, dyined, I knowe not from what brads, but much encreased by the moishly groundes, without the Citie of London on the south side, passed through the same Citie southward to the riuer of Thames. And therefore of coming through and from the wall, and so through the Citie, was since called Wallbrooke: which brooke in olde time had in diuers places, Bridges ouer it, as appeareth by inquisition made in Anno. 1300. Elius Russell being apato; of London, William Iordane, and I. de Beuer then spauillers of those Bridges founde, who were bound to repaire them so oft as needed, and then was the same brooke vaulted ouer with byck, as it now remaineth.

Coill, after Asclepiodatus, (as saith Geoffrey) tooke on him the kingdome of Brytaine: Peter de Icham saith this Coill was Duke of Caltre Clote, or Gloucester. But to returne to the Romanes: who had now recovered Brytaine within ten yeres after Carausius first toke it. Dioclesian (saith Eusebius) persecuted the Church of God. In the thirtieth yere of his raigne, hee beganne to ouerthrowe the Churches downe to the grounde, yea, and the very foundations were digged vp, the holie and sacred Scriptures burned to ashes in the open market place, the Pastors of the Church were persecuted. When he had raigned together with Maximianus, who persecuted with him xx. yeres, he depozed himselfe voluntarily, and liued a priuate life. From that time to his end he pined away with diseases: but Maximian hanged himselfe.

Of this persecution, Bede hath thus: Dioclesian in the East, and Maximianus in the West, raised the tenth persecution, after Nero, against the Christians, he commaunded the Churches to be spoiled, the Christians to be tormented ted and killed. Which persecution was both longer, and also crueller then all the other: for whole tenne yeres together it continued in burning the Churches, in banishing the innocents, in murdering the Martyres, and neuer ceased. Besides, among other places, it made Brytaine to bee honoured with the glory of manie holie Martyres, which constantly stode and dyed in the confession of their faith. Among other suffered S. Albane, of whose Fortunatus Poets in the booke he wrote in the praise of Virginitie, speaking of the Martyres, which from all the coasts of the world came unto God, saith:

The Martyrdom of Alban and other in Brytaine.

The fertile land of barfull Brytannie

S. Alban for professing Christ, being led from the Citie of Verolanium, unto Holmehurst, since called Derswold wood, where now the Towne of S. Albans is builded, suffered martirdome in the yere of Christ 297. who is specified to be the first Martyr of Brytaine: and thosly after to the number of one thousand Christians were martyred at Lichfield, where Amphabele Minister of Alban was taken, brought to Verolanium, and there tormented, by sitting by his belly, whipping him about a stake, winding his bowelles out of his body, and stoning him to death. The life and martyrdome of these two, to wit, of Alban and Amphabele was recorded and written in Latine at large, by one, who wrote himselfe by none other name, then, of all wretches the simplest man: since by Mathew Paris, a sponke of S. Albane, turned out of Latine prose into French verse, both which Bookes I haue seene, and was since translated out of the Latine and French, into English metre by Iohn Lydgate sponke of Burie.

Constantine beganne his Empire with Galerius, the Empire was diuided betwene them: so that Constantius shoulde possesse Africa, Italie, France and Brytaine: Galerius shoulde haue Illyria, Asia, and the East parts: which done, they substituted under them two Cæsars. Constantius holding himselfe content with the dignitie of Augustus, refused to susteine the trouble which he shoulde haue endured through the administration of the affaires of Italy and Asike: he sought by all meanes howe hee might enrich the people of the Empire. He abolished the superstition of the Gentiles in his dominions, so that afterward Brytaine felt no persecutions. The yere following he passed out of France thither against the Vices, at which time his sonne Constantine, who then serued Galerius, perceiuing his destruction to be compassed, posted to his father in all haste, houghing and killing all the post hoyses, which way heere he passed, that he might not be pursued, and came to his father the very houre that he went a boorde to come into Brytaine: but Constantius as soone as hee came to Wyke, was ainslie sickened, and perceiuing his day to draw neere, when he was asked to whom he would leaue the Empire, answered, to Constantine, and thosly after departed.

This Constantine begot Constantine on Helena his wyf, daughter of Dripodas in Bythinia, as he was passing through Countrey, being one of the Romanie legates, sent into East parts: Constantine was created Emperour in France.

Constantine surnamed the Great, sonne of Constantius boyme in Bithynia by Helena, the Emperour (saith William of Malmebury) first consecrated, as is aforesaid: his father being now dead, did with so great sorrow, and shedding of teares solemnize his battall, that the souldiers hoping he would resemble his father, saluted him Emperour at Poreike against his will: but at Rome Maxentius the sonne of Maximianus Hercules, is chosen of the Christian souldiers, not to gouerne the Empire, but rather to practise tyrannie.

Maximianus being chiefe Emperour, after he had crowned Emperour Licinius, (by originall a Dane, his ould fellow souldier and familiar friend) departed himselfe rather a tyrant then an Emperour, abusing the spouses of noble personages, slaying manie with the sword, and putting in vye other such like practises.

Constantine the Emperour, being certified hereof, deuided with himselfe which waies possible he might ridde the Romanes from vnder this grieuous yoke of seruitude, and dispatch the tyrant out of this life: Deliberating thus with himselfe, he foresaw also what God he were best to call vpon for aide to wage battaile with the aduersarie. He remembred how that Dioclesian, which wholy dedicated himselfe vnto the seruice of the heathenish Gods, preuailed nothing thereby: also he perswaded himselfe for certaine, by his father Constantius, who renounced the Idolatrie of the Gentiles led a more fortunate life, musing thus doubtfully with himselfe, and taking his iourney with his souldiers, he beheld whither, a certaine vision appeared vnto him, as it was strange to behold, so in deepe incredible to be spoken of. About none, the daie somewhat declining, he saw in the skie, a lightsome Pillar in forme of a Crosse, where in these wordes were ingrauen: In this ouercome. The which vision so amazed the Emperour, that he mistrusting his owne sight, demanded of them that were present, whether they perceiued the vision: which when all with one consent had affirmed, the wauering mind of the Emperour was settled, with this beuine and wonderfull sight. The night following in his sleepe, hee saw Christ, which saith thus vnto him: I frame vnto thy selfe the forme of a Crosse after the example of the signe which appeared vnto thee, and beare the same against the enemies, as a fit banner or token of victorie: He being fully perswaded with this oracle, commandeth the victorious signe of the Crosse (which as yet is reserved in the pallace of the Emperour) to be made, and therewith proceedeth forwards with great courage, and ioyning with the enemy, fight ouer against Rome, about the bylge commonlie called Bulbia, hee got the victorie, for Maxentius being dyed in the river died: it was the seauenth yere of his raigne, when he ouercame Maxentius. After these thinges, when as Licinius his fellow Emperour, and his brother in lawe, hauing married his sister Constantia, led his life in the East: Constantine enioying ample benesites receiued at the handes of God, shewed himselfe gratefull in offering of thanks and praises vnto the author of all goodnes, his practises were these. To deliuer the Christians from persecution: to call againe perilled vnto their native stile: to set at libertie such as were in prison: to reuoe againe the goods of the confiscated, to build againe the Churches that were ouerthrowne: all which which thinges he accomplished with great promptnesse of minde. But Licinius persecuting the Christians, Constantine waged battaile against him, meeting oft by Sea and land, in the end, at Chisopolis a Citie of Bithynia, to witte at the haue of Chalcedon, Licinius was overcome, and yeldeth himselfe to Constantine.

After hee had repelled the ciuill warres, vanquished the Gothes in manie places, and woon great memorie among the Barbarians, he placed the Bypatines that had done him so good seruice, in a part of France towards the weste of the Ocean, hee applied himselfe wholy to the studie of the liberall Artes. He summoned the Sicene Councell, which was helde at Alica, a Citie of Bithynia, for the debating of the controuersie about the feast of Easter, and the rotting out of the heresie of Arius. Which Councell being ended, he liued in great tranquillitie and turned himselfe wholy to the building of Churches, as well in other Citie as in that Citie which he called after his owne name, Constantinople. In this Citie he created from the foundation two Churches calling the one of Peace, the other of the Apostles.

Helena the Emperours mother (which of the village Drepane made a Citie, the which afterwards the Emperour called Helenopolis) toke her iourne to Jerusalem, which when she found lying waste in a heape of stones, she searched diligently for the Sepulture of Christ, and at length she found it, but with great difficultie: for as they which embraced the faith of Christ, highly esteemed of that Sepulchre and monument after his passion: so such as abhorred Christian Religion, heaped in that place much earth, and raised great hillocks, and builded there the Temple of Venus, and set by her Idoll. But when the Emperours mother was made priuie therunto, she threw downe the Idoll: caused the great heape of earth to be hurled downe, where vnder theee found thre Crosse in the grane, one vpon the which Christ suffered: other two, where on the two theenes ended their liues, together with the table of Pilate, where in he had written that Christ was crucified king of the Iewes: the Emperours mother builded ouer the Sepulchre a gorgeous Church, calling it New Jerusalem, right ouer against that olde and waste Jerusalem. She builded a second Church nothing inferiour to the first, at Jerusalem in the hollo rocke, where Christ was boyme. Also the third, vpon the mount, where Christ ascended vnto the Father, manie things he gaue to Churches, and to poore people, the liued goodlie and religiously, and departed this life being fourescore yeres olde: her bodie was buried at Constantinople. Symon of Durham writeth, that thre builded walles about the Citie of London, and the Citie of Colchester.

About this time Octavius, whome Constantine had left gouernour in Bypatine, rebelled against whome Constantine sent Traherne with a legion of Romans, who (after diuers conflices) was slaine: Gracianus surnamed Funarius was at that time gouernour of the Roman legion in Bypatine.

Constantine at the age of 65. yeres died, and was buried at Constantinople, he left behinde him thre sonnes, to wit Constantinus, Constance, and Constantius, to succede him in the Empire.

Constantinus.

337 Constantinus beganne his Empire and raigne over Byptaine: with him his father Constantine had appointed by his last will, that his two brethren Constant and Constantius should participate and haue their portion of the Empire, but not long after, when Constantius attempted warre against his brother at Aquileia, and demanded himselfe vnadvisedly therein, he was slaine, and then was the Empire reduced under the gouernment of the two brethren onlie.

340 Constant then ruled Byptaine, which he administered with great iustice: but after, when he failed of his health, he associated vnto him in stead of friends, euill disposed persons to assist him, through whose euill counsell he declined to horrible vices, by meane whereof, wearing scant tolerable of the inhabitants of the provinces, he was slaine by Magnentius, who usurped the Empire in France, Spaine and Byptaine.

353 Constantius then had the regiment of Byptaine, who sent thither a Spaniard called Paul, a doctor by profession, to bring out certaine men of war which had conspired with Magnentius: but he vpon false promises greediously molested the guiltlesse, fettering and manacling whome he pleased. Where vpon Martinus then lieutenant in Byptaine, being moued with compassion, desired him to forbeare the harmlesse: but he was so rigorous, that he also charged Martinus himselfe of conspiracie with Magnentius, and was earnest to bring him before the Emperour: whereupon Martinus drawing his sword, smote at him, and because he could not slay him, he sodainly slewe himselfe, and this Paul embryued with blood, haled a great company (linked in chaines) to the Emperours presence, which were either banished, executed, or attainted.

Constantius after this appointed Iulianus to gouerne Gaule, at which time great spoile was made in Byptaine by the Scottes and Pictes, wherefore Iulianus busied with warre against the Almaines, sent Lucinius thither with an army, in whose absence Iulianus usurped the Empire: whereof when Constantius heard, he returned from the war (against the Parthians) against Iulianus, and died in the way.

362 Iulianus (called the Apostata) began his raigne over Byptaine and the Empire, a man sene passing wel in the Liberal Sciences, but an earnest aduocacie of Christian religion: he banished Palladius a great and honorable person into Byptaine vpon a supposition: he sent Alipius who had bene a lieutenant of Byptaine to repaire Jerusalem, but terrible flashes of fire (smaing out of the earth, when they laide the foundations, enforced them to leaue their purpose. This Iulian with great preparations made warre vpon the Parthians, he spyled Asiria, and returning from thence a Conquerour, he was slaine by his enemies, as he pleased vnadvisedly into the battels. After him succeeded in the Empire Iouinian, and held it nine moneths.

365 Valentinian was then chosen Emperour by the souldiours, The Pictes, Scots, Attacotes, and Saxons, greediously molested the Byptaiues. Ne Aradius who had the charge of the sea coast here, was slaine by them, and Buchobandes a great captaine was enclosed by them: wherefore after diuers captaines taines Theodosius was sent thither, who discomfiting the enemy, and recovering the spoile, entred triumphantlie into London, and the next yeres went into the north, suppressed the enemies, recovered the province, and repaired Cities & fortresses: he oppressed Valentinian an Hungarian, who being banished thither, practised new tumultes, deliuering him to Dulcius to be executed, without any enquire of his confederates, because hee would not renewe the tumulte: which done he returned to Rome. Shortly after Valentinian sent thither Praemarius (which he before had obtained King of the Boccenobants in Germany) to be apparthall of the Almaines which serued in Byptaine. And not long after Valentinian died.

Gratian with his brother Valentinian was then created Emperour. Hee to the intent he might better repaire the decayed state of the Empire, made Theodosius a copartner with him in it.

Maximus a valiant and worthy man, was shortly after forced here in Byptaine to take the Empire vpon him, who passed into France, and immediately at the German legions and Roman souldiours recruited vnto him from Gratian, so that he being destitute of men of warre, fled to Lions, where he was slaine by treason: for Maximus gaue out that Gratians wife was coming to her husband, which Gratian entreated louing his wife, lightly credited, and therefore accompanied with a few, went forth to meete her: but in the coach where he supposed to haue founde his wife, was Andragacius a desperate man, who leaping out of the coach killed Gratian.

Then Maximus created his sonne Victor a Caesar, and vsed some crueltie against Gratians Captaines. Valentinian being herewith terrified, sent Ambrose vnto him to treat a peace, which he accepted, and Theodosius permitted him to vse the title of Augustus. Then he settled himselfe at Trier in Germany, empowered the Countreies round about him, executed certain heceties called Willianis, and then entred into Italy, breaking the peace, & thought to haue intercepted Valentinian, but he with his mother fled to Theodosius, and perswaded him to take reuenge of Maximus. In the meane time Maximus came to Aquileia, all Italic and Africa submitted themselves vnto him, when suddenly Theodosius coming from Constantinople, moued warre against him, corrupted his souldiours with byzbes, and after one or two skirmishes enforced Maximus to flee to Aquileia, where his owne souldiours deliuered him to Theodosius, by whose commandement he was shortly after beheaded. Andragacius also who kept the seas, vnderstanding this, dyed himselfe, and Victor the sonne of Maximus was slaine in France by Arbogustes. The Byptaiues which serued him returned into France, and soiled them in the country there, which is now called Byptaine, so was Byptaine recovered againe to the Roman Empire.

So Virgilia with the 11000. virgins, which were sent into Byptaine to bee married to Canon and his knights, were slaine and martired of the barbarous people being on the sea. But, as some write, by Aelia King of the Huns.

Honorius the sonne of Theodosius succeeded in the Empire. In whose time Pelagius a Byptaine boyme, disparckled the denome of his faithlesse doctrine.

doctrine berle farre abroad, holding, that a man might line well without the helpe of the grace of God: Using herein the aide of Iulianus of Campania, who was intemperatly stirred with the losse of his bishopricke, to whom S. Austen and other fathers also haue answered in most ample maner, but yet they would not be amended thereby, but being conuicted of their fallshode, they rather would encrease it by defending and maintaining it, then amende it by returning to the truth.

This time Marcus was chosen Emperour by the souldiers in Brytaine, fearing the inuasion of the Vandales, but immediatly they slew him, and elected Gratianus, whom also they murdered within foure moneths.

Then Constantine, a souldier of base estate, onely upon confidence of his name, was elected here Emperour, who passing hence into France, with all the youth of Brytain, got al the men of warre there to take part with him. Honorius sent therefore Sarnus to withstand him, who in a foughten field slew Iulianian Constantines Captaine, and so pursued Constantine, that he made him take Valencia, wherein he sharply besieged him, untill Gerontius with his Brytaines, and Edebrichus with the Franks raised the siege.

Then Constantine fortified the Alpes and Rhene with garrisons, sent Constantians his sonne (whom of a sponke hee had made a Caesar) with a great armie into Spaine, where he toke, and afterward slew certaine noble personages allied to Honorius, and returning to his father, left Gerontius to governe Spaine. Constantine himselfe then craued pardon of Honorius for usurping the Empire, saying, that he did it by compulsion, which when Honorius heard, he so well liked of him, that he sent an Imperiall robe vnto him.

In these troubles Brytaine was greatly endangered by Picts and Scots, and sued to Honorius for succour, but he sending them onely Letters, willed them to looke to their owne state. Shortly after Constant, that was sponke, was slaine by Gerontius his owne Captaine, at Menna in France: and Constantine himselfe being besieged at Arles by Honorius souldiours, entered in to help ouers, and fled into the Church, thinking thereby to saue himselfe, but was drawen out from thence, and slaine. Gerontius who had traperously killed his master, was beset round about with Spaniards in his lodging, where fore he first slew Allanus his tried friend, then Nunichia his wife, and lastly himselfe, and now Honorius recovered Brytaine. In his time (saith Bede) Rome was destroyed of the Gothes, the 1164. yere after it was builded: after which time the Romans left off to rule in Brytain, almost 470. yeres after that Iulius Caesar first entred the said Ile. The Romanes dwelt within the trench, which as we haue saide, Securus diuise ouerthwart the Island at the south part, which thing may appeare by the cities, temples, bridges, and paved streets to this day remaining, notwithstanding they had in possession, & under their dominion the farther parts of Brytaine, and also the Islands which are about Brytaine. By means (as is aforesaid) the Romans had vsed to transport with them ouer in to France the flower of al the youth of Brytaine, to serue them in their forraigne wars, these men of war were consumed, and was not now able to defend themselves against the inuasions of their enemies: whereupon many yeres together they liued vnder the opprellion of two most cruell nations, the Scots & Picts: which were of the circuite of Brytaine, but diuided from the land of Brytaine by two armes of the sea, running betwixt them, of the which one from the east sea, the other from the west, runneth in far and wide into the land, though they may one crake to the other. In the middle of the east crake, there is a city builded called Guidi. Above the west crake toward the right hand standeth a citie called Alcluth, which in their language is as much to say, as the rocke Clutch, for it standeth by a cloud of the same name. The Brytaines then being thus assailed by six said nations, sent their embassadors with letters vnto Rome, with lamentable supplications, requirring of them aide and succour, promising their continuall fealty, so that they would rescue them against the opprellion of their enemies: whereupon there was sent vnto them a legion of armed souldiours from Rome, which comming into the Island, and encountering with the enemies, overthrew a great number of them, & drave the rest out of the frontiers of the countrey, and so setting them at libertie, and free from the miserie with which they were before so grieuously overcharged, counselled them to make a wall betwene the two seas, which might be of force to keepe out their euill neighbours: and that done, they returned home with great triumph. Now the Brytaines building the wall which they were bid to make, not of stone, as they were willed, but of turfe, as hauing none among them, that had skill therein, made it so slender, that it serued them to little purpose. This wall they made betwene the two armes or crakes of the sea, many miles long, that where the fence of the water lacked, there by the helpe of the trench they might keep their countrey from the breaking in of their enemies, of which piece of worke, the remaneth euen vnto this day most assured tokens yet to be seene. This trench beginneth about two miles from the monastery of Abercuring, in a place which in the Picts language is called Penuahil, and in English is called Panwell, and running out west ward, is ended by the city Alcluth. But the former enemies, when they had once perceived that the Roman legion was returned home againe, forthwith being set on land by boats, inuaded the borders, overcame the countrey, and as it were brake downe all before them: whereupon Embassadors be sent againe to Rome, beseeching them they would not suffer their miserable Countrey to be bitterly destroyed. Againe, there is sent an other legion, which comming vpon a sodain, made a great slaughter of the enemies, & chased them ouer into the their owne countrey. Then the Romanes tolde the Brytaines, that it was not their ease to take any more such trauellous iournies for their defence, and therefore bade them to practise their armour themselves, and to learne to withstand their enemies.

They builded up a wall of hard stone from sea to sea, right betwene the two Cities, which there were made to keepe out the enemy, in the selfe same place where Securus before had cast his trench, with publicke and private charges: the Brytaines also putting to their helping hands, they then builded it eight fote broad, and twelue fote high, right as it were by a line, from east to west, as it doth to this day appeare, which being perfected, they glae the people straight warning to looke well to themselves, they teach them to handle their weapons, and in frant them in warlike feates. Also by the sea side southward, where their ships lay at harbor, least their enemies should land thereabouts, they made by bulwarks along, one somewhat distant from another: and this done, bid them farewell, as minded no more to returne. At this time almost all the treasure of Brytaine was hid vnder ground, or transported ouer into France.

As some as they were gone, the Scots and Pias heauing intelligence that they had made promise they would come no more, they taking heart of grace, certaine againe to their businesse: and first, all that was without the wall, they toke for their owne. After that, they giue assault vnto the wall, where the Brytaines were with grables pulled downe, and otherwise so assaulted, that they leaving both the Cities and the wall also, were dispersed and put to flight, the enemies following, killed and slayed more cruellie then euer they did before, whereupon being diuinen out of their owne houses, and possessions, they fall a robbing and spoiling one the other of them, so farre forth, that all the whole country was brought to that crigent, that they had none other sustenance, but that they got by hunting and killing of wilde beastes.

At this time, Tamotheus here in Brytaine, vnder a pretence of religion, and great continence, drew many into a dangerous heresie.

Chrysanthus the son of bishop Marrian, a Consul of Italy was made viceroy and Lord deputy of Brytaine: he was afterwarde made Bishop of Constantinople.

Now the pope remnant of the Brytaines directed letters to Actius, where of this was the beginning: To Actius thrise Consul, the mourning of the Brytaines. In the procelle of which Epistle, they thus set forth their pittifull estate. The barbarous enemy drieth vs vpon the sea: the sea againe vpon the enemy: betweene these twaine riseth two maner of deaths, either we are killed or drowned. And yet for all their suite, they coulde obtaine no aide of him, as he which had then both his hands full of busines and battaile at home with Bleda and Arila, Kings of the Hunnes.

The Pelagian heresie being brought in by Agricola, the sonne of Seuerianus a Pelagian bishop, about this time did soze corrupt the faith of the Brytaines, but the Brytaines being neither willing to receiue their lewd doctrine, as blasphemous against the grace of God, neither able to refute their wily and wicked persuasions, they desired this wholsome counsell, to seeke for aide of the Bishops of France, against these the spiritual enemies. And they calling a common counsell, consulted among themselves, whom of the all it were best to send to help their neighbors faith. By the assent of them all there was chosen two worthy prelates, Germanus Alisiodorensis, and Lupus Bishop of the Citie Trecaids, which should passe ouer into Brytaine to confirme them in the faith, which with ready obedience accepting the commendement of the synode, toke shipping thitherward, and had prosperous winde, which set them in a shore in place where they themselves desired. A higher great multitude of people being assembled, receiued the Bishops of God, and the worde of God was preached by them, not onely in their Churches, but also in the open streets, and in the Countrey, in such sort, that in all places both the sound and faithfull were confirmed, and they that before swarued out of the right faith, were amended. The Anchors and head professors of this hereticall error, lay lurking all this while, and much spited to see the people daily to fall from them. After long abasement bled, they take vpon them to trie the matter by open disputation, which being agreed vpon, they come forth richly appointed, gorgeously apparelled, accompanied with a number of flattering fauourers. The people were present both to see and iudge the matter. The parties were farre unlike of condition: on the one side was the faith, on the other, mans presumption: on the one side, mekenesse, on the other side, pride: on the one side, Pelagius, on the other, Chyist. First of all Germanus and Lupus gaue their aduersaries leaue to speake, which vainely occupied both the tyme and eares of the people with naked wordes. But after the reuerend Bishoppes polished out their wordes confirmed with Scriptures out of the Gospelles and Apostles. Thus the banishe of heretikes was consulted, and falsehood confuted, so that at euery obligation, they were forced to confesse their error, not being able to answer them: but after their departur, the heresie beganne againe to reuolue. Wherefore Germanus returned into Brytaine with Seuerus, banished the heretikes, and resto:ed the faith.

Brytaines and Saxons.

The Brytaines continued in doubtfull war with the Scots and Pias, sometime bearing away the victorie, and sometime losing it to the enemy. But considering the ambitious minds of men, and fearing least some should stirpe the kingdome at home, while they were detained with warres abroad, thought god to appoint ouer them some king: and so with one consent they eleaced Vortiger.

Vortiger reigned in Brytaine, in whose time hunger more preuailling against the Brytaines, drew many of them to yield themselves vnto the hands of their enemies. Other there were which could neuer be brought there vnto, but from the hilles and bakes where they lurked, many times invaded their enemies, as trusting so much the more in the helpe of God, how much the lesse hope they had of aide of men, and by such means, first of all both resisted and ouerthrew them, which many yeeres together had liued by the spoile of the Countrey, whereby for the time they drew homeward with shame enough, intending not long after to returne.

The Pides then, and long time after, kept themselves quiet at home, save onely they would now and then make invasions into the lande, and draw away booties of cattell. After that they drew to a quietnesse, there ensued such plenty of graine as neuer was seene the like before, as farre as any man could remember, whereof the people grew to louse and wanton living, whereof al manner of lewennesse followed, specially crueltie, hate of truth, and loue of lying, insomuch, that if any were gentler and more giuen to truth then other, the other would worke him all the hurt and spite they could. This did not onely the Seculars, but also the Clergie, and the heads thereof, giuing the miselues ouer to drunkenness, pisse, contention, enuie, and such other, casting from them the yoke of Christ.

In the nicene season, a bitter plague befell among them for their corrupt living, consuming in short time such a multitude of people, that the quicke were not sufficient to burie the dead: and yet for all that, the remnant remained so hardened in sinne, that neither their friendes death, nor feare of their owne, could cure the murreine of their soules, which daily perished through their sinnefull living: whereby a great stroke of Gods bringance ensued vpon the whole sinnefull nation: for being now infested againe with their old neighbours the Scottes and Pides, they deuised with themselves what was best to doe, and where they might seeke refuge to withstand and repell the feare of the Northerne nation: and they agreed all with their king Vortiger, to demand aide of the Saxons beyond the Seas, which thing doubtlesse (saith Bede) was done by Gods owne appointment, that the people might be thereby plagued, as by the ende it manifestly appeared.

W. Malmes.

The people of the English or Saxons, being sent for of the said king into Brytaine, landed here in three long ships, and by the kings commandement, were appointed to abide in the east part of the land. And the Ile of Ebanet was giuen to them, they to defend their countrey like friends: but indeed, as it prooued after ward, minding to destroy the Countrey as enemies. Wherefore encountering with the Northerne enemy, the Saxons had the better, wherof they sending word home into their Countrey, as also of the fruitfullnesse of the land, the Saxons sent over a great naup and number of men before appointed for the warres, which being now ioued with the former band, became to a stronger army then all the poluer of the Brytaines was able to overcome. Those by the Brytaines were allowed a place to dwell among them, with that condition, that they should warre for them against their enemies, for wages of the Brytaines.

These Saxons, English, and Iuites that came from beyonde the Seas, were three of the strongest Nations in Germanie. Of the Iuites came the people of Kent, and the Ile of Wight, and also they in the prouince of West Saxons are called Iuites right ouer against the Ile of Wight. Of the Saxons (that is, of the Region now called olde Saxons) descended the East Saxons, the South Saxons, and the West Saxons. Of the English descended the East English, the Mercies, and the Northumbers. The chiefe Captaines of the Saxons are saide to be two brethren, Hengist and Horsa. This Hengist (saith Geoffrey Monmouth) on a time required of King Vortiger, so much ground as might be compassed with a thong of a bulles skine, there upon to build a place to rest in, which the king granted, where Hengist built a

Castell,

Castell, which hee called Thong Castell, and therein seasted King Vortiger with great royalty, and when night was come that the king should go to rest, Rowen the daughter of Hengist by commandement of her father, came with a cuppe of gold in her hand, and kneeling before the king, said to him, Wastasse, and he againe, by counsell of an interpreter, answered, Dwinke haile: at which time King Vortiger seeing the beauty of this Rowen, hee was enamoured, and desired to haue her to wife, which was graunted by her father on condition, the king should giue him al the countrey of Kent, for him and his people to dwell in, which the king willingly, but vnadvisedly graunted, and espoused the Damocell.

Thong Castell in Kent, is now a small village, little more then halfe a mile from Sidingborne. The ditch, and the keepe hill of Thong Castell appears in a little wood a two slight thome by south from Thong Church. Thong is a mile from the mouth of Apelton creeke, and about halfe a mile from Apelton towne, if passage were through the apparities the next way.

For the loue that Vortiger bare to Rowen the Saxon, he was diuorced from his lawfull wife, by whom he had three sonnes, for which doede, welnere all the Brytaines for to keepe him.

Vodine Archbishop of London, a man of singular deuotion and good life, by the abuse of Vortimer, went to Vortiger, and saide to him, that hee had not done as a chistian Prince, in departing from his lawfull wife, and taking another woman, whose father was an enemy to the chistian faith, and also went about to conquer the Crowne of Brytaine. Then saide Vortiger, I was not wise when I brought the Saxons to help me against mine enemies, but I was more vnwise, when I was taken with the inordinate lust of the daughter of Hengist, I knowe that mine Emptire will be terrible, except I repent me with speede and turne to God.

Hengist hearing Vortiger make this lamentation, blamed him, for that hee beleued the persuasions of a prophane man, of fained life (as he termed him) and forthwith seue the good Archbishop Vodine, and many other priestes, and religious persons. All the Churches in Kent were polluted with blood, the Saxons, with other religious persons, were by force put from their houses and goods, and constrained to pollution of their bodies.

The Brytaines considering the dallie repaire of the Saxons into this Realme, shewed to their king the leopord that might the reof ensue, and aduertised him of the danger, but all was in vaine: for Vortiger, by reason of his wife, bare such fauour to the Saxons, that he would in no wise heare the counsell of his subjects, wherefore, they with one minde depriued him of his royall dignitie, then he had reigned sixe yeres, and ordained to be their king Vortimer his eldest sonne.

Vortimer pursued the Saxons, and by his martiall knightthode fought against them foure battelles, besides diuers skirmishes, untill at length he was poisoned by the means of Rowen his stepmother, after he had reigned sixe yeres. The first battell Hengist and Horsa, who were (saith Bede) the sonnes of Wiglife, whose father was Vecta, whose father was Woden, fought with Vortimer, and his brother Catigern in a place called Ælfthorpe, now Ælfthorpe in Kent; and notwithstanding that Horfe was slain in this battell, yet Hengist bare away the victory. Bede saith that Horfe was buried in east Kent, where his tombe or monument, bearing his name was in his time to be seene. And true it is, that in Kent is a place, to this daie called Worsted, about two miles from Ælfthorpe, in the parish of Chatham, where the people of that countrey say the said Horfe was slaine. There was also slaine in the same battell at Ælfthorpe Catigern brother to Vortimer, whose monument remaineth till this day, on a great plain heath in the parish of Ælfthorpe, & is now corruptly called Cits cotthons, for Catigernes. (I haue my selfe in companie of diuers twoo-shipfall and learned Gentlemen behelde it in Anno 1590.) and is of foure flat stones, one of them standing byright in the middle of two other, inclosing the edge sides of the first, and the fourth laid flat aloft the other three: and is of such height, that men may stand on either side the middle stone in time of storme or tempest, safe from wind and rain, being defended with the breadth of the stones, as hauing one at their backs, one on either side, and the fourth ouer their heades. And about one coites cast from this monument lieth an other great stone, much part thereof in the ground, as fallen downe where the same had bene fixed.

The second battell Hengist and Eske fought with the Brytaines in a place called Craanford, or Craford in Kent, of the Brytaines many perished by the sword, the rest of them abandoned Kent altogether, and with great feare fled to London.

Weymouth

The thirde battell, Hengist and Eske fought with the Brytaines in a place called Weymouths state, that is to saie, the state of Weymouth, where they killed Dukes or Captaines of the Brytaines, with manie other, whereas on the partie of the Saxons there was one onelie man slaine, whose name was Weped.

The fourth battell was fought by Hengist and Eske against the Brytaines, nere to a place called Colmose, the which was soe fought by the Saxons, and long continued with great danger to the Brytaines, because that the said place inclosed a part of their hoste so strongly, that the Brytaines coulde not approach to them, being beaten off with the enemies shotte, albeit in the ende, the Saxons were put to flight, and manie of them drowned in the same place.

Vortiger obtained againe the kingdome, & shortly after Hengist, which was chased into the Ile of Thanet, entred the land with a number of Saxons, but when he heard of the great assembly the Britains had made against him, he treated for peace, which in fine was concluded. Shortly after Hengist (by a guile which before he had deuised) by his sonne in law, and three hundred of his nobles unto a feast or banquet, where when he had overlaid his guesstes with oormuch wine, he fell to quarrelling, and with taunting talke, pinched euery one of them, and straight fell to fighting, where through the Brytaines were slaine euery one. The king was taken prisoner, and forced to giue for his ran- some, Kent, Suffry, Suffolke, and Northfolke. This manner of the Bry-

taines was on the plaine of Salisbury. Then Hengist begarne his dominion ouer Kent, & Vortiger fled into Wales, and builded there a Castell, of which building, and long let of the same, and of his Prophet Merlin, Geoffrey Monm. Bede. and others speake many things. Great companies of the Saxons daily flocked into this Island, and grew so strong, that the people of the countrey which sent for them, were in great feare of their puissance, for those Saxons had taken league with the Pias, & began to turne thir force vpo the Brytaines: and to be short, the fire once kindled in the Lunds of the Pagans there, took lust reuenge of the wickednes of the people, raging first vpo the cities and countrey next ad-joining, after from the east sea to the west, ouerwhelming all the whole Island without resistance: both publike and priuate houses were ouerthrowne to the ground: the priests were slaine standing at the altar: the bishops with their flock were murdered, without respect of their dignitie, nor there was any that would bury the slaine: some of the miserable leauings being taken in the hills, were there killed: other being serued with hunger, were faine to creepe out of their caues, & buy their vidual at their enemies hands, with sale of their libertie for ever, if yet they were not killed out of had: other fled ouer the seas with an heavy hart: other tarrying still in their countrey in feare of death, and lacke of food, liued full miserably in the mountaines, woods, and cliffes. Aurelius Ambrosius, and Vher (brother of Constantine that was before slaine in France) landed with a nauie of ships at Totnes, made warre vpon Vortiger, and burned him in his castell in Wales, when he had secondly reigned sixe yeeres.

Aurelius Ambrosius was ordained king of Brytaine, in whose time the Brytaines by little and little began to take strength and courage vnto them, coming out of their caues in which they lurked before, and with one consent, calling for heauenly helpe, that they might not for euer be bitterly destroyed, they hauing for their captaine and leader, the foresaid Ambrosius Aurelius, assembled themselves together, and prouoking the vikars to fight, through Gods assistance atchieued the victorie, and from that day forward, were the men of the countrey. Now the enemy had the victorie, untill the yeere that Vastie was besieged, where they gaue their enemies a great overthrow, which was about the foure and fortieth yeere of their coming into the land. But of this wee shall speake more hereafter.

Of this Ambrosius, William Malmesburie writeth thus: Aurelie, when (saith he) the Brytaines had gone to swacke, if Ambrosius, who onelie and alone of all the Romanes, remained in Brytaine, and was Monarch of the Realme, after Vortiger, had not kepte vnder the psonde Barbarians, with the notable trauaile of the warriour Arthur. Now it followeth in Geoffrey, that this Ambrosius caused Churches to be repaired, which had bene spoiled by the Saxons: hee caused also the great stones to bee set on the plaine of Salisbury, which is called Stonehenge, in remembrance of the Brytaines that were slaine and buried there, in the raising of Vortiger, at the banquet, and communication of Hengist with the Saxons. This ancient monument is yet to be seene, and is a number of stones, rough and of a grey colour, 25. fote in length, and about 10. fote in breadth, they are for-ned by two and two together, and euerie comple sustaineth a third stone lying oerthwart gatewise, which is fastened by the meanes of tenons that enter in to mortaises of those stones, not closed with any cement. It appeareth, that there hath bene three ranks going round as circles one within another: where of the uttermost and largest, containeth in compasse about 300. fote, but the other ranks are decayed, and therefore hard to reckon how many stones there be.

The Chronicles of the Brytains do testifie, that wher as the Sorons, about the yere of our Lord 450. had slaine 480. of the Brytaines: Nobilitie by treason, and under colour of a treaty, Aurelius Ambrose now King of the Brytaines, desirous to continue their memorie, with some worthy monument, caused these stones to be set by in place of their murder and burfall, the which stones hadde bene first brought from Affrike into Ireland, and placed on Spounte Kyllare, and from thence by the industrious meanes of Merlin, were conueyed to this place to the foresaide end. There are about this place, certaine little hilles, or banks, vnder the which are found sometimes bones of bigge men, and peeces of armes, also not far from thence remaine old ruines of the maner of a fortreffe, which the Romans (as it is not unlike) did build there in times past.

Alla, and his three sonnes, Kimon, Plincing, and Cissa, came into Brytaine with three ships, and landed with them, in a place called Kimenshore, and there slew many of the Brytaines, forcing the rest to make their flight into a wood called Andredsfage, this Alla fighting with the Brytaines in a place now called to Mercreds Borne, or Mercreds Rilear, slew many of them, and put the rest to flight.

Alla and Cissa his sonne, after long siege, brake into the Citie of Andredsester, and slew the inhabitants from the greatest to the smallest.

Porte, and his two sonnes, Byda, and Mogla, arrived in Brytaine with two ships, in a place called Portesmouth, and there slew a pong gentleman, one of the nobilitie of the Brytaines, and diuers others.

The same yere two Dukes, to wit, Cerdic and Kenric, his sonne came into Brytaine with v. ships, and arrived in a place called Cerdics fhere, the same day they fought with the Brytaines, and put them to flight. Cerdic and his son Kenric slew Natanland king of the Brytaines, and 5000. men, of whose name that countrie as far as Cerdicsford, was called by the name of Natanled.

Aurelius Ambrose, being possessed died when he had reigned 32. yeres, and was buried at Stonehenge, then called Chorea Gigantum.

Vther Pendragon, so called, for that hee caused alwayes a Dragon to be born before him in his battalles, was crowned king of Brytaine: he vanquished Octa and Oza at Windgate by Coquer Witter. He was enamored by on Igen the Dukes wife of Cornwall, and to obtaine his vnlawfull lust, made waite vpon her husband Goelen, and slew him in battaille at Duuilioc. On her he begate Arthur, he reigned vññ. yeres, and was buried at Stonhenge.

Arthur the same of Vther borne in Cornwell, at the age of 20. yeres was crowned king of Brytain, as fower say at Caerleon, other at Winich, one old names pamphlet saith at Cilcester, by Dubricius Archbishop of Legions.

This Citie of Cilcester in Brytysh is called Caerlegent, and was situate nere Reading. It was so called, for that Constantius, the sonne of Constantine the great dyed there: his Sepulchre might once haue bene seene there besides the Citie, as the letters engrauen on it in stone did declare. Thus farre the said namelesse autho.

Sea Cro.

The Towne of Cilcester is yet to be seene in Hamshire, euen in the vertice of it, as the booke devideth, it is 6. miles or more from Reading, and containeth within the wall of stone about 80. acres of ground, deuoted into three feldes, before the ground about the manner place it selfe, and the Church. The wall is about 2. miles compasse, with foure places where gates haue bene, on the which wall grow some Wakes of 10. cart loads the pece, the ground within the wall is almost leuell with the toppe of the same wall, but without, the wall is 6. or 7. fote of height, above the ground within the wall at this present is one farme house, and a parish Church, the parishioners whereof dwell without the Towne, there is in digging and plowing much Romane money found, the ground there beareth good corne, saue in some place, the corne being marvellous faire to the eye, and ready to thew perfecter, it decayeth. The lands of the towne, after the conquest came to one Blewich, & then one of the Blewichs leaving no heire male, the land not entailed to the heyres generally, came by marriage to one Peter de Cusance knight: and after to one Edward Baynard, coming out of the house of the Baynards of Essex, whose name is now obliterated there, thus much of Cilcester. And now againe to Arthur, who, as is reported, toke to wife Guineuer, cousin to Cadur Duke of Cornwal, and daughter to the king of Biskap. Of this king Arthur there be many fabulous reports, but certaine he was (saith W. of Malmesbury) a Prince more worthy to haue advancement by true histories, then false fables, being the only prop and vpholder of this his countrey.

In the beginning of his raigne, Lorbho and Conradus his allies, enoying his prosperity, made war against him, but he valiantly vanquished them with their diades and Sots, and at his pleasure appointed them a gouernor named Angulid. He fought vii. battels against the Sorons, and alwaies bare away the victorie. These battels (saith Nennius) were fought in places following.

Anna. Hist.

Nennius.

The first battell was fought in the mouth of the water Gleyne or Gledy. The second, third, fourth, and fift, ne vnto the riuer Douglass, which is in the Countie of Lincolne.

The first vpon the riuer Bassus.

The seauenth in the Wood Callidon, or Carroffe Callidon.

The eight beside the Castell called Guinien.

The ninth at Cairelien in Wales.

The tenth by the sea side, in a place called Trachenrith, or Kithowotoc.

The twelfth at h. hill or towne of Bath, then named Sathen-hill, where many more were slaine by h. force of Arthur, for he alone (saith W. Mal.) hauing the image of our Lady bowed vpon his armes, set vpon 900. of his enemies & with an incredible slaughter put the to flight. But now concerning this Bath before mentioned tioned, it is to be noted, that Bath in Somersetshire standeth close, compassed about with hills, whereby it is evident, that either it is removed from that place where it stood in Nenius time, or els that the place which he called Badonicus mons, was not this town it selfe, as Leiland and other coniecture, but some other high place nere, which is not unlikely, for at this day within a mile of it, ever a town called Bannar downe, which is so called, either corruptly for: Bathendowne, or els in remembrance of the Banners displayed there, Bannier downe, and so much to me both upon the sight of the place, and report of such as have gathered caps full of mens teeth in following the plow there, to be the same that Nenius (corruptly called Gildas) or Bede meant, though Polidor mistakes it for: Blanchemore. Thus much for: Bathon hill: now to the historie.

Afterward Arthur raised the siege which the Saxons had planted about Lincolne, & drew them in great numbers. On the other side (saith W. Mal.) though the English Saxons were tossed with variable dalliance of fortune, yet they did alwaies supply their armies when they were decayed with their countrymen which came to him, and therefore with the better courage they ran upon the weapons of their enemies, & when the inhabitants by little and little quailed and gaue over, they spread themselves through the whole Island. Gods pleasure being so, in whose hand & power the alteration and change of all kingdomes is, and both consist, but these things came to passe in pcesse of time and yeeres.

Arthur having abated the rage of the Saxons as is aforesaid, and recovered his countrey to quietnesse, he constituted the order of the round table, into the which order he only retained such of his nobilitie as were most renowned for vertue and chivalrie. This round table he kept in diuers places, especially at Carlion, Winchester, and Camalot in Somersetshire. This Camalot sometime a famous towne, or castle standeth at the South end of the Church of south Gadbury, the same is situat on a very top: or hill, wonderfully strengthened by nature, to the which be two entrings way, by very steepe way, one by north, and other by Southward. The very rate of the hill, whereon this fortresse stood, is more then a mile in compass. In the upper part of the top of the hill be four battlements or trenches, and a halpy hal of earth betwixt euery one of them. In the very toppe of the hill above all the trenches, is Magna area or campus, of 20. acres or more, where in diuers places men may see foundations, and rudos of walls. There was much darkish blew stone, that people of the village there by hath carried away. This top within the upper wall being more then 20. acres, hath often bene plowed, and borne very good corne, much gold, silver, & copper of the Romans comes hath bin found there in plowing, & likewise in the fields about the roots of this hill, with many other antique things especially by Carl.

There was found in the memory of men a horse shoe of silver at Camalot. The people can tell nothing there but that they have heard say the Arthur much rejoiced to Camalot. The old Lord Hungerford was owner of this Camalot, since, Halting Earle of Huntingdon by his mother, &c.

There is yet to be scene in Denbigh shire, in the parish of Llanfagan, in the side of a stone hill, a place compassed, wherein be foure and twenty seats for men to sit in, some lesse, and some bigger, cut out of the maine Rock by mans hand, where children and young men, coming to seeke their Cattell, use to sit, and plaie: they commonly call it Arthurs round Table.

While Arthur was ballantlie occupied in his wars beyond the Seas, (where he wrought many wonders, as some have written, but far unlike to be true,) Mordred, to whom he had committed the gouernement of Brytaine, confederating himselfe with Cerdicus first king of the West Saxons, traitterously usurped the kingdome, of which treason, when relation came to Arthur, he speedily returned into Brytain, and at Richborough nere to Sandwich, gaue battell to him, and wanne the siebe. Anguise of Scotland, Gawin and Cador were there slaine: then pursuing him into Cojunctallan, gaue him battell there againe by the River of Alaue, of some histories called Cablan, where Mordred was slaine. And Arthur being deadly wounded, was conueied to Glasfenburie, where he died on the xxi. day of May, in the yere of Christ 542. and was there buried after he had victoriously gouerned this Realme 26. yeeres, hee gaue 25. sent marth (saith Rowle) with other possessions to the value of 500. Sparks, to the Abbots of Glasfenburie.

More then 600. yeeres after his death, to wit, about the yere of Christ 1189. which was the last yere of the reigne of king Henry the second, his bodie was founde, buried in the Churchyard, betwixt two pillars, rbt. some deape under ground, but those that digged the ground there to find his body, after they had entred about 7. fote deape into the earth, they found a mightie broad stone, with a leaden Crosse fastened to that part which late downe wardes towards the corpes, containing this inscription,

This inscription was grauen on that side of the Crosse which was next to the stone, so that till the Crosse was taken from the stone, it was not scene. His body was found, not inclosed within a tombe of stone, it was not scene. His made hollowe like a trough, the which being digged by and opened, therein was found the bones of Arthur, which were of a marvellous bignesse, as Giraldus Cambrensis, a learned man that then lived, reporteth to have heard of the Abbot of Glasfenburie, of whom he was enformed that the shin-bone of Arthur being set up by the leg of a very tall man, came above his knee the breadth of three fingers. The skull of his head of a wonderful bignesse, in the which head were appeared the prints of 11. wounds or mo: all the which were growne into one frame, except onely that whereof hee died, which being greater then the other appeared vertie plaine. Also in opening the tombe of his wife Guineuer, that was buried with him, they found the tresses of her haire whole and perfect, finely platted, of colour like to gold, but being touched fell to dust: the Abbot of that house (sometime Prior of Bermondsey) was named Henry Bloys, and was nephew to king Henry the second, by whose commandement the buriall of Arthur was searched for and found. Whose bones, with the bones of Guineuer his wife being found, were removed into the newe great Church, (for the old was burned in Anno, 1171.) and there buried in a faire tombe of Marble, laying the bones of the king at the head of the tombe, and the bones of the Queene at his fete toward the West. scription, as it is found, and taken off the stone, was kept in the treasure of reuelier of Glasenburie Church, till the suppression thereof, in the reigne of King Henry the eight.

Constantine kinsman to Arthur, and sonne to Cadur Duke of Cornwal, was ordained king of Brytaine, and reigned thye yerres.

This man was by the two sonnes of Mordred graueously bered, for they claimed the Land by the right of their father, but after manie bat talles they fled, the one to London, the other to Winchester, which Cities they obtayned and toke them: but Constantine followed, and subdued, and toke the fore said Cities, and one of the yong men hee found in an Abbey at London, slew him nere the Altar cruelle, and buried him nigh Vter Pendragon, at Stonehinge. The other yong man hee found at Winchester, and slew him, flying in to the Church of St. Amphibalus.

Aurelius Conanus a Brytaine, raised mortall warre against Constantine the king, and after long fight slew him in the field, when he had reigned thye yerres, and was buried at Stonehinge.

Aurelius Conanus, stephew to Arthur, was Crowned King of Brytaine.

He cherished such as loued strife and dissention within his Realme: and gave light credence to them which accused other, where it right or wrong.

Hee imprisoned by strength his Uncle, which was right heyye to the Crowne. He reigned thye and thirt yerres.

The kingdome of Northumberland began first in Brytaine under a Saxon named Ida.

Victorinus the sonne of Conanus, was ordained King of Brytaine, a vicious king, and cruell tyrant, who put from him his wife, and kept his daughter for his Concubine. In diuers battels hee discomfited the Saxons. He reigned foure yerres.

Malgo Pulcher Canonus of Northwales, began his raigne ouer the Brytaines, and gouerned them fye yerres.

This Malgo was in proportion of body, greater then all the Dukes of Brytaine, but hee delighted in the foule sin of Sodomitie. Hee slew his first wife, and then toke to wife his owne brothers daughter.

Caraticus began to rule the Brytaines. This man loued ciuill warre, and was odible both to God and to his subiects. They moued the Saxon (being accompanied with Gurmundus king of Ireland) to make warre vpon Caraticus, in such wise, that hee was fayne to take the Towne of Cicester, where they assaulted him fore, and firoe the come, by tying fire to the winges of Sparrowes, that he with his men fledde from thence into Wales: by which means, he left a great part of his dominion, and ended his life, when hee had reigned thre yerres.

This Gurmund burned up the land of Brytaine from sea to sea, and the most part of that hee called Leogrea he gaue to the Saxons. The Brytaines gave place, and fled into the West partes of Cornwal, and Wales. Theanus Archbishop of London, and Thadecus Archbishop of Poike, when their Churches were all destroyed to the ground, they with their Cleargie fled into Wales, and many of them into little Brytaine. This plague came on the Brytaines for their couetousnesse, rauine, and Lecherie. Gurmund builded Gurmundchester.

Adwane Duke of Northwales, was made Soueraigne of the Brytaines, who gaue strong battell to Ethelwold king of Northumberland, and forced him to intreate for peace: After which concord being made, they continued all the life time louing friends. He reigned xxiij. yerres.

The kingdome of the East Saxons began under Erchenwinus, about the yere of Christ, 614.

The kingdome of Mercia, or middle England, began under Penda, 626.

Adwalin, the sonne of Cadwane, reigned ouer the Brytaines, he warred strongly vpon the Saxons, and made Penda king of Mercia tributarie to him: he reigned xlviij. yerres, and was buried at London, in a Church of St. Martine nere vnto Ludgate, which Church was then newe founded, and builded by the Brytaines, in Anno, 677.

Cadwalladar (saith Gefrey) was ordained king of the Brytaines, and ruled only iij. yerres: hee vanquished and slew Lothier king of Kent, & Ethelwold king of south Saxons: and then for taking his kingly authoritie, hee went to Rome, there to be christened, who after became a Monk, and was buried in St. Peters Church at Rome. He was last king of Brytaine, (saith Gefrey) but Bede theweth, that Lothier king of Kent was slaine by Edneke, who succeeded him in that kingdome of Kent, and Ethelwold he saith was slaine by a Saxon called Ceadwalla K. of the West Saxons, which Ceadwalla went to Rome, and was there buried as ye may read in the historie of the West Saxon kings.

Now are we come to the time wherein God (who for the sinnes of the people translated kingdomes) dispossessed the Brytaines of their ancient habitation, and rule of this land, who by the violence of Saxons were enforced, either to miserable seruitude, or giuen into the Westerne partes of the Isle, now called Wales and Cornwal, (where they now inhabit,) or els to their countreyment the Brytaines in France. They also called the Brytaines Welshmen, as who should say strangers, that use an unknown tongue. This happened in the raigne of Ceadwalla King of the West Saxons, whose Gefrey Monmouth calleth Cadwalladar king of the Brytaines about the yere of Christ, 685, when the Brytaines being wasted with ciuill dissention, pestilence and famine, lost all that small that they had long time painfully kept, and were conched in a corner. Thus much for the Brytaines, and now shall be shewed the raigne of the Saxons, who enioying the fertile soile of this Realme, parted it in proceesse of time into seauen kingdomes: Kent, Southey, East-angles, East-saxons, Mercia, Northumberland, and West-saxons, which the learned call the Heptarchie of the Saxons, of which kingdomes, I purpose (for avoiding of confusion) to treat severally, setting downe the limits of these Countreies, with the succession, ades, and ciuill bat talles of their pettie kings, vntill the time that this Heptarchie, or government of seauen, was reduced to a Monarchie, or regiment of one.

Ent the first kingdome, possessed by the Saxons, containing that countrey that stretcheth from the East Ocean to the river of Thamis, having on the South west side Southey, on the West London, and upon the North east the said river of Thamis. It hath the Archbishopricke of Canterbury metropolitan and pismote of al England, and the Bishoppicke of Rochester, and had kings as followeth.

Hengist the sonne of Widgeu, the sonne of Vicia, the sonne of Wecta, the first sonne of Woden & Frea, was the first of the Saxons that made himselfe king of Kent, as before ye have heard, eight yeres after his first entring into this Island, in the yere from Christs birth 456. He reigned xxxiii. yeres, and died honorably saith Marianus, others have written, that by the counsel of Elded B. of Glocester, Edell Duke of Glocester caused his head to be cut off, at Coneshojow. But this hath no likelihood of truth, for certaine it is, that Robert base sonne to Henry the first, was made the first Earle of Glocester, and Henry the eight made the first Bishop of Glocester.

Otra sonne of Eske reigned xxi. yeres.

Emmericus the sonne of Otra reigned xvj. yeres.

Ethelbert the sonne of Emmericus had the government of this kingdome, by the space of liii. (or after Beade, lvi.) yeres. This Ethelbert in the beginning of his raigne being but a childe, was troubled with warres on every side, that he could hardly defend his owne coasts. In his first battaile against Ceauline king of the West Saxons & Cuibe his sonne, he was forced to make his flight into Kent, having two of his Dukes Oslauc and Cnebanno slaine in a place called Gubaduni: but when he came to more age, and was more cunning in warre, in short space he overcame all the kingdomes of the Saxon round about him, save the Northumbres. And to the ende hee would have acquaintance with foraine princes, he made affinity and alliance with the king of France by the marryng of his daughter Berta, a Christian woman, to whom he permitted to use the lawes and rites of her Countrey, and to have a Bishop, whose name was Letardus, to remaine with her, for her better instruction in the lawes of God. By this means the barbarous and heathen Saxons keeping company with the French, did agree to have all one lawe and his customes: besides this, the chaste and vertuous life of Letardus the Bishoppe, and the other French, which came with the Quene; changed the kings mind unto the knowledge of Christ, whereby it came to passe, that after ward hee did so farre give place to the preaching of Augustine. At this time (saith Beade) the Byptaines being at quiet, little regarding the Saxons past in their fathers dales, and having respect onely to the present prosperous estate in the which they then lived, were so set to breake all god orders of trusty and justie, that that scant any tok:n to remembre therof remained, but only in a feto, among manie other of their doings, which their owne Historiographer Gildes, hath lamentably set forth in writing (he saith of them thus) that the yenger took care to preach the Gospell of Christ unto the Angles and Saxons, which inhabited the land among them. But yet the goodness of God provided for the said nation of the Angles, much more worthy preachers, by whome they might be brought to the faith.

In the yere 596. Pope Gregorie moved of goolie inclination in the hundred forty and seven yere after the arrivall of the Angles in Byptaine, sent Augustine, Melius, Iustus and Iohn, with sundrie other Monkes that lived in the fear of God, to preach the Gospell, to the nation of the Angles in Byptaine, which landed in the Isle of Thanet, and were first received by Ethelbert king of Kent, whom they converted to the Christian faith with divers of his people in the 34. yere of his raigne: and king Ethelbert delaying no time, gave unto Augustine the Citie of Canterburie, who furthered thus by the king, set up at his handes an olde Church, sometime founded there by the faithfull Romanes, and dedicated the same to our Saviour Jesus Christ, which since was called Austins

Augustine consecrated Melius and Iustus Bishoppes, and appointed Melius to preach unto the East Saxons, who with their king Sebert the nephewes of king Ethelbert, at the preaching of Melius received the word of life.

King Ethelbert founded the Church of Saint Paul in London. Iustus was made Bishop of Rochester, where Ethelbert builded for him and his successors the Church of S. Andrew.

This yere 603. died Pope Gregory the first, upon the first of March, being the seconde yere of Phocas the Emperour, after hee had governed the Roman Sea 13. yeres, 6. monethes, and 10. dales, after whome succeeded Sabinian the first.

About this time (saith Beade) Austine (by the aide of king of Ethelbert) called together the Bishoppes and Doctors of the greatest prouince and nearest to him, which were the Byptaines, to commune with them, in a place which to this daie is called Augustines Wake, as ye would see the power and strength of Austine, being in the borders of the Viccians and West Saxons. There hee beganne with brotherlie admonition (saith Beade) to persuade them to peace, and Catholike unitie with him, and to communicate with him for Gods sake the labour of preaching the Gospell to the Heathen of England: for as yet they kept not the Easter Sundae in due time, but from the fourteenth to the twentieth Mone, which cometh is concluded in compasse of eightie foure yeres. They used moreover, manie other things contrarie to the unitie of the Church, which when they had bene with long discourse declared, and these men, neither for prayers, rebukes, or threats of Augustine and his companie would give their assent, but rather preferred their owne traditions before all other Churches which throughout the world, agreed with Austine in Christ. Whereupon Austine fell to prayer, and also rebuked a blinde man to sight (saith Beade) which the Byptaines could could not bee, and therefore confessed indeede that to bee the true waie of righteousnes which Austine had preached and shewed them, but yet they saide they could not alter their olde customes without the consent of their Cleargie and people. They desired therefore to have a seconde Synode of a greater multitude. Which when it was appointed to bee so, there came by report seven Bytayne Bpshoppes, and many othe well learned men, especiallye out of their greatest Monasterie of Bangor, where at that time Dinoh was Abbot.

These men beinge nowe readie to goe to the foresayde Synode, came first to a certayne holie and wise man (which lived there about an Anchorite life) to Aske his counsell, whether they ought at Austines preaching and exhortation leave their traditions or no, who answered them in: if (quoth he) hee be a man of God, followe him. But howe shall wee prove (sayde they) that hee is a man of God? The Anchorite answered, our Worre safely, take on you my yoke, and learne you of me, for I am milde, and humble of heart: it is likelie that himselfe beareth the yoke of Christ, and will offer you the same to beare; but if he be curst and proude, it is certaine, that he is not of God, neither must we much esteeme his wordes.

Then they enquired of him howe they might knowe whether this Austine were proude or not, marie (quoth hee) proude ye that hee with his company come first to the place of the Synode, or Councell house. And if when ye approach nere, he ariseth courteously to you, thinke ye that hee is the servant of Christ, and so heare ye him pbenientlie; but if hee despise you, nor will bowd-safe to rise at your presence, which are the more in number, let him likewise be despised of you.

And truelie as this Anchorite bade them, so did they, for it happened that when they came thither, Austine was already there, and sate in his chaire, which when they sawe, straightwaie bearinge togoth, they noted him of pryde, and therefore endenoured to overthrowe and gaine say whatsoeuer he proposed, his Oration by hiselpe was thus: Although deare brethren in many other points ye bee contrarie to our custome, or rather contrarie to the custome of the vniuersall Church of Christ; yet notwithstanding, if ye will in these three things consent unto me: that is, to celebrate the Easter in due time, to accomplish the ministrie of Baptisme, according to the Romane and Apostolike Church, and last of all to preach with vs to this English nation the worde of our Lorde, all your other Ceremonies, Rites, and Customes, though they be contrary to ours, yet we will willingly suffer, and bee contente to beare with them. But they answered, they would doe none of the things requested, neither would account him for their Bpshope: sayinge naie, if hee would not much as rise to vs, truelie the more we should nowe subiect our selues to him, the more would hee hereafter despise vs, and set vs at naught. To whom Austine greatfullie prophesied, that if they would not take peace, and bee at accord with their brethren, they should receiue and seele warre from their enemies. And if they would not preach to the Englishmen the waie of life, they should suffer at their hand, and by their power the vengeance of death, which thing came to passe afterwarde, as shall bee shewed in the reigns of Edlilfinge King of the Northumbres.

The same yere of Christ 603. also died Augustine the Archbysop, the xvij. day of May, after the deccale of Saint Gregory, two monethes, two weekes, & two daies. And after himselfe had bene consecrated Archbysoppe of Canterburie, egypt yeres, five monethes, and 21. daies, but before hee deccaled, he obtained Laurence to succede him in the Archbysoppitike, which hee saue in his life time the rather per fourmde, least that after hee was deade, the state of the Church (being as yet but rude and latele converted) might begin to waue and fall, if it should haue lacked a pastour or ruler neuer so little a while: his bodie was for a time layde in the porch of the forenamed Church of Saint Peter and Paul, because the Church was not yet finished nor dedicated, but shortly after the dedication of the same, (which was done by Laurence his successor) hee was translated into the Church, and layde on the South side therof decentlie. And vpon his Tombe was writen this Epitaph. Hic requiescit Dominus Augustinus Dorobornensis Episcopus primus, &c. Here resteth blessed Augustine, the first Archbysoppe of Dorobornia, who being sent hither of helie Gregory, Bpshope of Rome, and strenghtened of God by the working of miracles, converted king Ethelbert and his people from the worshipping of Idoles, to the faith of Christ, and fulfilling in yeace the dayes of this office, he died the 26. day of May, in the reigns of the same king Ethelbert.

The noble king Ethelbert, makinge provision for them that should come after, brought the lawes of his country into the mother tongue, thereby to reward the god accordingly, and to withstand the wicked by seuerer means, and lest nothing thereof his posteritie needed to doubt in any matter, and then after his temporall reigns, which he had kept most gloriously ouer the Kentish Saxons, the space of 54. (or after Bede 56.) yeres, he entred into the eternall blisse of the kingdom of heauen vpon the foure and twentieth day of February being the eleuenth yere after that hee had receiued the faith of Christ, and the ninetenth yere after S. Augustine with his company were sent to the English nation to preach: he was the third king, and reigned ouer all the South prouinces, which are separated from the North by the Riuer of Humber, and the borders adioyning thereunto. King Ethelbert being married to the Ladie Bertha a Christian woman, and daughter of the king of France, receiued of her a sonne named Edbald, (who married Emma the daughter of the king of France) and a daughter named Ethelburge other wise called Tate, that was married to Edwin king of Northumberland, which Edwin was connected to the faith by Bpshop Pauline. The place of king Ethelberts buriall was in Saint Martinus parish within the church of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul nere Canterburie, on the South side of the same church, which he builded from the ground as before is declared, where also the noble Ladie Quene Bertha his wife was buried before him, and the bpsop Lucardus that came out of France with her, and vpon his graue was left this inscription.

Edbald when he had taken upon him to rule the Realme, and rode no longer in awe of his father, he did not only refuse to accept the faith of Christ, but was also polluted with such a fornication as the Apostle witnessed never had been heard of among the Gentiles, which is, that he had married his fathers wife, with the which two haprous facts he gave occasion to his subjects to returne to their former faith, which under his fathers raigne for feare or for feare of the king had perished to the lawes of christian faith, & chastity: but the scourge of God, and vengeance from heauen wanted not to the punishment of this unfaithfull king, for he was plagued with often frensie of minde, and raging fits of an uncleane spirit, but by Laurence Archbishop of Canterbury, he was at length converted from his Idolatry, and unfaithfull sinne, and was turned againe to the faith, and being baptised, he endeoured to maintaine the state of the Church in all points to the uttermost, he builded a Chappell within the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul, and gave to that Monastery a great portion of land, he is said to be the first founder of Fulkstone in Kent, but 3 yeare scene no Charter thereof, he reigned 25. yeres, and was buried by his father in the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul.

EReombert the sonne of Edbald by Emma his wife, hee first suppressed the Temples of the Idoles, and because his people were given to excess, commanded a solemn fast of forty daies long, to be observed throughout all his kingdome, and reigned twentie five yeres. It is recorded in the antiquities of Charches Church in Canterburie, that about this time Honorius Archbishop of Canterburie divided his province into Parishes, which Honorius decessed in Anno 693. when hee had late Archbishoppe twentie yeres.

Egbert his sonne succeeded, whose quiet government for a long season was after ward defaced by the cruell murder of Ealbert, and Egelbriht his cousins Germans, whom either he slew himselfe, or procured to be slaine by a traitor named Thunor: he reigned nine yeres.

The Abbie Domneua next true heire to the Crowne from Edbald, erected a Monasterie called Winton in the Isle of Thanet, and became first Abbesse there.

Lotharius succeeded his brother Egbert, who being assaulted oftentimes by Edrike the sonne of Egbert, in a cruell fight was shot through with a dart, whereof he died under his Surgeons hands, when hee had reigned thirtie yeres, and was buried with his predecessors kings, in the Monastery of Peter and Paul by Canterburie.

Edrice the sonne of Egbert, within the space of two yeres lost both life and kingdome. After his death the kingdome being sometime governed by usurpers, and sometime by foreigners, began to decay.

The Kentishmen, by casting of fire, did cruellie burne Moll the brother of Cedwall King of the West Saxons, and twelve of his Knights with him: wherewith Cedwall being moved to furie, did miserable havoc and spoile all Kent, so that by the space of five yeres, there was no king in that Countrey.

Widreds

Widreds the sonne of Egbert purchasing peace with money, was then established king, in which state he behaved himselfe very honourably, both in peace and warre. He founded the Monastie of Saint Martin at Wodan, and reigned xxiij. yeres, with whom King Swedheard reigned jointly in one part of his kingdome.

Egbert the sonne of Withred walked in his fathers ordinances, and had like successe, and reigned thre and twentie yeres.

The yere 729. two dreadfull Starrs appeared, the one before the Sunne rising, the other after the Sunne setting, both which appeared in the month of January, the space of 15. daies, and carried with them the likeness of a bundle of fire against the South, and somewhat towards the West, at which time the Pagans infested France and Spaine.

Edelbert his brother succeeded, in whose time the Citie of Canterburie (as is to be thought) was burned by chance: he reigned not xi. yeres, and was buried in the Monasterie of Peter and Paul at Canterburie.

Alricke the thirde sonne of Withred ruled Kent after his brethren, and was vanquished in a fought feld against Offa king of the Mercians: he reigned foure and thirtie yeres, and was the last of the line of succession of the kings of Kent.

Edelbert or Egbert otherwise called Pren, then usurped the kingdome, and Elenied warre against the Mercians, by whom he was taken prisoner, and not long after released, but the Kentishmen would not receive him, Cuthred then usurped, and bare a title of a Kentish king for the space of eight yeres.

Balred the heire of Cuthred then took on him the Princely dignitie, but Egbert king of the West Saxons so discomfited him in battell, that he fled over the River of Tamis, and forsoke his kingdome, when he had reigned xi. yeres, and was never heard of afterward, wherby this kingdome of Kent was united to the kingdome of the West Saxons.

The yere 829. Wilfred Archbishop of Canterburie decessed, and was buried in Christs Church in Canterburie, when he had late 27. yeres, after whom succeeded Floegild.

South Saxons.

Southsex the second kingdome, contained the Counties of Southsex and Surrey, which had on the East side Kent, on the South side the Sea, on the West side Hampshire, and on the South the River of Tamis: it containeth the Diocesses of Chichester, and part of Winchester.

Ale the eight from Woden, with his three sons Cimen, Pleneing, and Cissa, came into Brittain with 3. ships, landed in a place called Hamenstowe, and there slew many of the Britains, & forced the rest to make their flight into a wood which is called Andredesleage. Afterward fighting with the Britains in a place nere unto spactodes burne, slew many of them, and put the rest to flight.

Cissa his sonne succeeded, he built the cite of Cissacester now called Chichester, & named it after his owne name, he reigned, as it is said, lxxvi. yeres. Thelwulfus (whome Bede nameth Edelwach) was chrisened in the prouince of the Mercies, in the presence and at the exhortation of E. First chris-ened King in Southsex.

Willride the Bpshope came to the prouince of the South Saxons, unto them did he minister the worde of faith, by the permission and great reioicing of the king. This Bpshope chrisened the chiefe Lordes and Knightes of the Countrey: and the rest of the people at the same time, or soone after were chrisened by other Bpshoppes. The Quene Ebba was chrisened in her Isle which was in the prouince of the Viccians: for she was the daughter of Eanfride, who was Eanheres brother, where were both Chistian men, and all their people. But all the prouince of South Saxons had neuer before that time heard of the name of God, nor the faith. Yet there was in that countrey a certaine Spoke, a Scot borne, named Dicub, which had a very little Monasterie in a place called Bosanham, all compassed about with woods and the sea, and therein b. or vi. brethren seruing God in humble and poore life, but none of the people there did giue themselves either to followe their life, or heare their preaching: but when Bpshope Willride came and preached the Gospell unto them, he deliuered the people not onlie from the perill of damnation, but also from an horrible murrain of tempo:all death, for in 3. yeres before, it had not rained in all those quarters, whereby a famine destroyed the people by heapes, in so much that diuers times 40. or 50. in a company being famished for hunger, would go together to some roche or sea bank, and cast themselves all downe, either to be killed with the fall, or drowned in the sea: but on the same day they receiued baptisme and faith, there fell a plentifull shoure of rayne, wherewith the earth flourish again. This Bpshope also taught the people there to get their sustenance by fishing.

Ceadwall a valiant yong man of the West Saxons, being banished from his Countrey, came with an hoste of men and slew King Edilwach, wasted that prouince, cruellie murdered and spoiled euerie where. Edilwach reigned xxx. yeres.

And soone after Ceadwall was slayen out by two Captaines of the Kinges, Berham and Anthun, which from that time did holce and keepe the Dominion of that prouince, the chiefe of which two, was afterwarde slaine of the same Ceadwall, (being then king of the West Saxons,) and the prouince subdured and brought into more grieuous subiection then it was before. Againe Ine that reigned reigned after Ceadwall oppressed it with like misery & bondage many yeres, whereby it came to passe, that the people of Southsex in all this time could haue no Bpshope of their owne: but were saine (their first Bpshope Willride being called home to Poike) to be vnder the Dioces of the Genies which belonged to the West Saxons, as many as were in the territorie of Selley.

After that Ceadwall had thus obtained the kingdome of the West Saxons, hee took the Isle of Wight also, which was so altogether giuen to the wo: shipping of Booles, that he intended utterly to banish and drive out thence all the olde native inhabitants, and to put people of his owne Countrey in their place. For though he was not yet at that time baptised, and regenerate in Christ, yet he bound himselfe with a vow, that if he took the Island, he would giue vnto God the fourth part thereof, and of all the pray. Which thing he so performed, that Bpshope Willride happening to bee there at that time, a man of his owne countrey, he offered and gaue the same vnto him, to the use and seruice of our Lord. The said Island contained as the English did rate it, 1200. tenements, wherof was giuen to the Bpshope, the possession of the land of three hundred tenements, which portion the Bpshope gaue and committed to one of his Clerkes named Bernice, and appointed thereto a Priest named Hildila, to minister the worde and baptisme of life to all that would bee saued. Two children of the bloud Royall, being brethren to Drualde King of that Island, being fledde into the next prouince of the Vices, where they had hidden themselves in a place called Stonestat, were betrayed and found out, whome the king commanded to be put to death. Which thing when a certaine Abbot named Cimerber had heard of, whose monasterie was not far from thence, at a place called Redford, he came to the king, and desired him that if hee would needs haue the children put to death, yet they might first receiue the Sacraments of Christs Church. The king granted his request, and then hee took and Catechised them in the faith of Christ and washed them with the font of Baptisme, made them sure in perfect hope to enter the kingdome euertlasting, then were they put to death by the hangman, when after this order all the prouince of great Britaine had receiued the faith of Christ, the Isle of Wight receiued the same also: In which notwithstanding, because of the misery and state of foraine subiection, no man took the degra of the Spinsterie and place of a Bpshope, before Daniel, who was Bpshope of the West Saxons, and of the Genies, Suffer and Hampshire.

East Angles.

East Angles the third kingdome, contained the Countreies of Norfolk and Suffolke, Cambridge, and the Isle of Ely, which had on the East and North sides the Sea, on the West, Saint Edmondes Dyke, with a part of Hertfordshire, and on the South side Essex. It containeth the Diocesses of Norwich and Ely.

The same Redwalde was by the perswasion of Edwine baptized, but in vaine, for after by his wifes counsell he fell from the faith againe, his sonne Dorwaldus in pure and vncorrupted Christianitie was slaine by the heathen Roobert. Redwaldus reigned 11. yeres.

554 GErpenwalde sonne to Redwaldus, succeeded in the kingdome of the East Angles, reigned 11. yeres.

569 Sebert brother to king Carpenwalde, took vpon him the kingdome, a man sin all pointes learned, and most Christian, who whilste his brother was yet liuing, being himselfe banished into France, was there baptized and instructed in the faith, of which faith he laboured to make all the Realme partakers, as soone as he came to the Crowne. To whose good endeavour, Byschoppe Felix did greatly applie himselfe. Who when hee came from Burgundy (where hee was borne) into Bytanie to Honorius the Archbyschoppe, and had obtained licence of him to preach the worde of God vnto the forsaide East Angles, his zeale and vertuous desire proued not in vaine, for he found in that nation plenteousnesse of fruite, and encrease of people that beloued him. For he brought all this prouince vnto the faith, and workes of iustice, and in the ende to rewarde of perpetuall blessednesse, according to the abode ment of his name, which in Latine is called Felix, and in our English tongue, Happie, he was made Byschop of Dunmoke, or Dunwich, an ancient Cite in Suffolke nowe soe decayed, and as is supposed more then halfe swallowed vp in the Sea.

The common fame, and report of the inhabitants is, that befoze the toliue came came to decaye, there belonged therunto two and fiftie decaine houses, as 33 parish Churches, Byschoppes, Hospitallies, and Chappells, as manie Cellidnalls, and as manie toppes Shippes. But certayne it is, as appeareth by manifest and sounde recorde which I haue seene, that euen of late time, there was within the sayde Towne fye parish Churches, two houses of Friers, an house which had bene of Templars, two Hospitallies, and thre Chappelles, foure of the parish Churches are now of late swallowed vp in the Sea, and but two of them remaining on the land, to wit, Saint Peters, and all Saintes. The men of Dunwich desiring succour for their Towne against the rage of the sea, affirme that a great peece of a Forrest, sometime thereby, is deuoured and turned to the vse of the Sea.

There hath bene a Spynt, manie men of that Towne can yet thewe of the coines, which are sterling pence, with this inscription, Civitas Dunwic, twenty of which pence waighed an ounce, 12. ounces a pound Troy, and so being 11. s. in money, was both a pound in payment, & also a pound in waight, as is aforesaid. This City was gouerned by a Mayor and thre Bailiffes besides inferior officers, Felix their first Byschop fate 18. yeres, and ended his life there in Anno 649. and was buried at Seham, a place where sometime a great famous monastery stode replenished with religious persons, vnder their Abbat Warfrid, which house was founded by a Noble man named Lutinus, and was wholie subuerted by the Danes: the bodie of Felix was removed to Ramscote. Byschop Felix founded a Church at Radham, which was also amongst other destroyed by the Danes. Felix also founded Schooles at Felixstowe, nowe called Fishcote. After Felix succeeded Thomas, a Deacon, borne in Germany, hee fate nine yeres. After him Beretgillus surnamed Bonifacius, a Kentish man borne, fate seuentene yeres. After him succeeded Bisi, who doted the Sea into two Byschoppickes, to wit, Dunwich, and Helmhaim. Thus much for Dunwich.

Sebert the King being desirous to followe the good order which he had seene in France, set vp Schooles in his kingdome (by the ayde of Felix, whome hee had taken out of Lent for that purpose) appointing masters and teachers to bring by children in learning and vertue, after the manner of the Kentishmen. This Sebert was so inflamed with the loue of heauen, that leaving at the last all affaires of his Realme to the gouernement of his cousin Egike, he became a Monk, and entred a monastrie by him builded, wherein hee bestowed his time in diuine studies, and contemplation: but the bylawish Englishmen with their old Captaine Penda, inuaded his dominions, so that his people after long resistance, finding themselves too weak, they pluckt Sebert out of the monastrie, and brought him against his will vnto the field, whereof the cruell heathen people he was killed, with king Egike, and the whole armie discomfited, about the yere of Christ 652.

A Nna the sonne of Ewide brother to Edwald succeeded Egicus, and was likewise slaine by the furie of Penda, Captaine of the Danes, or Unlawful Englishmen, then heathen and vncristened people, when he had reigned nineteene yeres, and was buried at Biddiburg, in which place also was buried his sonne Firminus, but was after translated to S. Edmundsb. ric. He had issue by his wife Herefwida daughter to Herericus the nephew of Ardwine king of Northumbers, sister to Hilda, Etheldred, Ethelburga, and Saxburg. Etheldred daughter to Anna founded the Church of Saint Peter in the Isle of Ely, in the yere of Christ 674, placing there an hundred persons of both sexes, under monasticall habite, and she her selfe became their first Abbesse. This Countrey of Ely is a province of the East English, and containeth about two hundred householdes, and is compassed on eche side, as an Island round about with fens or waters: and for that many Ceeles are taken there, some suppose the said Isle to be called Ely: but other thinke the same to take name of Willowes, whereof the Isle aboundeth. The ground here is verie plentifull of all kinde of fruites, full of pleasant woods and vines, replenished with manie kindes of wilde beastes, foules and fishes, &c.

Aethelhere brother to Anna, succeeded, and both hee and Penda were slaine by Oswin king of the Northumbers, and that deserviedly, because he had ayded Penda against his owne brother, and his kinsman.

Ethelbert succeeded him: he had by his wife Laenorine a sonne named Ethelbert.

Ethelbertus his son succeeded in the kingdom of the East Angles. This man in his youth much profited in learning, not given to voluptuous pleasures, but to prayers, almes, and other good woorkes, hee was profounde in counsell, mercifull in judgement, and sober in speech, he was at length perswaded to marry, for hee increase of children, whereunto he assented. At length, Offa king of the Mercies, being decreit, when strength failed, for this king Ethelbert, promised him manie great things, but when he had got him into his Pallace, which was at Sutton Wallis three miles from Herefords Northward upon Luggie in Herefordshire, by the counsaile of the said Offas wife, for ambition of his kingdom, caused his head to be stricken off, by one Grimbert a familiar to king Offa, on the eighteenth daie of Maie: his bodie was buried on the bankes of the river Luggie, where now standeth the parish Church of Spaurdine. And so Offa unloosly invaded and obtained the kingdom of the East Angles: but when a Virgin named Alfrede, daughter to Offa, whom Ethelbert should have married, understood thereof, shee willed his servants to haake them into their Countrey, for their Master was beheaded. And being taught by the Holy Ghost, prophesied to her mother in this manner, quoth she, I by some shall not live three yeres, and the kingdom shall be unstable, and thou thy selfe shalt not live in the confession of God over three moneths, but shalt be possessed with a wicked spirit, and shalt cate thine owne tongue, and die an evill death: And it followed (saith mine Author) as the Virgins had spoken: which Virgin vowed to live a religious life, and became an Abbesse at Crowland.

When king Offa heard hereof, he repented him, and caused the boote of Ethelbert to be remooved to Hereford three miles from Kenchester, and from miles miles from Sutton Wallis, where after ward over him was builded a goodly Church by king Milfride, which Church he endowed with great possessions, and made the same a Bishops See: since which time the Church is dedicated to the said Ethelbert.

At Sutton Wallis there appeareth yet notable ruines of some ancient and great building, and therefore great likelihood that it was sometime the mansion house of king Offa, at such time as Kenchester stode, or else hereof was a beginning. Spaurdine village is about a mile from Sutton Wallis, and hard by is a hill whereas men saie Saint Ethelbert was beheaded. At this village is now a faire Church dedicated to Ethelbert. I thinke he was slaine at Sutton in king Offas house, but his name of Spaurdine seemeth to expresse the martyrs hill.

Kenchester three miles from Herefords Westward, a mile from the bankes of the river. There was a pallace of Offas (as some say) the ruines yet remaine, there hath bene found ditches and fiores. This towne is farre more ancient then Hereford, it standeth on the same side of the river Wale, and three miles or more above Hereford, and was in the Romans time, as appeareth by many things, especially by antique monies of the Cæsars very often found within the towne, & in plowing there about, the which, the people there calleth dwarfe money. The compass of Kenchester hath bin by estimation as much as Hereford, excepting the Castell, the which at Hereford is very spacious: peeces of the walles and towres yet appeare from the foundation: the people of Hereford have setcht much awaie from thence to build withall. The place where the towne was, is all overgrowne with byambles, hazles, and like shrubs, there hath ben found in our time Brytaine byrches, conduites for water, stoned pavements, peeces of golde, and other strange things. To be short, of the decay of Kenchester Hereford rose and flourished.

The towne of Hereford is large and strongly walled, also having a maine Castell, hard by the ripe of Wale: the Castle is thought nigh as great of circuit as Windsoze. The dungeon of the Castle is high, and strong, and in the dike not farre from it is a faire spring called Saint Ethelberts well. Within the Castle in digging hath bene found bones of men of great bignesse, and hard by in the ripe of the bankes also is found the like bones: the wall of the towne is compassed with a dike, alway filled with morish water descending into it: this water refresheth to the bottome of Wale. There be in the town foure parish Churches, one being the Cathedrall Church of a very strong building. So Ethelbert was buried there (but since the Welchmen destroyed the towne in king Edward the Confessors time, his reliques have not bene seene there) there be in the suburbs two parish Churches, there hath bene a cell of blacke Monkes, and two houses of friars black and gray. Some say that this towne take the name of an olde ford or passage over Wale, not farre from the castle: some say it was called Fernlege, or Fernehill: and the place where the cathedrall church now is, was a chapel of our Lady called Fernlege. Thus much for Hereford.

violence done by the Mercians, untill Edmund boine in Sarouie, in the Citie of Northenberge sonne to king Alkemon and Quene Syware. In which time reigned in East Angles a king named Offa, who minting a voyage to the holy land, took his journey through Sarouie, there to visite his cousin Alkemon, and his nephew Edmond, which Edmond hee adopted to be his heire of East Angles. Nowe it so happened, that the saide Offa, having accomplished his voyage at the holy sepulture, and returning, deceased at Port Saint George, having before sent his ring to Edmond, making him gouernor of the East Angles, his father Alkemon provided him of men famous by experience, both in armes and gentleness; he had also clearkes circumspect & wise, to counsell him; he stuffed his ships with men and victuall: which thing done, and leaue taken of his father and mother, he sailed, and landed in East England, at a place called Spaydenboure, where falling on his knees, he made deuoute prayer vnto God, that his coming thither might be to him acceptable, and to all the countrey profitable. And not farre from thence he builded a rovall Towre, which to this day is called Hunstantone, which betokeneth sweetnesse and great might: there he helde his householde nigh one yere, and then remoued to the Saron tounge, where he remained one whole yere, and learned his psalter in the Saron tongue, which booke was referred in the lienestrie of the Monasterie of Saint Edmundsbury, till the same Church was suppressed in the reigne of king Henry the eight, as I haue bene credibly informed.

Edmond reigned xv. yeres, in whose time Hinguar and Hubba, Danish kings, entring the prouince of the Northumbers, raged ouer all the same, and made great spoiles. Hinguar hauing gotten a great pray, left Hubba, and with his Raue sailed into East Angles, and arrived at a certaine Citie ther called bynawares to the Citizens, set it on fire, and slew both man, woman and child. This wicked Hinguar toke Edmond king of that prouince, in a village then called Heglidune, nere to a wood bearing the same name, where this holle Edmond being constant in the Christian faith, was first by the Pagans beaten with bats, then scourged with whips, he still calling on the name of Iesus: his aduersaries in a rage shot him full of shafts, and then smote off his head and threw it into a bush: after which time the Angles ceased to reigne in the East Angles, but the same was possessed by Danes, till fiftie yeres after, that Edward the sonne of Etheldred did expulse the Danes, and toynd that prouince, and also the East Saxons, to his kingdome of the West Saxons.

East Saxons.

After the fourth kingdome contained Essex, Middlesex, and Hertfordshire, being bounded on the East with the German Ocean, on the South with the riuer Thames, on the West with Colne, and on the North with Stowe, which at this date parteth Suffolke from Essex: it containeth the diocesse of London.

Erchenwine,

Erchenwine, the eight from Woden, from whom all the Saxons deriued their genealogies, first erected this Countrey to a kingdome, which neuertheless he held as feodarie to the kings of Kent, who were as yet the very Queraigns of the whole Countrey from Thames to Humber. And as we haue specified, Voriger yielded seizon to Hengist for his deliuerie, when 6 yeres of the Wyrtines were slaine on Salisbury plaine, and he taken prisoner.

Sleda the sonne of Erchenwine succeeded his father in the gouernment, and to establish the state more sure, married Ricula the daughter of Ermenich king of Kent, and enioyed his gouernment so quietly, that he ministred small matter to Historiographers.

Ebert the sonne of Sleda by Ricula, ruled this kingdome after his father. The second yere of his reigne, which was the yere of Christ 604 Augustine Archbishop of Canterburp, consecrated two Bishops, the one named Miletus, the other Iustus, Miletus hee appointed to preach to the people of the East Saxons, which are separate from Kent with the riuer of Thamis, & are fast toynd to the East sea, whose chiefe Citie is London, a princely port town, of many people, arriving thither by sea and land. Nowe as some as this prouince, by the preaching of Miletus, had receiued the word of truth.

Ethelbert king of Kent builded in the Citie of London S. Pauls Church, wherein Miletus and his succedours were appointed euer after to haue their Sea. Iustus was ordained Bishop of Rochester in Kent, where king Ethelbert builded the Church of S. Andrew the Apostle, and gaue many goodly gifts to the Bishops of both Churches. Which Ethelbert in his Charter to the Church of S. Paul, hath these wordes: Adilbertus Rex, Deo inspirante, pro anime sue remedio dedit Episcopo Miletio terram que appellatur Tillingham ad monasterium sue solatium scilicet S. Pauli. Ego Rex Ethelbert ita firmiter concedo tibi praesuli Miletio potestatem eius habendi & possidendi, ut in perpetuum in monasterio uolente permaneat, &c.

Afterward king William the first, surnamed Conquerour, by his Charter, confirming the lands given by the saide Ethelbert king of Kent, to the saide Church of Saint Paul in London, hath these wordes: Wilhelmus Rex Anglorum omnibus fidelibus suis Francis & Anglis de Middlesex salutem. Sciatis, quod concedo Deo & sancto Paulo suisque seruitoribus 24. hidos quos Rex Ethelbertus dedit ecclesie sancti Pauli iuxta ciuitatem London, quando eam fundauit, in perpetuum liberam esse, & solutam & quietam de Dane-gildis & omnibus alijs gildis, & ab omni expeditione, & ab omni opere, & uolo, & firmiter precipio, ut bene & honorifice, & in pace teneant, & ne aliquis super hoc eis iniuriam vel contumeliam faciat. Teste Lanfranco archiepiscopo, &c. Moreover, besides this confirmation aboute saide, the same king William gaue vnto the Church of Saint Paul in London, and vnto Mawrice then Bishoppe thereof, the Castell of Stotford, or Stotford in Essex, and all thinges which belonged thereto, and namely, the land which William the Deacon, and Ralph the brother held of the king. Thus much for the foundation of Saint Pauls Church in London, founded by Ethelbert king of Kent, and constructed by king William the Conquerour.

king Sebert, by the perswasion of king Ehelbert his uncle, and through the preaching of Miletus, having embraced Christianitie, was baptised by the same Miletus, and immediately, to shewe himselfe a Christian, built a church to the honour of Saint Peter, on the west side of London in a place, which because it was overgrown with thornes, and environed with waters, the Saxons at that time called it Athorney, and now of the monastrie, and west situation thereof, is called Westminster. In this place long before was a temple of Apollo (as Sulcardus writeth) which being overthrowne with an earthquake, Lucius then built thereon a Church for the Christians. Sebert (when he had reigned thirtene yeres) died, and was buried in the Church which he had built, with his wife Aethelgoda, whose bodies manie yeres after, to witte, in the time of Richard the second (late Thomas Walsingham) were translated from the olde Church to the newe at Westminster, and there entered.

Serred, Seward and Sigbert, sonnes of Sebert, jointly (as it seemeth) then ruled Essex, men wickedlie given, irreligious, and deadly enemies to the Christian profession: who presumed contemptuously to the Table of the Lords supper, being not baptised: and because Miletus would not permit them to be partakers of the christian sacrament, they expelled him from his See at London, but shortly after Serred encountering with the West Saxons, was slain with both his brethren by king Kingesles.

Sigbert (surnamed the Little, sonne of Seward succeeded in this kingdom, and left the same to Sigbert his kinsman.

Bede.

Sigbert sonne to Sigbalde, brother to Sebert, then ruled in Essex, by the perswasion of Oswy king of Northumbers, abandoned all superstition, and became a christian, and took an holie man Ced with him, who did mightily brate downe errors, and wanne many by preaching the christian religion in his dominions, whereupon Ced was by Finan consecrated Bishop of the East Saxons, and then proceeded with more authoritie in his function, ordering priestes and Deacons in all places of Essex, but especially at Thancester and Silberie.

Ralph Cogshall.

In the good proceedings of Sigbert, he was slain by a kinsman of his own, upon none other occasion, but for that he used too much clemencie towards his enemies, as the murderers themselves confessed.

Swidelin son of Sexbald succeeded then in his regiment, who was baptised by Ced in a town of the kings called Wendlesham in East England; Edelwald king of the East Angles, brother to Anna, was his godfather at the font.

Sigher then ruled with Sebba or Sebbi, although they were also under the allegiance of Wulhere king of the middle Englishmen. This province being visited with a great plague and mortallitie, Sigher with the people unto whom he ruled, forsaking Christs religion, fell to Apostasie, for both the king himselfe, himselfe, and many of his people, as well of the nobles as of the meaner sort, beganne to renew their temple, which had stood desolate, they worshipped their Idoles, as though they could by that means have escaped the mortallitie. But Sebbi his companion, with all under him, persevered devoutly in the faith, and he ended his life in great felicitie, as we shall hereafter declare. Wulhere the king understanding part of his dominions to fall from the faith, for to call them backe againe, sent unto them Iarumanus the bishop of Lichfield, (successor to Trunihere, who by much labour and diligence, being a man of great vertue, painefull and zealous (as a certaine priest waiting then upon him, and helping him in preaching the Gospell reported unto Bede) brought them to the faith againe, both the king and all his people, so that abandoning, and overthrowing downe their Temples and Altars, they opened againe the churches, confessed gladly the name of Christ, and chose rather in hope of resurrection to die, then in the filth of idolatrie to live. Which being so brought to passe, their priestes and instructors returned home with much joy and comfort.

Theodore Archbishop of Canterbury appointed Erkenwald to be bishop of the East Saxons in the citie of London. This Erkenwald, in the yere of Christ 677. before he was made bishop, had builded two goodly monasteries, one for himselfe at Crotsey in the Isle of Crote in Surrey, by the river of Thames: and another for his sister Edilburge, in a place called Berching in Essex, for his sister Ethelburge she was first Abbas there. Sebbi king of the East Saxons (as is aforesaid) a man very devout and goodly, being given to often praise, and charitable almes giving, esteeming the solitary and monasticall life, before all the riches and honors of a kingdom, which kind of life he had long time before taken, & had given by his kingdom, had not his wife refused to be separated from him. And therefore some men thought (as it had bene often said) that a man of such a nature and well disposed minde, was more meete to be made a bishop then a king. Now when this soldier of the Ecclesiasticall kingdom had passed a xxx. yeres in his temporall raigne, at length he died: but first he admonished his wife, that then at the least they should wholly give themselves both together to serve God, whereas they could no longer now enjoy or serve the world together. Which thing, when he had with much ado obtained of her, he came to his bishop of London, named Waldhere, who had succeeded Erkenwald, and at his hands received the habite of religion, which hee had long desired, to wit, of a Monk, for at that time were Monks in the Church of St. Paul in London, as writeth Radulphus Dediceto and other.

So this Bishop he brought a great summe of money to be bestowed and given to the poore, reserving nothing at all for himselfe, but rather desiring to remaine poore in spirite for the kingdom of Heaven. And when he perceived the day of his death to be at hand, because his foresaide sickness grewe still upon him, for the princely and banke courage that he had, he beganne to feare least at his death, through bitter paine, he might hap, either to utter with his mouth, or with his body do any thing that were not decent for his person, he sent for the bishop of London, where he also then continued, and desired him that at his departing out of this world, there should be no more present but himselfe, and two of his Chaplaines: which thing when the Bishop had promised glablie to do, the third day after he gaue by the ghost, and was buried in a coffin of stone, and laid in the Church of the blessed Apostle Saint Paul, by whose good lessons hee had bene taught to labour, and long for the toyes of heauen.

Sigehard sonne of Sebbi, then reigned ouer the East Saxons for a time, and after him his brother Seofide.

Seofide sonne to Sebbi, and brother to Sigehard, reigned next successuallie, of whome I find nothing recorded of his auns.

Offa the sonne of Sigher then ruled this prouince, hee enlarged with building, and enriched with lands the Church of Westminster, and then forsaking his wife Genesuede Pendaes daughter, lands, kinne, and countrey, he went to Rome with Kenred king of Mercia, and Edwine Bishoppe of Worcester, and there in a Spontane came ended this life, leaving Seled to rule his country.

Seled (whome other call Colred) peaceable after Offa reigned in Essex thirtie yeres, and at length was slaine.

Seled after Seled was slaine, reigned in Essex: but Egbert king of the West Saxons, the very yere that hee conquered Kent, subdued also this Sussex, annexed Essex to his kingdom: yet London with the countrie continuing about it, came not in subiection to the West Saxons, but obeyed the king of Mercia, as long as that kingdom continued.

Sigehrike and Sigehard after wards aspired to the kingdom of the East Saxons, but with no good successe, and so that kingdom ceased,

Mercians.

Mercia the fifth kingdom and greatest of the other, contained Gloucester, Hereford, Chester, Stafford, Worcester, Oxford, Marlborough, Darby, Leicester, Buckingham, Northampton, Nottingham, Lincoln, Bedford, Huntingdon, and part of Hartford shires. It had on the West side, the river Dee fall by Chester, and Severne fall by Shrotonbury into Wirslow: in the East, the East sea: in the South, Thames into London: in the North the river Humber, and so Westward, downe to the river Merce, unto the conner of Wykehall.

This kingdom of Mercia in the beginning was departed into thrie partes, into West Mercia, middle Mercia, and East Mercia: it containeth the diocesses of Lincoln, Worcester, Hereford, Coventry and Lichfield.

Reda (the eleuenth from Woden) first king of the Mercians reigned tenne yeres.

Wibba his sonne reigned twenty yeres,

Ceorlus his sonne reigned ten yeres.

Penda the sonne of Wibba, a man active in wars, a frantike and most wicked man, took on him the kingdom of the Mercians, when he was thirtie yeres olde: hee shooke the Cities, and disturbed the borders of the kingdom.

here his olde countrey men boie: hee slawe Edwine and Oswald, kings of Northumberland, (where Oswald was slaine is now situate the Towne of Oswalstre, which of him take that name) he also slawe Sigbert, Egfride, and Anna, kings of the East Angles, which all were of holie life and conuersation: hee banished Kenwallus king of West Saxons, but in the ende, himselfe was slaine by Osfin which succeeded Oswald his brother, when hee had reigned thirtie yeres.

Peda the sonne of Penda, succeeded in part of the kingdom which was called middle England, who coming after to Osfine king of Northumberland, requited his daughter Alsfede to wife, which sute he obtained, vpon condition he would receiue the christian faith, and be baptized: and so hee receiued Baptisme at the hands of Bishop Finan, in a famous Towne of the kinges called Ad murum, by the Herts wall, twelue miles from the East Sea, from whence he returned home with 4. priestes, notable for learning and vertue, which should instruct and baptize his people. These preached the worde of God, and were gladly heard, whereby manie dauple, as well noble, as of the base sorte, renounced their filthie idolatrie, and were baptized. Neether king Penda father to the yong Prince did withstand the preaching of the Gospell in his dominion, but persecuted such as bare the names of christians, and liued not accordingly, saying, that such men were wretched which regarded not to serue the God in whom they professed to beleeue. These things began thus two yeres before the death of Penda.

In the daies king Osfine, after often and cruel inuasions of the heathen tyrant Penda, forced of necessitie offered manie and most precious iewels, with an infinite summe of treasure, to redeeme quiet and peace to his Countrey, but the barbarons tyrant, pursuing his deadly enterprise, and protesting bitterly to extinguish the whole nation from the highest to the lowest. King Osfine called to God for help against his enemies, bowing, that if he had the upper hand, his yong daughter should be consecrated to God in perpetuall virginittie, and twelue farme places with the land, should be converted to the erecting of monasteries. When preparing himselfe to battell, with a verie small armie, the army of the Heathen reported to be thirtie fold as manie, hee overcame them: and this is to be noted as a great helpe to the Christians, that whereas the field was fought nigh to the river Turuent, the saide river did at that time so overflowe the banks and felles about, that in the sight of the heathen more were drowned then perished by the sword. And thus was king Pendaes poluer overcome, and himselfe slaine, when he had reigned 92. yeres cruelle thirtie yeres. This Penda (saith Ingulphus) had sonnes that were most devout maintainers of Christian religion, to wit, Peda, Vifere, Ethelred, Marwald, and Mercelin, and daughters, Knisburge and Kenelwith, both for holie conuersation excellent. The foresaid battell was fought by king Osfine, in the countrey of Leid, the thirtieth yere of his reigne, the yere of Christ 659. the sixtieth daie of November. Osfine hauing obtained this victory, rendered due thanks therefore to God, gaue his daughter Alsfede to be brought vp and consecrated to perpetuall virginittie, and also the twelue possessions promised hee performed.

Oswine now reigning ouer the Mercies, and ouer the South people of England, subdued also the places, for the most part, to his allegiance: he founded Lichfield, and procured it to be a Cathedrall Church of that province: Dwin was first Bishop of Mercia, also of Lindsey; for there were then so fewe Priests, that one Bishop was compelled to gouerne two Provinces. This Dwin was a Scottish man, and gouerned the Church of Lichfield two yere, and died at fepping. The seconde Bishopp was Cellaeh, a Scot, who ere long lefte his Bishoppicke, and went to Lindesferne. The seuenth Sexulfus a great builder of Peterborough Abbey: after whose deceale, two Bishops ruled the province of kingdome of Mercia, to wit, Winifrede at Chester, and Heda at Lichfield, after Winifred was reioiced: and Hilda fate alone, and died in the yere of Christ 721. 4c. Noie concerning the name of Lichfield. Iohn Rouse saith there was in Biptaine a great number of Chelicans, which hearkened to the preaching of Amphibal (Instructor of Albon) martyred and slayne in a place at Lichfield, called Cadaverum campus, a place of dead bodies, &c. This towne, for the most part, standeth upon a lode and equall ground, onely the close and the cathedrall church, with a long strate, that lieth north on the bidge of the Towne, is somewhat upon a high ground: there is no token that euer the Towne was walled: a ditch was made in a part of the Towne by Langton Bishop of Lichfield. There hath bene a castell of auncient time, but no part of it standeth: the place of the ditch is sene, and is yet called Castell-furche. In the maine Towne, which is a faire largething, be thre parish churches, S. Maries, a right beautifull peece of worke, in the berie market heade, whereas was a Colde or brother hoo, begunne about king Edward the thirde time, and since much encreased by one Heywood, Deane of Lichfield. Saint Nicholas in the South-east ende of the Towne: Stowe Church in the East ende of the Towne, whereas is Saint Ceddes Well, a thing of pure water, where is sene a stone in the bottoime, on the which (some saie) that Cedde was wont to stande and praye. At this stone Cedde had his Maroey in the time of Vicer king of the Mercians: at which time, all the countrie about Lichfield was a forest and wildeernes. There was an house of Saint Iohn in the berie South ende of the Towne, where in was a Master and fellowes. Smith Bishop of Couentrie and Lichfield, in king Henrie the seuenths dayes, and afterwarbes Bishop of Lincoln, beganne a newe foundation at this place, setting vp a Master, two Priests, and tenne poore men in an Hospitall, bee set there also a Schoole master and an Usher to teach a Grammar schole. King Henrie the seuenth gaue onto it an olde Hospitall called Denhall in Wyzehall in Cheshire, with the lands and the impropriation of Burton Church in Wyzehall: there was an house of gray friars in the South-west parte of the Towne, Alexander Bishop of Lichfield was the founder of it. There cometh a conduite of water out of an hill to the Towne, and hath two caisterles, one in the East wall of the friars close, and the other about the market place, besides water to serue the close and the Prebendes houses. There was a faire olde Crosse, enuironed with steppes in the market place: Denton Deane of Lichfield compassed this Crosse with eight faire Arches of stone, making a rounde vault ouer them for market folkes to stande vnder in, it did cost him a hundred and thyselcore poundes. The South part of Lichfield is diuided from the South part with thre ponde or lakes, whereof both the two first lying by west, are nothing so great as the thirde that lyeth by East: there bee diuers Springes in these podes, but the principall Spring is a brooke that entereth into them and feedeth them, coming from Dwe about a mile and halfe by West from Lichfield: the first westward pole is diuided from the second pole by a great maine causeway, walled on eue side with stone, and in this causeway be Arches of stone for the water to issue into the second pole: and this causeway serueth to come out of the South part of the Towne into the North. This causeway was last made by Langon Bishop of Lichfield. There is also a stone causeway, and an issue for the water betwixt the second pole and the third, leading out of the Towne hard to the South gate of the close of the Cathedrall Church: and on the East side of it, is a faire Mill, this causeway is little more then a quarter so long as the first. The third pole that lyeth by West, is a berie faire thing, and plentifull of fish, and goeth in length about halfe a mile or euer the whole water be drayne into a narrowe bottoime, that thre miles lower goeth into Trent, by the right riue.

The Cathedrall Church of Lichfield being first erected by king Oswyne, was of later times renouated and dedicated to Saint Mary and Saint Cedde. The whole close of the cathedrall church was newly ditched and walled by Bishop Langon, and he made one gate of a maiestie, and great strength at the West part of the close, and an other, but a lesse gate, at the Southeast part of the close: he made also the Bishops pallace, at the East end of the close: he made Collesball castell, Sheborowhe manour place, and the pallace by Strond at Alonon, besides many other great aces, he was treasurer to king Edward the first. The Prebendaries in the close be very faire builded. The Choristers haue a goodly house lately builded by Bishop Blyche. Faire well a small priorie of Runnes, suppressed by Thomas Wolsey Archbishop of Poche, and giuen to Lichfield, in recompence of a pension that should haue bene giuen out of his college in Eford, was impropriate to the Choristers of Lichfield. The Librarie, at the North-west part of the Cathedrall Church was erected by Thomas Haywood, Deane of Lichfield. The glorie of the Church is the worke of the West ende, that is exceeding costly and faire. There be thre pyramides of steeles of stone, two at the west ende, and one in the midst of the church. That parte of the Towne that lyeth by South the great causeway or bidge, is but one faire strate in length. And thus much for the Citie of Lichfield: all which sprang of the Monasterie there. King Oswyne came to Peda sonne to Penda, because hee married king Oswynes daughter as is afore thewed, the kingdome of the South marches, divided by the river of Trent from the north marches.

Peda nowe king of Mercia, being also the first Christian king of that kingdome, beganne to plant Christianitie, throwing downe, and destroying the Idoles, and erecting Churches of Christian Religion. Among the which, hee beganne the foundation of Weddhamstede, nowe called Peterborough; but hee raygned not long, for hee was trayterously slaine, by the means of Alfhede his wife, in the feast of Easter in the yere of Christ 657. And king Oswyre three yeres after his great victorie ouer the cruell Pagan Penda, the Nobilitie of the Mercians Lumin, Eaba, and Eadbert rebelled against him, advancing to the Crowne Vlfere brother to Peda.

Vlfere brother to Peda, earnestly preferred christianity, which his brother had begunne, but he was the first (sayeth William of Malmesburie,) that through the sinne of Symonie, solde the Episcopie of London unto Wyna.

I reade in a Legar Booke of the Monasterie of Peterborough, that Vlfere king of Mercia, remaining at his Castell of Ulstercester in Staffordshire, and understanding that his sonne Vlfade, had led his brother Rufe to Chad (under colour of hunting) by whome they were both instructed in the Christian faith, and had receaved Baptisme, hee by perswasion of Werobode, goeth to the Synagoge of the Iolic man, where finding both his kinsmen in devout contemplation, hee killed them with his owne handes, whose Bodies Ermenhelde the Quene their mother did burie in a Sepulchre of stone, and in proceesse of time, caused a Church of stone there to bee builded: which place was after called Stones, by reason of the stones which the multitude brought thither for the building thereof, when they came to frequent the place.

But Vlfere after, repenting thereof, destroyed all the Temples of the Idoles, and in place of the same did build Churches and Monasteries, among the which hee bestowed great coſt on Weddhamstede, enriching it with large possessions.

This Church standeth in the Prouince of Gertwor: such as inhabit the Fennes, and maie not bee come thitho, except on the East side: on the South side whereof doth run the River of Fenne, in the midst of the which course is a place, as it were, a Chirkpole, which is so deepe and colde, that in the Summer none can swimme o' vnto the bottome, and yet it is never frozen in the Winter: (as they saie) there is a Fountaine, out of the which issueth water, which place the Ancients did name Weddewell, of which the Monasterie built hard by was called Weddhamstede, which the three brethren, Peda, Vlfere, and Ethelred, the sonnes of Penda, with their sisters, Kenesburg, and Keneswith, and king Oswyne did build from the foundation. But Peda in the yere of Christ 675. with the devout multitude, by the help of Sexulfus first Abbot there, began this monastery, & laid y foundation there, of such stones as hee poked open could scarce draw one of them, which stones were same when the monastery monastery was burned. This Church was destroyed by the Danes, as all other monasteries were, & so remained 96. yeres, til the time that Ethelwald bishop of Essex coming into a place called Undal: Dundal, began there to make a new foundation, but after coming to Weddhamstede, which he found desolate, by the helpe of king Edgar and Adolphus his Chancelour, hee did newe repaire the monastery there: and the monastery at Dundal was made a parish church. In Anno 1117. this monastery of Weddhamstede with the whole Towne was burnt, but in the yere after begunne to bee newe builded by Abbot Iohn from the foundation, and the Monkes entred againe in the yere 1140. King Vikere raygned 17. yeres, and was buried at Lichfelde: Ermeneld his wife, after his decease became a Nun at Ely, under her mother Sexburg.

Ethelred brother to Vlfere succeeded in the kingdome of the Mercians: he obtained a Bishops See to be in the citie of Worcester: Boscellus was first Bishop there: Egwinus was the second. This Egwinus, by the helpe of Kenedus king of the Mercies founded the monastery of Euxham, in a place then called Couetham, of the Shepheardes field and boole, purchased by the said Bishop. The Towne in the Saxons time was called Ipoetholme. About the same time two Noblemen Odo and Dodo founded the priory of Etwelberie. Alfo Olficke Duke of Gloucester founded the monastery of Gloucester, the first Monks: since the same is a Bishops See. Ethelred became a Monk at Bardoney in Lincolnshire, when he had raygned 30. yeres.

Kenedus sonne to Wollerus, in the 6. yere of his raygne went to Rome, & became a Monk in the Church of S. Peter the Apostle, where he continued in fasting, prayer, and almes giving, untill his dying daie.

Ethelred the sonne of Ethelred, who as he was marvellous in prowesse against the West Saxons, so was he miserable by untimely death, for hee raygned not past 8. yeres, and was buried at Lichfelde.

Ethelbald raygned in continuall peace many yeres, and then by the procurement of Beuredus, was slaine of his owne tabicides. Unto this Ethelbald Boniface, the second Bishop of Atriche in Holland, after Archbishop of Spire upon the Rhene an Englishman borne, who was afterward martyred, for the profession of Christ and his holie Gospell, sent an Epistle, of the which I will here set downe a peece to bee seene, so that it sheweth patly the state of that time then present, and serveth for example in time to come.

This most dere Lord, and to be preferred in the love of Christ above all other kings of England, Edbaldus, Boniface Archbishop, the Germane Legate perpetual health of charitie and love in Christ. We acknowledge before God, that wee did reioice to heare of your prosperitie, your sayth and god woorkes: and wee bee sory when we heare any thing that goeth against you, eyther in successe of warre, or in danger of your soule, for we have heard, that you forbid theft and robbery, that you love peace, defende the widowe and the poore, for the which wee give God thanks: but in that you cease lawfull marriage, which if it were to the preferring of chastitie, it were commendable: and sith you wallow in lecherie and adultery with Virgins consecrate to God, it is both shamefull and damnable, for it doeth confounde you renowme, both before GOD and man, placing you among Idolaters, because you violate the Temple of GOD. Wherefore my deare sonne repent, and remember how filthy a thing it is, that thou, who by the gift of God raignest ouer so many nations, shouldst to the great displeasure of God, make thy selfe a bondslau to thine owne fleshly lust. We haue heard also, that the more part of noble men and people of the Mercians, by thine euill example, haue left their lawfull wiues, and haue defiled the wiues of other, and also Virgins, which, howe farre it differeth from all good order and honestie, let the Lawes of strange Nations teach you: for in the ancient Countrey of the Saxons (where was no knowledge of GOD) if either a maide in her fathers house, or being married to an husband, were become an aduoutresse, she should be strangled by her owne hand closed to her mouth, and the corrupter should be hanged vpon the pit where the aduoutresse was buried. If she were not so used (her garments being cut awaie vnto the girdle) the chaste Matrones did scourge and whippe her, and picke her with knives, and so was sent from Towne to Towne, where other flesh and new scourgers or whippers did more and whip her, vntill they had killed her. Likewise the Comedians, who are the most uncleane kinde of people, had this manner of blage with them, that the husband being dead, the woman, together with the dead body should cast her selfe headlong into the fired stake or pile of wood prepared for the burning of their bodies. If therefore the Gentiles (not knowing God) had so great zeale to chastitie, how much more (my deare sonne) is it to be required at thy hands, who art a Christian and a King? Haue therefore compassion of thine owne soule, and spare the great number of the people, that by thy fatherly example yet maie beware to offend God, for whose soules thou shalt giue an account. Consider also, that if the English Nation, despising lawfull matrimonie, doe encrease by aduoutrie, (as the Frenchmen, Italians, and also the verie Pagans doe cast in our teeth and hypraise vs withall,) of such continuations and copulations, shall spring by a peashy barbaric people, which shall despise God, and with their wicked qualities vndoe the Countrey, as it came to passe to the Burgundians, the people of France, and the Spaniards, whome the Saracens haue manie yerres assaulted for their sinnes which in times past they had committed. Besides this, it is tolde vs, that you take awaie priuiledges of Churches, and the rebey giue euill example vnto poor noble men to doe the like: but I pray you remember howe terrible vengeance God toke vpon the kings your predecessors, which committed such offences as we rebuke you for.

A wicked spiritte came vpon Solredus your predecessour, which was a defiler of Virgins, and a breaker of Ecclesiasticall priuiledges, for sitting roially among his Barons at a dinner, the Duell plucked awaie his soule without confession of his sinnes. The Duell also dwelt in such a rage, Othodus king of the Northumbres, which was guiltie of the same crimes, that with a vile death he lost both his kingdome and life in his lustie young age. Also Charles king of France which destroyed Churches, and altered the Church maner to his owne vse, was consumed with a long torment and fearefull death.

It

It followeth therefore (my deare beloued sonne) that with fatherly and earnest prayers wee beseech you, that you will not despise the Counsell of your fathers which diligentlie doe admonish your Highnesse, for nothing is more commodious to a good king, then willingly to amend such faults when hee is warned of them, as Salomon saith, Who so loueth Discipline, loueth Wisdome. Therefore (my deare sonne) declaring our aduice, we beseech you by the liuing God, by his sonne Iesus Christ our Lord, and by his holie spiritte, that you will remember howe transitorie this present life is, and howe short and momentane the pleasure of this fleshie flesh is, and howe vile and shamefull a thing it is, that man shall leane euill examples to his posteritie for euer: beginne therefore to frame your life in better waies, and amend the errors of your youth, that you may obtaine praise with men in this life, and eternall glorie in the life to come: We with your Highnesse well to fare, & to encrease in all godnesse.

Moreover, the same Bonifacius sent an Epistle of the like tenor vnto Cuthbert Archbishop of Canterbury, adding therunto, that he should rebuke the Clerges and Junnes for their finenes, and pompe of apparel and garmente. He also willed Cuthbert not to maruaile that he mebled with other mens matters, nor to thinke it no part of his charge, to deale with the English Nation, but to vnderstand that Gregorie Bishop of Rome had bounde him, by the Sacrament whise receiued, to let him vnderstand, of the maners and vsages of the Nations about him: which indeede (he saide) he would doe, if his gentle admonition toke not good successe.

The Epistle of Boniface to Ethelbalde toke such effect, that Ethelbalde forthwith sending to the Archbishop Cuthbert, and other his Clergie and nobilitie, by their counsell, amongst other things he caused to be published, as followeth:

I Ethelbalde King of the Mercians, foreséeing that I ought to prouide for the kingdome euerlasting, and the remedie of my soule, that I may be liuer it from the bondage of sinne. And forasmuch as Almighty GOD, by his mercifull clemencie, without any of my deserts going before, hath giuen me the Scepter of the kingdome, gladly therefore will I render vnto him of the things which he hath giuen me, and for this cause I glue this gifte by my life time.

That all Churches of my kingdome shall be discharged of all manner of tribute, in workes, and burdens, except it be in the building of Towers, Castles, and Bridges, which cannot be released vnto any. Moreover, that seruitours of Monasteries and Churches, shall haue their owne proper libertie in the profite of woods, & of fieldes, and shall not be bound to giue any reward vnto the king or Princes, except they will, but shall be free that they maie serue God, &c.

This Councell or conuocation was holden by Cuthbert the Archbishoppe of Cantuarie, and the other Bpshoppes and Brelates, in the yere of our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ, seven hundred, fourtie, and seven, and was in the thre and thirtie part of Ethelbalde king of the Mercians, who then was present with his Princes and Dukes, where then there was assembled out of diuers provinces of Brittain, Bishops and other spiritual persons, and the writings of Pope Zacharie were read in two partes, where with he did admonish the people of England to liue more continually, and threatened that the despisers of his commandments should be excommunicated: whereupon the Bishops and Prelates agreed vpon certaine Articles, as foloweth:

That the Prelates should liue more carefully and warne their fabiects.

That they should liue in one peaceable mind, although they liued separate in houses.

That euery pære they should visite their parishes and charge.

That euery one in his iurisdiction warne the Abbots and Monkes to liue orderly, and the Bishops not to oppresse their fabiects, but to cherish them.

That they also see that the Monasteries, the secular men that can not be taken away, be decently ordered.

That none be admitted to orders, unless his life before be well examined.

That the reading of holy Scriptures be frequented in the Monasteries.

That the Bishops be not buyers and sellers in worldly affaires.

That the Priests receiue no reward for baptizing of children and other Sacraments.

That they learne and teach in English the Lordes prayer and the Credo.

That al do finish their ministry after one & same manner in their churches.

That they sing seruaice in the Churches with labor voice.

That the solemnization of our Lord, and the byth daies of Saintes be solemnized at one and the same time.

That the Sunday be kept honourably holy.

That intercession be made for kings and rulers, &c. In all xxx. Articles.

Ethelbald founded the Monasterie of Crowland, and because the marsh of this Crowland, as the very name declareth (for it signifieth cruddy ground and mpyie) was not able to beare a stone building, the fornamed king caused many and mighty piles of Oake to bee dymen into the ground, and commanded hard earth to be brought thither nine miles off by water in boates, from the higher ground, and to be mingled with the marsh, and in this sorte he laid the foundation, and finished the Church of stone.

When Ethelbald had reigned xli. yeres, fighting against Cuthred, in the war not prudentlie begun, vpon Segiswald, or Secondone (as some say) thre miles from Tamworth, he was slaine of the tyrant Barred, and was buried at Wipendine or Wipon, at that time a famous monasterie.

Eareadus the murderer of Ethelbald did nothing worthy the remembrance, but was slaine by Offa, and had an end made for a traitor.

Offa nephew to Ethelbald succeded: hee toynded battell with Kinculfus King of the West Saxons, and got the victorie. He sent for Ethelbert King of the East Angles, promising great things by flatterie, but when he had gotten him to his Pallace, hee caused him to be beheaded, and then busilie vniued the kingdome of the East Angles, as is shewed in the reigne of the East Angles.

Vito Albani.

He caused the reliques of S. Alban to be taken up, and put in a Shyrine adorned with golde and precious stones, and builded there a Princely Monasterie, enduing the same with lands by his Charter, dated the yere of Christ, 793. in the yere of Offas reigne, 33. in the famous place called Celchyth, with the witnesse of himselfe, his sonne Egfride, 9. kings, 15. Bishops, 10. Dukes, &c.

He founded the Abbey of Bath.

He translated the Archbishops See to Lichfield.

He made a Dike betwixens Wales and the kingdome of the Mercies, which dike extendeth by South from the partes about Bristow, ouer the mountains of Wales, and so North toward Flint, and vnder a hill of coale, even to the mouth of the North Sea, which dike is yet to be seene, and manifestlie appeareth in diuers places. He reigned xxxi. yeres, and died at May, and was buried in a Chappell which then stode on the bancke of the River Ouse, without the towne of Medforde. Which Chappell with the Sepulture of the king, the said River hath swallowed up, whose tombe of lead (as it were some phantassical thing) appeareth often to them that seeke it not, but to them that seeke it (saily Route) it is inuisible.

Egbertus or Efride his sonne reigned one yere. Alcuine wrote to Osbert of the Mercians, that the noble young Efride died not so lone for his owne fautes, but because his father was a great thedder of blood.

Kenulfus, Nephewe in the fifth degre vnto Penda, warred on the Kentish Saxons, punished their Countrey very sore, and caried away bound their king Egbertus, but not long after, when he had builded a church at Lichfieldcombe, on the day of the dedication thereof, he belouced him, declaring a worthy example of clemencie. He founded the church of S. Ethelbert in Hereford, and reigned xliiii. yeres.

Enelmus sonne to Egbertus a child of seauen yeres, was innocentlie slaine by his sister Quenda, whereby he obtained the name of a Martyr.

Ceolwulfus, brother to Kenulfus, reigned one yere, and was expelled by Bernulfus.

Bernulfus in the third yere of his reigne was overcome by Egbertus King of West Saxons at Elyndune.

Veaus after hee reigned two yeres, was oppressed by the East Angles.

Wihlafus, being at the first subdued by Egbert, reigned xlii. yeres, paying to him and his sonne a tribute.

Ethulfus reigned xiii. yeres, in the same estate, till at the last he was chased beyond the Seas, by the sea-rouers of Denmarke.

Wredrus paying the Tribute, enjoyed the same twentie yeres, and then he being deposed, and dymen out of his Countrey, fled to Rome, and there was buried at the English Schole. When that kingdome was by the Danes deliuered to Ceolwulfus, and in fewe yeres after that, Alfhred the Nephewe of Egbert got it. So the kingdome of the Mercies fell auaie in the yere of Christ, 875.

Northumbers.

The first kingdome was of the Northumbers, which contained Lancashire, Yorkshire, Cumberland, Westmerland, Northumberland. It had on the West the Sea, by South the River of Humber, and so downeward toward the West by the endes of the shires of Nottingham and of Darby, unto the River of Merce, hath the Diocesses of Yorke, Durham, and Carlisle.

At the beginning, it was divided into two kingdomes, Bernicia, and Deira. Bernicia stretched from Edenborough Frith to Tine: and Deira, from Tine to Humber, but these two were shortly united.

W. Malmes

When Hengist had established himselfe in Kent, he sent his brother Otha, and his sonne Ebusam to possesse the south partes of Brytaine, where manie times they put the men of that prouince to flight, and for the space of ninetie nine yeres, they and their successors ascribed to themselves the names of Dukes, and bare themselves under the kingdome of Kent, but in the yere of Christ, 547. the yere after Hengistes death 60. that Dukedom was changed into a kingdome.

559 Ella his successor of the same kindred, but by another line, strongly advanced his kingdome xxx. yeres.

In his time, children of Northumberland were caried to bee sold in the market at Rome, where when the Citizens beheld them, and wondered at their comeliness and beautie of face, amongst other, Gregory the Archdeacon of the Apostollicall seate being one, asked of what Nation they were, unto whom it was answered, that they were the children of English men, of the prouince of Deires, and subiect to Alla their king, but were Paintims, whereunto Gregory said, they shall be taught to sing Alleluia there, during the raigne of Alla our the Deires.

¶ Elappa sine yeres:

¶ Frothulfe seven yeres:

¶ Aethelstide two yeres, and all in the life of Bernicians.

A Ethelrike, the sonne of Ida, reigned in both prouinces of Deire and Bernicia sine yeres.

Ethelstide, brother to Ethelricus, made greater spoile of the Brytaines, then all the kings of the Angles, and vniuepled and subdued more of their Countries, and made the same tributary and habitable for Englishmen: wherefore Aadan king of the Scots being greatly moued with this happie success came against him with a mighty army, but was overcome and put to flight of a few Saxons, which battell was fought by Ethelstich, in a place called Deglastan, fallen, in the xi. yere of his raigne, and in the first yere of Phocas the Emperour, which was the yere of Christ, 603.

This king also not long after this time, leuyed a newe power, and according as Augustine the Archbyschop of Canterburie had before spoken, marched toward the Citie of Legion, which of the Brytaines is called Caierlog, and there first slew 1200. Monks, assembled to make prayer unto God, for the good successe of their Souldiours in the battaile: and afterwarde he overthrew the whole power of the Brytaines host. He was slaine by Redwald king of the East Angles in a battaile nere unto the River which is called Iole, in the yere of Christ 616. when he had reigned xxiij. yeres.

In Anno 626. Paulinus being the third Byschoppe of Rochester, was constituted by Iustus then Archbyschoppe of Canterburie, to be Byschoppe ouer the Northumbers, and sent by Eadbold to Edwyne the king of that nation, with his wife, being the daughter of king Ethelbert, and sister of the said king Eadbold.

A certaine desperate fellow, named Eomer, was sent unto king Edwyne, by Guicheline king of the West Saxons, who came unto him on Easter daye, and having a naked weapon under his garment, assailed the king, but Lilla his seruauant thrust himselfe before the stroke, yet notwithstanding the king was with that stroke wounded throughe the bodie of his faithful seruant.

The same night the Q. his wife was deliuered of a daughter, which bypon Whitsontide next after, was the first that was baptised of Paulinus the Byschop, and named Eanfleda.

In the yere of Christ 628, Edwyne the most nightie king of the Northumbers, and his people, receiued the word of God, at the preaching of Paulinus the Byschop: this was done in the xi. yere of his raigne, and in the 230. yere after the arrivall of the Angles in Brytaine.

Edwyne gave unto Paulinus a Byschoppes See in the Citie of Yorke, and began the Cathedrall Church of S. Peter there, which Church was after finished by king Oswald his successor, after this, in encreasing of the Christian faith and beauntie kingdome, his earthlie possessions did wonderfullie encrease, for he first of all the Angles brought Brytaine whollie under his subiection, saving the kingdome of Kent.

Edwyne in the 17. yere of his raigne, and the 48. of his age, towe slaine in a battaile which he fought at Heshdeside, with the most valliant Pagan King of the Mercies, and Ceadwalla king of the Brytaines. Paulinus the Byschoppe builded the great Church at Lincolne. In the raigne of king Edwyne, such was the peace and tranquillitie throughe all Brytaine, which waite Queen king Edwines dominions lay, that a weak woman might haue walked with her new borne babe ouer all the Land without any damage. which cuppes no man durst touch further then to his owne present vse and necessity, for the loue and good will they bare to their Prince, who was for the time of his raigne so honoured and loued, that the triumphant banners were borne before him, not in warre onely, but in peace to, where soeuer hee went abroad.

After the death of Edwine, the kingdome of Northumberland was againe divided.

633 Osrice sonne of Elfrike, who was Edwines uncle, succeeded in the gouernance of Deira. And Earfride the son of Echelfride, ruled the Mercians; but both these forsaking the Christian profession, wherein they were instructed, yielded themselves to be ruled with the filth of Idolatry: but this Apostasie was reuenged by Cedwall king of the Brittaines, who slew them both, & with tragicall slaughter spoiled Northumberland.

634 Oswald brother to Earfride, then gouerned this kingdome, who with a small armie overcame the Brittaines, and slew Cedwall their king at Deniscburne. He sent for Aidan a Scot to advance the Christian Religion among his people, assigning to him the Isle of Lindisfarne or holie Islande, for his sea. He greatly enlarged his kingdome, reconciled the Welshians and Mercians, which did deadly hate one another. And when he had reigned viii. yeres, was slaine in a cruell battell at Maserfelde, by Penda king of Mercia, and canonized a Saint.

641 Oswine brother to Oswald, succeeded: he buried the head and armes of Oswald, which Penda committed to be hanged upon poles. His gouernment was greatly disquieted by inuasion of the Mercians, rebellion of his owne son Aelfrith, and insurrection of Adilwald sonne to Oswald. He murdered Oswy, the sonne of Osrike, who ruled Deira, being traiterously deliuered vnto him at Ingethling, where afterward a Monasterie was created. But at length he deliuered his Countrey from foraine inuasion, banished the Mercians with Penda in a fought felde, nere the riuer Teuet, brought them to his subiection, and caused them to be instructed in the Christian faith.

He builded a Church among the Mercians called Lichfelde, and procured the same to be a Bishops see, in Anno, 657.

Quina was first Bishop there of Mercia, and also of Lindisfarne: for there were then so fewe Bishops, that one Bishoppe was compelled to gouerne two Provinces. King Oswine ended his life quietly, when he had reigned xxiij. yeres.

670 Egfride his lawefull sonne, then inherited Northumberland: hee deposed Wilfride of the Bishoppicke, and appointed thre Bishops ouer the Northumbers. Mildred, otherwise called Esheldred, his wife, would by no means accompany with her husband, but continued a Virgine, and after she had bin married twelue yeres, took at the hands of Wilfride the batle and habite of a Nunne, and built the Monasterie of Ely, where she was Abbesse.

Egfride her husband fought a battell with Edilfride king of Mercia, but after they were reconciled by Theodore the Bishop. When turning his power against Ireland, he sent Berce thither, who miserably destroyed the saie pe-

ple. But the yere following, he marched against the Pictes contrarie to the good counsaile of S. Cuthbert, whom hee made Bishop: & was slaine by them in an ambush, in a place called Nechtansmere, when he had reigned xij. yeres, and was buried in S. Columbes Island.

Aldred, bassard sonne of Oswine, succeeded after his brother Egfride. Hee 685
Aldred repaired the decayed state of Northumberland, but could not recover all that Pictes, Scots, and Brittaines took from the Northumbers at the death of his brother. He reigned xii. yeres.

Osfred his sonne, a child of eight yeres succeeded, who, when he had touchedly 704 reigned xi. yeres, was murdered by his kinsmen Kenred and Osfricke. Kenred, when he had slaine Osfred, ruled Northumberland two yeres.

Osricke obtained the kingdome after xi. yeres, and created Ceolnulp 715 ther of Kenred to be his successor.

Ceolnulp reigned in this prouince with great pietie, and viiij. yeres, 728 and then forsoke the state of a king, and took the habite of a Monk in the holie Island.

Benedict, who first brought Spasons, Painting, and Glasing into this 736 kealme to the Saxons, flourished at this time. Beda also that famous learned man, lived at this time, who dedicated his historie of the Church of England to the forrenamed Ceolnulp, brought among the Saxons Bede famous.

Egbert, cousin germane to Ceolnulp, reigned in Northumberland twentie 736 yeres peaceably, and then forsaking the woode, entred into Religion, and became a Monk: his brother bearing the same name, was Archbishop of York, which see he greatly advanced, and founded there a most worthy Librarie, replenished with all good Authors.

Oswulf succeeded his father, who was slaine by the people in the first yere 757

Mollo then took the regiment, and after xi. yeres was traiterously mur- 758 dered by Alered.

Alered reigned after him xi. yeres, and was enforced by the people to leave 769 the Countrey.

Athelred or Esheldred the sonne of Mollo, was advanced to the regiment 780 of Northumberland by the people, and the fifth yere after was by them deposed.

Aelfwold then was proclaimed king of Northumberland, and when hee 785 had reigned xi. yeres, was slaine by his subjects: he lieth buried at Haugstald.

Osfrede, the sonne of Alerede then succeeded, but the first yere he was 796 deposed.

Ashelred or Esheldred, who was before deposed, now recetured the kingdome, and when he had ruled foure yeres, was also miserably slaine. After his death, this kingdome decayed, and was pitifully ransacked by cruell sestion, and foraine inuasions, for the space of 30. yeres, in which space, there ruled here without title of kings.

West Saxons.

The ſeauenth kingdome was of the West Saxons, which contained the Countreies of Warkeſhire, South-hampton, Wilthſhire, Dorceſthire, Somerſetſhire, Deuonſhire, and Cornwall, and hath Diocelles, Bath and Wells, Sarisburie, and Exceſter: hauing on the Eaſt ſide Southſex, on the North ſide Thames, on the South and the Weſt the Sea Ocean.

This kingdome, although it toke beginning long after the firſt coming of the Saxons, yet the ſame endured longeſt, and ouercomming all the other kingdomes, brought them againe to one Monarchy.

Cerdic, the tenth from Woden, with his ſonne Kenike, and other Saxons in ſiue ſhippes, in Anno Chriſti. 499. landed in Brytaine, at a place called Cerdikeſhoze, and ſlew Natanleod king of the Brytaines, and ſiue thouſand men, of whole name the Countrey as farre as Cerdikeſſowd, was called by the name of Natanleod. From thenceforth hee kept the Brytaines in great quiet, for they thought not good to ſtirre, where they wanted hope to pzeuaile.

Cerdike and Kenike beganne to raigne as kinges, and the ſame yere they fought with the Brytaines in a place called Cerdikeſſowde, and departed vanquiſhed.

After that, they fought with the Brytaines in a place called Cerdikeſſeg. Theſe two kings to wit, the father and the ſonne, toke the Ile of Wight, and gaue gaue the ſame to their Nephewes, Suſſe and Withgare, and ſlew the Brytaines in a place called Withgarberg. He raigned 17. yeres. Withgare the Nephew of Cerdic was king of the Ile of Wight, and was buried at Withgarberg, at the Citie of Withgar in the Ile of Wight.

Kenrike the ſon of Cerdic fought with the Brytaines at Searesberige, and afterwards at Beranbrige, and at both times put them to flight, and raigned rrb. yeres.

Ceaſline the ſon of Kenrike toke vpon him the kingdome of the Weſt Saxons.

In the beginning of his raigne he diſcomfited Ethelbert king of Kent, and ſlew his 2. Dukes, Oſlaue & Cnebban at Wibbandune. Thier ward his brother Cutholfe vanquiſhed the Brytaines at Hedford, and wan from them the towne of Liganburge, Egelfburge, Wenſington, and Egneſham.

Siue yeres after, Ceaulin ſlew 3. kings of the Brytaines, Commeale, Condidan, and Fariemeile, at Deorham, and toke thre Citieſ from them, Gloceſter, Cirenceſter, and Bathanceſter.

After he fought with the Brytaines at Fethanleah, in which he had the victory, but loſt his ſonne Cutha: for now his fortune changed, and when hee had raigned 33. yeres, he was overcome at Wodoneſbrothe, at Wannes ditch in Wiltſhire, and expelled out of his kingdome by the Brytaines, by the meanes of Cealrike his brother Cuthas ſonne, that now rebelled againſt him, and expelled him the kingdome, when hee had raigned rrr. yeres.

Cealrike the ſonne of Cutholfe ruled the Weſt Saxons v. yeres.

Ceolnuſe ſonne of Cutha before named ſucceeded, who had continually wars either with the Engliſhmen, with the Brytaines, with the Scots, or with the Pias, and laſtly moued war againſt the South Saxons, and there died, when hee had raigned 14. yeres.

Kinegilſus the ſonne of Ceolrike ſucceeded. He brought his hoſt againſt the Brytaines into Beandune, and there ſlew of them 2046.

He alſo fought with Penda king of Mercians nere vnto Cirenceſter, and after made peace with him.

And thoſely after in the yere of Chriſt ſix hundred thirty ſiue, by the preaching of Berinus, king Kinegilſus, and all his people receyued the Chriſtian faith, to whome king Oſwald was Godfather at the font, of which kinges, the ſayde Berinus had graunted to him the Citie of Dorcheſter, & builded there an houſe of Canons for his Wyſhoppes Sea. Kenegilſus raigned ſaueu and twentie yeres.

Guicheline the ſonne of Kinegilſus was baptizd by Berinus the Wyſhoppe, in the Citie of Dorcheſter, and deceeded the ſame yere.

Cuichedrus the ſonne of king Guicheline, was baptizd at Dorcheſter, by Berinus the Wyſhop, who was his Godfather at the font. Hee raigned liii. yeres. About this time Honorius Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie deuised his pzoince into parishes.

Kennewalcus the ſon of king Kenegilſus, toke on him the kingdome of the Weſt Saxons.

He gave Meydulfus burgh to Aldelmus the Abbot, there to build a Monastery.
Afterward being infested with warres by Penda king of the Mercians, because he had forsaken his wife, sister of the said Penda, was by him driven out of his kingdom, and fled to Anna king of the East Angles, where he was baptised by Bishop Felix, and after was restored to his kingdom by the helpe of the forenamed Anna. He reigned xxx. yeres. After whom Quene Sexburgeo his wife governed a while. She founded a Monasterie of Nunnes in the Isle of Sheppey, and became her selfe a Nunne, and after Abbelle of Ely.

673 E Alcwinus Bpethew to Kingillus succeeded, hee fought a battaile against Wulfere king of Mercia, in a place called Wdanheafod. He reigned two yeres.

676 K Enecewinus, sonne to Kingillus, chased the Bypatins even to the sea shore, and reigned ix. yeres.

685 Ceadwalla, Bpethew to Ceauline succeeded in the kingdom.

Marianne. He deue Berthune Duke of the South Saxons, and brought that prouince under grieuous bondage.

After that, he & his brother Mull washed Kent, and subdued the Isle of Wight, which till that time was given to Iudolair, wherof he purged them, giuing the fourth part thereof to Bishop Wilside, who appointed Preachers to conuert the people of that Isle to Christianitie. Ceadwalla once againe spoiling the countrey of Kent, his brother Moll, and xii. of his knightes were slaine by fire cast vpon them, after which time, euen before he was baptized, hee gave for the tenth to God all the pray and spoiles he had gotten to his owne use: in whome (saith Malmesbury) although we praise his affection, we allow not the example: for it is written, that who so offereth the sacrifice of paye (saith god, doth as it were sacrifice the sonne in the sight of his father.

After this he went to Rome, when Sergius was Pope, he was there baptized on Easter Euen, the yere after Christs birth, 689. and falling sicke he died on the 20. day of Aprill, and was buried honorably in St. Peters Church, with an Epitaph in Latine verse, and another in Latine prose, which maie be Englished thus.

Here Ceadwall is buried, otherwile named Peter, king of the West Saxons, who died the 20. of Aprill in the second indiction, and liued 30. yeres, or thereabouts, when that noble and mightie Prince Iustinian was Emperour of Rome, and had reigned 4. yeres in the Coptick, and Sergius a true paterne of the Apostles, had late 2. yeres in Peters seate.

687 He reigned among the West Saxons, a noble man, of great power & wisdom, and therewith valiant and hardie, in feates of armes very expert: he maintained such warre against the Kentish Saxons, that he constrained them to seke and intreace means of peace, giuing to him for the same great gifts 30000. Mancas (pieces of gold so named.)

Floriaceus. This Ine was the sonne of Kenred, the sonne of Ceadwolde, brother to Keadiwold, and sonne to Chensling, sonne of Keni, sonne of Cirdic, the first king of the

the West Saxons. This man was more for his industrie and naturall probesse, then for his succession of the right line, called to be king. He was a Patrone of strength and mannesse, an image of wisdome, and his like was of no man knowne at that time, for religion in profession, and framing himselfe thereafter in his living.

About the 26. yere of his raigne he fought a great battell against Celed king of Mercia, at Wobnesburie. And the same yere he invaded the South Saxons with a mightie armie, and slew in battaile Anthon king of the South Saxons, and joined that kingdom vnto his. He builded a Colledge at Wills, dedicating it to the honour of God, and Saint Andrew: the Appell. in the yere of Christ 704. which Church was since translated into a Bp. Hops Sea, by Kenulphus king of the West Saxons. He new builded the Abbey of Glaffenburie, in a fenny place out of the way, to the end the monks might so much the more giue their mindes to heavenly things, and chiefly the contemplation made for men of such profession: this was the fourth building of that Monasterie. Besides which the said king did also erect a Chappell of gold and silver (to wit garnished) with ornaments and vessels likewise of gold and silver, to the building of the which Chappell, he gave 2640. pounds of silver, and to the Altar, 264. pound of golde, a Chalice with the patten, tenne pound of gold, a Sencar eight pound, and twenty Mancas of gold, two Camlestickes, twelue pound and a halfe of silver, a basin for the Gospel booke twenty pound, and 60. Hedda Bpethop of the West Saxons departed this life, after whose death, king Ine caused that by Hopiche to be diuided into two parishes, the one to Winchester which he gave to Daniel, the other, to wit Shireborne, was giuen to Aldelme, where he ruled foure yeres.

Also Eadbert Abbott, was made Bpethop of Selsey by Chichester.

This Ine king of the West Saxons, was the first that caused the money called Peter pence to be paid to Rome, & this was called the kings almes, & was leuened in this maner, every man that had 30. pennithworth of good of one manner catel in their house of their own proper, should giue a peny at Lammas yere. And when he had gouerned the West Saxons by the space of 37. yeres, by the earnest laboz of his wife Ethelburge, he left this woibly kingdom to his sonne Ethelard, and went to Rome, and there ended his life in poore estate.

Thelard kinsman on the fathers side to Ine, succeeded in the kingdom, notwithstanding Oswald a yong man of the kings blood did disturbe the beginning of his raigne, for he stirred by rebellion among the inhabitants, but not long after, he died, and then Ethelard reigned quietly xlii. yeres.

At Spethamstedde or Peterborough, they made the like slaughter, hawocks, and spoile, and so proceeding toward Huntingdon, praying and spoiling the Countrey, came unto Grantingeshire, and to the house of Rums in the Isle of Wely, where they murdered all, as well women as men. Thus entering into East Angle, they slew the most valiant Earle Walketulus, and all his company that resisted. The king also of the same prouint, holie Edmond they took, bound him to a stake, shotte him full of Arrowes, and strake off his head: by means whereof they possessed all East England, and abournd there all the winter.

The yere 871. the said army of the Danes came to Reading a towne of the kinges situate on the South side of the Riuer Thamis in Warkeshire, and there two of their Carles with a great power rode forth to spoile the Countrie, trie, in the meane time, the other call a trench betwene the Thamis and Ciumon or Kynet, on the right side of the same Towne, with whom Ethelwold Earle of Warkeshire did meete in a place called Englefield, (or field of the Englishmen) where one of the Carles being slaine, and the rest chased awaie, the Christians obtained the victorie.

The Christians withyn 4. daies fought a battell with the Paganes, in Alfenbune, but the Paganes deuised themselves into two battells, for then they had two kings, which when the Christians saw, they likewise deuised their army into two companies.

It was determined that king Ethelred with his battell, shoulde go against the two Pagan kings with their battell, and that his brother Aelfrede with his armie shoulde set on all the Pagan dukes and their army. All things thus ordered, when the king tarried long in his prayer, and the Paganes being readie prepared, came to Chippenhane where the battell was pitched, Aelfred seeing he must either retire, or set on his enemies before his brother did come, he straightwaies set upon them, though the place of battell was unequal, for the Paganes had gotten the higher ground, and the Christians brought their battell from the valley. There was in that place one onlie thorne tree, verie short, about which tree the battells met and joined, where when they had a long time fought, Hubba one of the kings, 5. Carles, and many thousands mo of the Paganes being slaine, the other were chased.

A great heape of stones was laide copped by where Hubba was buried, and the place called Hubblehow.

This being done, king Ethelred and his brother Aelfrede shortly after gathered their power againe to fight with the Paganes at Walsing, where after a long and sore battayle, the Paganes had the victorie.

After this battayle, came another armie of Paganes from beyond Seas, and opened with the first.

When king Ethelred had reigned 6. yeres, he was slaine of the Paganes at Nottingham, & buried in the monasterie of Minburne, with this Epitaph:

In hoc loco quiescit corpus sancti Etheldredi regis West Saxonum martyris, qui Anno Domini. 872. 23. die Aprilis, per manus Dacorum Paganorum occubuit. His armis a croce Florie.

An. 870. Saint Ebbe Abbess of Colidingham, 61 miles south from Winton, cut off her nose and upper lip, and perswaded all her sisters to do the like, that they being odible to the Danes, might the better keepe their Virginitie, in despite whereof the Danes burned the Abbey, and the Rums therein.

Aelfrede borne in Warkeshire, at a village called Granting, the 4. son of Athelwold, receiued the gouernement of the whole Realme, and withyn one moneth after, with a very small number fought a sharpe battell against the whole armie of the Paganes, in a place called Wallton (which lyeth on the South side of the Riuer Welly of which Riuer the whole shire taketh his name) and after they had fought a great part of the daie, the Paganes fledde, but seeing the feynesse of them that pursued, they set themselves in battaile againe, and got the field.

The West Saxons made a league with the Pagans, upon condition they should depart out of their Countrey.

The next yere they wintered at London, & made league with the Mercies. The next yere they wintered at Lindesey, which was in the kingdome of Northumberland.

The next yere, at Wipendune: they constrained Burgoredus king of Mercies, to flee beyond the seas, who went to Rome, where he died, and was buried in the schole of the Sars.

The Pagans subduing the whole kingdome of the Mercies, which they committed to Ceonulfus: The next yere one part of the Pagans wintered in Northumberland nere to the River Tyne, subdued the whole Countrey: the other part went with Guthram, Osketellus, and Amandus, three kings of the Pagans, to Cambridg, and wintered there.

The yere following, the Pagans going from Cambridg in the night, entered the Castell of Warham, where there was a Monasterie of Nuns, situate betwene two rivers fraile and Trent, in the Countrey called in the Saxon Thomsela, a most sure seat, except the West Saxons, where it lay next to the land, with whom king Aelfred made a league that they should depart his kingdome, but contrary to their othe, they rode into Denonshire, to Crancester, and there wintered.

Hinguar and Halfdene with 23. ships, came out of Northwales, where they had wintered, and like fierce Wolves had shed much christian blood: setting fire to divers Abbeies, and made them equall with the ground, neuer kingdome or countrey suffered greater calamity, at the hands of any nation, then did the English, especially the Wponkes and religious women, for them they burnt in their houses, or otherwise tormented them to death.

The next yere 120. of the Pagans ships were drowned at Suanaung: And king Aelfred pursuing an armie that went by law to Excester, took of them pledges, and also an oth to depart with all speed.

In the yere following the Danes came to Gylpingham, a manor of the kings, situate on the left side of Wiltshire, and there wintered, compelling many of the West Saxons to leave their Countrey and to go beyonde the seas: the rest that remained they subdued. King Aelfred himselfe was oft times brought into such misery, that none of his people knew where he was become. On a time being forced to hide himselfe with a Cowheard in Somersetshire, as he sat by the fire, preparing his bolue and shaftes, the Cowheardes wife baking bread on the coales, shew the kings bolue and shaftes aside, and said, thou fellow why dost thou not turne the bread which thou hast borne, thou art glad to eat it ere it be half baked. This woman thought not that it had bin king Aelfred, who had made so manie battels against the Danes, and gotten so manie victories. For God did not only vouchsafe to giue him victories over his enemies, but also to be wearied of them in the sight of his owne people, to the end he should knowe there is one God of all, to whom all knees shall bow, and in whose handes the hearts of kings consisteth. In this battel among many rich spoiles was taken a banner or ensigne called Reafan, which among the Danes was had in great estimation, for that it was imboldered by the three sisters of Hinguar and Hubba, the daughters of Lodbroke. King Aelfred made a castle in Aethelingei, from thence he went to Petram Egebricht, which is on the East side of the chafe called Salnuddum, in Latine Silva magna, the great wood: there met with him all the inhabitants of Hampshire, which when they sawe the king, reioyced as though he had been risen from death to life.

The next yere, the Pagans went from Cirencester to the East English, deciding that Countrey among them, and there inhabited. The Pagans that wintered at Fullanham, went into East France.

In the yere 885. an army of Pagans came into Kent, and besieged the citie of Ashofereaster, which lyeth on the East side of the river Medowege, and before the gate of the same citie they made a strong Castell, but Aelfred with a great army chased them to their ships.

In the yere 892. the great armie of the Pagans, came from the East kingdome of France unto Adbon, and from thence with 250. ships into Kent, arriving in the mouth of the River Linene, which river runneth from the great wood, which is called Andreads Weald, from whose mouth foure miles into the same wood they drew their ships, where they destroyed a Castell, and fortified another more strong, in a place called Apultrans, now Apuldor. This wood was from the East to the West 120. miles in length and more, in breadth 30. miles.

The same yere, Hastings came with 80. shippes into the mouth of Thames, and made a strong towne called Spidleton in the South side of the Thames, and another on the North side, called Beandæte.

The yere following, the Citie of Dork was taken by the Normans, but Seber the Bpshopp, by Gods prouision escaped.

The same yere also Aelfred fought against the Normans at Fernham, in Kent, in the parish of Alesford, where he slew them, wounded their king, and chased the remnant through the Thames into Galfier, whereby many of them were drowned, the which escaped fled to an Island called Welesley, situate in a streame of the River Colne.

Aelfred hearing that a great number of the Pagans were arrived at Exanceastre, he took with him a great armie, and by battaile ouercame, and chased them alwaie.

In the meane season Adhered Earle of the Mercies, and the Citizens of London with other came to Beauflete, & besieged the Castle of the Pagans, and brake into it, where they took exceeding rich spoiles of gold, siluer, horses, and garments, among which was taken the wife of Hastings and his two sons, which were brought to London, and presented to the king, who commanded them to be restored againe. But Hastings came againe into Beauflete, and repayed the Castle, which they had broken downe. From thence he went to Seaburgh, and there builded a strong Castle: there was ioyned vnto him the armie that remained at Apuldrane, and other that came from the East English, and from the Northumbers, who altogether spoiled and robbed, till they came to the banke of Seuerne, and there at Walsingham, they made a strong towne, but by Adhered Earle of the Mercies, and other, they were besieged, and shortly through famine forced to come out, where many on both sides were slaine, but the Christians had the victorie.

In the yere, 895, the Pagans wintered in a little Ile called Merf, in the East part of Essex, situate in the sea, and by same yere they sayled by the River of Thames, after by the River of Ligea, and twenty miles from London began to build a fortreffe. In the summer following, the Londoners and other were adioynning did seek to destroy the fortreffe of the Danes, but they being put to flight, king Aelfred pitched a field not farre from the Citie, least the Pagans should take away the harvest of the Countrey, and viewing the river one daie, perceived that the Chamell might bee in one place dammed by, that the Danes should not get out their shippes, he forthwith commanded on both sides of the river a damme to be cast, and decided that river into 3. streames, so that where shippes before had sayled, now a small boate could scantely row, which when the Pagans perceived, they leaving their townes and ships, fled afoote to Quatbridge, and there building a fortreffe, lodged there the winter following, whose shippes the Londoners bring, came to London, the other they brake downe and destroyed.

Anno 897, the Pagans came from Quatbridge, part into East England, part into Northumberland: some got them shippes and sayled into France. After all these vexations, by the cruel Danes committed, followed far greater, the space of three yeres, by death of cattell, and mortalitie of men: twentie Danish shippes were taken being Pyrates, and the Pyrates slaine or hanged on the gallowes.

The victorious Prince, the studious provider for boldness, orphans and poor people, most perfect in Saron Poetrie, most liberall, endued with wisdom, fortitude, iustice, and temperance, the most patient bearer of sickness, where with he was dallie bered, a most discrete searcher of truth in executing iudgement, a most vigilant and devout Prince in the service of God, Alrede, the xix. yere and six moneth of his reigne, departed this life, the xxviii. daie of October, and is buried at Winchester, in the new Monasterie of his foundation. He founded a Monasterie of Monkes at Ethinglesp, and another for Nunnes at Spastisbury. He ordained the hundreds and tenths, which men call Centuraries and Cupings: he sent for Gimbald to come into Englad, that by his aduise he might erect the studie of good learning, cleane decayed. By the counsell of Neotus, he ordained common shcoles of diuers sciences in Orenford, and turned the Saron lawes into English, with diuers other bookes.

He established good lawes, by the which he brought to great a quietnesse to the countrey, that men might haue hanged golden bracelets and iewels, where the wales parted, and no man durst touch them for feare of the lawe. He carried euer the Psalter in his bosome, that when he had any leasure he might read it ouer with diligence.

He diuided the foure and twenty heures of the day & night into three parts: he spent 8. houres in writing, reading, and praying: eight in prouision of his booke: and eight in hearing and dispatching the matters of his subiects. He diuided his yearly reuenues into two parts, and the first he diuided into three: one part he gaue to his seruants, the second part to his workemen which were occupied in building, the third part to strangers. The second part of the whole he diuided into foure parts, the first part wherof he gaue in almes to the pore, the second to Monasteries by him founded, the third to shcoles which he had erected, and gathered of manie both noble mens and other mens sons of his nation, the fourth part he distributed to the next monasteries in all the English Saron. Alhwido wife to king Alrede founded the Monasterie of Nunnes in Winchester.

Edward furnished Sento, the son of Aelfred, was crowned and appointed King at Kingstone, and shortly after Adhelwoldus, cousin germane vnto king Edward, revolted and went to the army of the Pagans, who sought to dole him to be their king in Northumberland.

Ioannes Loofer in his thirde Booke of the description of Africa, writeth, that about this time (to say) about the yere of our Lord 901, the Englishmen at the perswasion of the Gothes, besieged the great Citie Argilla in Barbary, which the Africans call Arella, being 70. miles distant from the streight of Sparacho southward, hoping thereby to withdraue the Saracens out of Europe, where they fought with so great courage and good successe, that they wanne the said towne, and so ransacked it with fire and sword, that scant one escaped thence, and the Towne laye desolate and without inhabitants for the space of thirtie yeres. to the 314. yere of Mahomets Hegira, which by conference of their places doeth seeme to beginne in the yere of our Lord 591. which number being added, doeth bring forth 905.

Adhelwoldus king of the Pagans brought a great army from Casser, and the East English, which robbed and spoiled through all Mercia, and the West country, until they came to Cerikelade, and there went over the Thames, and toke great spoiles about Winton.

King Edward gathered an army and went toward the Danes, but while he tarried for his army out of Kent, Adhelwoldus king of the Danes came upon him with a great power, and bade him battell, wherein Cothricus, and Adhelwoldus kings of the Pagans were slaine.

In the yere 910. a battell was fought at Wodnesfeld, a mile north from Wulfstane Hampton in Staffordshire, where Cowillus and Healdene kings of the Pagans, with many Carles and nobles were slaine, but of the common people innumerable.

Aethelred Carle of the Mercies died, and king Edward toke into his Dominion London and Wrenford, and all the Countrey abisping them into.

In the yere 912. by the kings commandement, at Hertford, betwixt the rivers of Hemeran, Benefician, and Legian, in the north side a Citie is builded.

In the yere 914. the Pagans of Northumberland, and Leicesters, in the countie of Wrothce took spoiles, and in the kings towne called Hokenoxton, and in many other places they slew many people, and returned home against another army of the Danes, being horsemen, were sent into Hertfordshire, towardes Legeeton, with whom the men of the countie encountered, and slaying manie of them, put the rest to flight, taking their hoeses and armour, with great pray. King Edward leaving certaine to build a citie in the south part of the river Ligea, to wit, the towne of Ware, with more part of his army went into Essex, and encamped at Healdune, where he tarried till a towne was builded at Waltham.

In the yere 915. a great naule of Danes sayled about the west countie, and landed in divers places, taking great prayes, and went to their shippes againe. The king for strengthening of the Countrey, made a Castell at the mouth of the water of Avon, and another at Wackingham, and the third at By, that is, on either side of the rivers curle one, & then went into Northampton and Bedfordshires, and subdued the Danes there, with their leader called Turketils.

King Edward builded 02 newes repayed the Townes of Dorchester and Wigmore.

In the yere of our Lord 918. the Kentish, Southey, and East Saxons, besieged Colchester, and wanted it by force, and slew all therein, a few except that escaped by flight. The same yere king Edward went to Colchester with an armie, repayed the wallies, and put a great garrison of souldiers into it.

of Mercia) and was buried in the Monastery of Saint Peter, which her Lord and the before had builded in the towne of Gloucester, which Monasterie was after thowne to the ground by the Danes, but Aeldredus Bishopp of Exeter and of Gloucester, made there an other, which is now the chiefest Church in the towne.

This noble woman Elfreda, reedified the Citie of Chester, she repayed the towne of Lamswoth, beside Lichfield, Stafford, Warwike, Shrewsburie, Watresburie, Cloisburie, Legeceaster, with a towne and Castell in the north end of Mercia, upon the River of Merce, that is called Kuncorne: she builded a Bridge over Seuerne called Wymsberie Bridge, &c.

When she had once assayed the paines that women suffer in travelling with child, she ever after refused the embracing of her husband, saying it was not lawfully for any noble woman to be soch desirous liking, where of should arise too great sorrow and paine: she tamed the Welshmen, & in divers battels chased the Danes, after whose death, Edward held that province in his owne hand.

King Edward builded a newe towne against the old towne of Nottingham on the south side of the river of Trent, and made a bridge over the said river betwene the two townes: he subdued the kings of Scotland & Wales: he builded a towne in the north end of Mercia, by the river of Merce, and named it Chiltal, and repayed the towne of Manchester: after all which deeds by him done, he deceased at Faringdon, and was buried at Winton in the new church, which his father Alfred had builded when he had reigned cristl. yeres.

Aethelstane, after the death of Edward Senior his father, was crowned at Kingstone by Athelmus Archbishop of Canterbury. His coronation was celebrated in the market place upon a stage erected on hie, that the king might be seene the better of the multitude. He was a prince of worthy merrour, valiant and wise in all his aces, and brought this land into one monarchie: for he expelled utterly the Danes, and quieted the Welshmen. He caused them to pay him yearly tribute twentie pound of gold, three hundred pound of silver, and two thousand six hundred head of neate, with houndes and halukes to a certaine number.

And after that he had by battell conquered Scotland, he made one Constantine king of Scots under him, adding this princely word, that it was more honour to him to make a king, then to be a king. He made seven coining mints at Canterburie, four for the king, two for the Archbishop, and one for the Abbot: at Rochester three, two for the king, and one for the bishop: besides these, in London six, in Winchester six, in Lewes six, in Hastings two: in Chichester one: in Hampton two: in Warham two: in Exeter two: in Shaftesburie six, and in every good towne one Coiner.

He founded S. Germans in Colnehall, which was since a Bishops See: he founded S. Petrosus at Wodmin: he founded Bilton priory, Spilketon and Spilchney. He walled the citie of Exeter with squared stone, of which Citie more shall be shewed in my larger Booke.

Aethelstane reigned 16. yeres, and was buried at Spalmeburie.
Edmund the brother of Adelstane took upon him the government of this Realme, whose short reigne took from him the renome of most high pates that should have rebounded to this posterity: for he was a man disposed of nature to noblenesse and iustice: he took out of the Danes hands the townes of Lincoln, Nottingham, Warbie, Leicester, and Stamford, and brought all Mercia to his dominion: he expelled the two kings, Anlafus the sonne of Sichicus, and Reginald the sonne of Cuthbert, out of Northumberland, and subdued the Countrey to his dominion. King Edgar prepared a nanie (as diuers authors haue written) of thre thousand and five hundred shippes, of the which, after Callen every yere, one thousand two hundred, he appointed to come into the East part of the realme; one thousand two hundred into the West parts, and one thousand two hundred into the North parts: this number of shippes being incredible, peradventure one author following another, the first being deceived by mistaking the same, the rest haue erred, but William Thorne a Spoke of S. Augustines by Cantabrie, setteth downe the whole number of ships to be 300. and this hath a more likelihood of truth. But to the matter, with the East nanie, he sailed into the West, and sending that backe, hee would saile with the West nanie into the North, and that being sent backe, with the North nanie he would saile into the East partes; and after this lost, hee used to saile round about the whole Island euery summer, by the which doing, hee prouided for the defence of his kingdome against strangers, and practised himselfe, and his people in exercises of warre.

In the winter season and spring of the yere, hee traualled through all the parts of his Realme, diligently searching howe the lawes and statutes were obserued by the Lodes, and men of greatest authority, least the poore should be oppressed, by the mightie and rich men.

Thus

Thus Edgare notwithstanding his manifold vertues before rehearsed, was reported (saith W. Malmesbury) to be a cruell Prince, and also given o- uermuch to the lustes of the flesh, and for example they saie, that Edgare hea- ring tell, that Orgare Earle of Deuonshire had a daughter of passing beauty, named Alfred, he commanded Ethelwold an Earle, and also his secretarie to go loke vpon her, and so to prouide, that if she were according to the common byated fame, he mought bee his wife. Which Ethelwold took his iourney, and founde it to be true: whereupon, (being himselfe taken with her loue) lea- uing his message from the king vndone, he laboured to obtaine her to bee his wife: and returning to the king, reported the damosell to be such a one as pas- sed not the common beauty of women, and therefore not mete for so great a spaciouse as he: So that after, when the king had set his loue vpon another, Ethelwold obtained the false damosell in marriage, to his owne destruction, for when the fame of her passing beauty was spread through the whole realme, the king desiring to see her, and by deceit to deceiue the deceiver, shewing a great countenance to the Earle, appointed a daie to go loke on the woman, which he heard so much commended.

The Earle being in great heavinesse, went before to his wife, and desired her that she should, for the safeguarde of his life, disfigure her selfe with some homely apparell, and otherwise as she might: but she breaking promise with her wretched husband, dressed her selfe in a glasse as curiously as she mought, omitting nothing that mought tempt the king, and prouoke his desire, and ac- cording to her meaning it came to passe, for the king no sooner sawe her, but he was taken with her loue, and to obtaine his purpose the sooner, shewing a good countenance to the Earle, hee called him to go with him to hunt in the wood of Marston, where he shot him through with an arrowe, into the which place, a ballard sonne of the dead Earle came, euen as the dead was done, whom the king asked, how he liked such hunting, who (as men saie) made this answer, I like it well, my Lorde, that liketh you: with which saying he so ap- pealed the kings angrie mind, that the king neuer loued any man better then him, and made amends to the sonne for the cruell act against his father. The king tooke Ladye Alfred to wife, and she builded an house of Priests in the same place where her first husband Ethelwold was slaine.

963. Ethelwald Bishop of Winchester, in a great famine, solde alwaie all the sacred vessels of his Church for to relieue the almost starued people: saying that there was no reason, that the fencelesse temples of God should be bound in riches, and liuely temples of the holie ghost lacke it.

The yere 969. King Edgare, gaue commandement to Dunstane Arch- bishop of Canterbury, Ethelred Bishop of Winchester, and Oswold Bishop of Worcester, that expelling secular Priests out of the great Monasteries, builded through Mercia, they should place Monks, and to that effect he made the like Oracion as followeth.

Because our Lord hath magnified his mercie to worke with vs, it is met (most reuerend fathers) that with worshippe worshes, we answer his innum- erable benefites: for neither by our owne worke possesse we the earth, and our owns arme hath not saved vs: but his right hand, and his holie arme; for that he hath bene pleased with vs: mete therefore it is, that we submit both our selues and our soules to him, that hath put all thinges vnder our feete; and that we diligently labour that they whome he hath made subiect vnto vs maie be made subiect vnto his lawes. And truly it is my part to rule the latie, with the lawe of equitie, to doe iust iudgement betwixt man and his neighbours, to punish church robbers, to repelle rebels, to deliuer the weakke from the handes of his stronger: the poore and meete from them that spoile them. And it also belongeth to my care, to haue consideration to the health, quietnesse, or peace of the ministers of the church, the flocke of Monks, the companies of Virgines, and to prouide the thinges needfull for them. The examining of whole manners belongeth vnto you, if they liue chastly, if they beaue themselves honestly towards them which be abroad, if in diuine ser- uice they bee carefull, if in teaching the people diligent, if in feeding sober, if moderate in apparell, if in iudgement they bee discrete: If ye had cured these thinges by prudent scrutine (by your licence I speake w reuerend fa- thers) such horrible and abhominable thinges of the clearkes had not come to our eares. I omit to speake, that their crowne is not large, nor their rown- ding conuenient, but wantonnes in apparell, insolencie in behaviour, stifi- nesse in wordes, doe betwixt the madnesse of the inward man. Further- more, howe great negligence is there in the diuines, when in the holy vigils, they will scarce vouchsafe to be present; when at the holie solemnities of the diuine seruice, they seeme to be gathered together to plaie and to laugh, ra- ther then to sing?

I will that which god men lament, and euill men laugh at, I will speake with sorrowe (if so bee it maie be spoken) how they dole in banque- tings, in drunkennesse, in chambering and wantonnesse, that now clearkes houses maie be thought to bee brotherly houses of harlots, and an assembly of players. There is dice, there is dauncing and singing, there is watching til midnight, with crying and howling. Thus the patrimone of kinges, the almes of Princes, yea, (and that more is) the price of that precious blood is o- uerthrowne. I haue our fathers, therefore, for this purpose emptied their trea- sures: for this intent, hath the kings erdetours by withdrawing of manie re- uenewes bene giuen: hath the kings bountifullnes giuen lawes and posses- sions to Christian Churches for this ende: that Clearkes harlots should bee pampered with delicious dainties, that riotous guests maie be prepared for, that boundes, and halokes, and such like toles maie be gotten? Of this the fondlours crie out, the common people murmur, the iesters & scoffers sing and daunce, and you regard it not; you spare it, you dissemble it: Where is the worde of Leuie, and zeale of Symeon, which killed the circumcised Sichimites: being the figure of them that defile the Church of Christ, with polluted ades, abusing Jacobs daughter as a harlot: Where is the spirit of Moyse, that spar- red his bowholoe himselfe, with shipping the head of the Calfe: Where is the dagger of Phinies the Priest, who killing him that plaid the harlot with the spadiante, with this holy emulation pacified Gods wrath: Where is the spirit of Peter, by whose power comenoues is destroyed, and Simon shall be reſte condemned: Endeavour to imitate *W*ise Priests, in God: It is time to rise against them that have broken the lawe of God. I haue Constantine, you haue Peters sword in your handes, let vs soine right handes, let vs couple sword to sword: that the Leapers maie be cast out of the Church, that the hallowe place of our Lord maie be purged, and the sonnes of Leueie may minister in the Church, who saide to his father and mother, I knowe you not, and to his brethren, I am ignorant of you. Go to carelessly I beseech you, least it repent vs to haue done that that we haue done, and to haue giuen that wee haue giuen, if we shall see that not to bee spent in Gods seruice, but on the riotousnesse of most wicked men, through unpunished libertie. Let the reliques of holie Saintes, which they seene, and the reuerende Altars before which they rage, moue you. Let the marvellous notion of our auncestors moue you, whose almes the Clearkes surie abuse.

*W*ise Great grandfathers father Echelwold (as you knowe) gaue the tenth part of all his landes to Churches and Abbeyes: my great grandfather Alfred of holie memoie, thought not meete to spare his treasures, his patrimonie, no coffes, nor reuenewes that he might enrich the Church: my graund father, the olde Edward, holwe much he gaue vnto the Churches, your fatherhood is not ignorant. It becometh you to haue in remembrance, with what gifts my father and uncle enriched Christs Altar. W Dunstane, father of fathers, beholde, I praye you, the eles of my father thinking on the, from the bright coast of heauen, heare his complaining wordes with a certaine pittie thumbe ring in thine eares. *W*hon W my father Dunstane! *W*hon gauest me whole soule counsell to build Abbeyes and Churches, thou wast my helper and fellow worker in all things. *W*he I elected as a shepheard, father and bishop of my looke, and keeper of my manners, when did I not obey thee? what treasure did I preferre before thy counsels? what possessions despised I not, thou commanding me: If thou thoughtest meete to giue anie thing to the poore, I was ready. If thou iudgedst anie thing to be giuen to Churches, I deferred not. If thou complainedst any thing to bee wanting to *W*ponkes or Clearkes, I supplied. *W*hon saidst that almes was euerlasting, and none to bee more fully fall than that which was giuen to Abbeyes and Churches, therewith Gods seruants maie be sustained, and what remaineth maie be giuen to the poore.

Beholde W father the fruit of mine almes, and the effect of thy promise. What wilt thou answer to this complaint? I know, when thou doest see a theefe, thou runnest not with him, neither hast thou put thy position with adulterers. Thou hast rebuked, thou hast intrated, and blamed them, wordes are condemned, thou must come to stripes, and thou shalt not want the kings authoritie. Thou hast here said *W*he W venerable father Echelwold Bishop of Winchester, Thou hast the rend *W*relate of Worcester Oswold: to you I commit this businesse, that both by bishopricke censure, and kingly authoritie, filthy sinners maie be cast out of the Church, and they that liue in order brought in.

King Edgar, hauing restored and new founded foure seuen *W*ponasteries, which before his time had bene destroyed by the Danes and other Pagans, and intending to continue that his intent till the number of fifty were accomplished, he confirmed the *W*ponasterie of Worcester, which Oswold then *W*ishop of Worcester, by the kings consent, had enlarged, and made it the cathedrall church of that shire.

Echelwold *W*ishop of Winchester, renewed the *W*ponasterie of Ely, and Edgar confirmed his foundation, with great priuiledges, as by his Charter may appere.

*W*ise concerning the state of the Church of England in those daies maie appere by the wordes of Edgar in his Charter to the Abbe of Malmesbury, which are to this effect: All the *W*ponasteries in my Realme, to the outward sight, are nothing but worme eaten, and rotten timber and boards: and that worse is, within they are almost empty and void of deuine seruice.

The Danes and all other people in England, vied the vice of great drunkening. The king therefore by counsell of Dunstan put downe manie alehouses, and would suffer but one in a village or towne, except it were a greatborough: hee ordained certaine cuppes with pinnes or nailles, and made a law, that whosoever dranke past that marke at one draught, should forfeit a certaine paine.

Alwinus Alderman Earle of East Angles, kinsman to king Edgar, founded the Abbe of Ramsey: king Edgar confirming the same on Christmas daie, the yere of our Lorde God nine hundred seuentie and foure, in the presence of all the Nobilitie. The same yere was an earthquake through all England.

Edgar being at Chester, entered the Riuer of Wye, hee toke the rule of the helme, and caused eight kings to row him vnto Saint Johns Church, and from thence vnto his pallace, in token that he was Lord and king of so many prouinces. The names of the 8. kings were, Rinoch king of the Scots, Malcolme of Cumberland, Macone king of Span and of many Ilands, Dufhal king of Demetia or South Wales, Siferich and Huwall kings of Wales, Iames king of Galaway, and Iukil of Westmerland. King Edgar reigned xvi. yeres, and was buried at Glassebury.

By his first wife Egelsede (as some doe write) or by a religious botarie, as some other doe write, he had issue Edward surnamed the Martyr, who succeeded after his father. Of his wife Elfrich daughter to Ordgarus, Duke of Devonshire, he received another sonne named Eadred, and a daughter named Wolfrith.

Edward the sonne of Edgar was crowned at Kingston, by the handes of Dunstan Archbishop of Cantuarbie, and Oswald Archbishop of Yorke. This man might well bee compared to his father for his modestie and gentleness, so that he was worthily fauoured of all men, except onely of his step-mother

This Edward while he was hunting in a forrest (by chance) lost his company, and rode alone to refresh himselfe at the castel of Cossie in the Isle of Dorsetche, where, by counsell of his Stepmother Elfrida, he was traitorously murdered as he sat on his horse, when he had raigned iii. yeres. He was buried at Egham, and after at Shaftesburie. Elphred did after that take great penance, and builded ii. Monasteries of nuns, Almsburie and Egham: in which Egham he after lived a solitarie life till he died.

Ethelred commonlie called Unrædie, the sonne of king Edgar, by his second wife Elphred, was crowned at Kingstone. But because he came to the kingdom by wicked meanes, and by killing his brother, hee coulde neuer get the god will of the people, who had conceived an ill opinion of him: of this arose ciuill wars within the Realme, and often dissention and discords, as well of the Nobles as of the common sort.

In the yere 982. a great part of the City of London was burnt, which City at this time had most building from Ludgate toward Westminster, and little or none where the hart of the city is now, except in diuers places was housing, that stood without order: so that manie cities, as Canterburie, Dorche, and other in England, passed London in building: but after the conquest it increased, and now passeth all other.

988. Dunstan Archbishop of Canterburie deceased, and was buried at Canterburie. Ciricus Byshop of Sarum succeeded.

A disease not knowne in England in time past, to wit, seuers of men, with the fire, and murthering of cattell killed many.

In the yere 994. king Ethelred created a Byshops sea at Excester.

The same yere Anlaf king of the Norwaies, and Sweyne king of Danes on the daie of the natiuitie of our Lord, in xliii. Gallies came vp to London, which he attempted to breake into, and to set on fire: but they were repulsed, not without their great detriment and losse by the Citizens, whereupon they being driven with force, leauing London, set vpon Caister and Kent, by the Sea coasts burnt townes, and wasted the fieldes, without respect of sexe or age killed all, and wasted with fire and sword all that theire male not carry away. At length being pacified with a tribute of 16000. poundes departed to their ships, and wintered at Southampton.

In the yere 995. a Comet appeared. The Byshopricke of Lindisfar of Holle Island was removed to Durham: and there Aldwine the Byshop first builded a small Oratory of tweluen wands or hurdles, where the body of Cuthbert lay for a time, till a larger Church were builded.

In the yere 996. the Lady Wlfrune widow sometime wife to Adelme duke of Northampton, obtained licence of king Ethelred to giue lande to the church which he had founded at Hampton in Staffordshire, whereby the said town of Hampton took the addition of Wlfrune, and so was called Wlfrunehampton.

In the yere 1002. king Ethelred caused all the Danes in England to be drine upon the daie of Saint Brice. The same yere Wlricus Spore founded a Monasterie at Burton vpon Trent. King Ethelred confirmed this foundation in these wordes: 1004. Indictione 2. horum testimonio sapientium quorum nomina inferius annotata cernuntur.

In the yere 1003. Swaine king of Denmarke with a great armie invaded England with fire and sword: 1004. they fought a great battell at Egham against Wlketell Cate of East Angles.

In the yere 1006. The deceitfull Edrike of Straton, bade the noble Duke Alfhelmus to a banquet at Shrobsbury, from whence he had him out to hunt, where a certaine Butcher of Shrobsbury named Goodwin Dorchard, whome Edrike long before had byed, kept out of a place, where he had laine in waste for him, and wickedly slewe Alfhelmus. And within a while after, his sonnes, Wulfegus, and Wegate, by commandement of the king Ethelred, at Coham, where the court then lay, had their eyes put out.

In the yere 1007. king Ethelred made Edrike of Straton duke of Mercia, and gaue to him his daughter Edina to wife. This Edrike the son of Egelricus was but a man of low kindred, to whome neuertheless, his eloquent tongue had purchased riches and nobility: toly he was of toly, pleasant of speech, and passed all men in those daies in enuie, falsehood, pride, and crueltie, he had to his byre, then Britricus, Alfricus, Beda, Agelricus, Agelwardus, Agelmarus, father to Godwine Duke of West Saxons.

In the yere 1010. The army of Danes march through the wood called Cistron to Wroth, which tolonge they burnt & destroyed. When marching about into East Angles, spoiled that country, burnt Egham, Grantbridge. Then they spoiled the shires of Hertford, Buckingham, and Bedford. When they wasted Northamptonshire, Wiltshire, &c. The Danes hauing spoiled the East Angles as is afore shewed, Alfwine byshop of Ely, brought the bodie of St. Edmund from Wrothsworth through Caister, ouer Stratford bridge, and so to London in at Triplegate, (a place so called of cripples begging there) at which gate (it is said) the bodie entering, myacles were wrought, as, some of the lame to go by sight prayling God. The body of king Edmund rested for the space of thre yeres in the parish church of St. Gregory, adioyning vnto the cathedrall church of St. Paul, from whence it was conueyed backe againe to Stapleford in Caister, and so to Wrothsworth, now called Worp in Suffolke, where his

In 1011. East Angles, East Saxons, Middlesex, Bedfordshire, Dorsetshire, Cranthbridgeshire, halfe Huntingdonshire, and Portsmouthshire: and on the south side of Sharnes, Bent, Surrey, Southsex, Southampton, Wiltshire, and Berkehire, being destroyed with sword and fire, king Ethelred required peace with the Danes, promising to them stipends and tribute: to the which they scintillie assented, but yet they never left their cruelties: at length they besieged and destroyed Canterburie, and so; that the Archbyschoppe Ellegus would not yield to them, he was first imprisoned there, and after conveyed to Orerich, and there banished to death. Chrifts Church is spoiled and burnt: the Sponkes with all other men are tentred, i.e. of every x. being put to death, the tenth suffered to live in misericordie: the number of them that were left alive, was 4. moneths, & of lay people 800. so that the number slain was 36. moneths, & 8000. of the lay people.

In the yere 1012. they took tribute of 48000. poundes, and at the last, after divers overthowes giuen to the men of this Ilande, they possessed the same, and put king Ethelred to flight, constraining him to live in exile among the Normans.

This Ethelred had two wiues, Ethelgina an English woman, and Emma a Norman: of the first he had two children, of which, sailing of Edmund, who succeeded him in the kingdome, it were nothing to our purpose to speake: of the second that was Emma sister to Richard Duke of Normandie, there was borne two sonnes, to wit, Edward and Alured. And that I doe here (contrary to that is commonlie vied) set Edward before Alured as elder brother, I am moued therunto by no small authoritie, which I haue taken out of the Historiographers of that age, out of Gemeucensis, a most diligent writer of genealogies, and one other Author, who in his commentarie written in praise of Emma the Quene, affirmeth, that Edward was the elder brother, whome I do the better beleue, because it is not like, that he seeing the thinges with his eyes, should mistake the matter, especiallie writing to the M. who was mother to them both.

Swanus in the meane time subdued all Englands, and the people for feare yielded vnto him on euerie side, ouer whome most crueltie he triumphed. Not long after he departed this life at Seinsburge, and left Canutus his sonne successor in the kingdome.

Ethelred hearing that Swanus was dead, leaving in Normandie to Duke Richarde his Sisters Sonne, Emma his Wife, and the children that hee had by her, returned with all speede into Englands with Edmund his Sonne by his first Wife, being then at Spanis state, and by the treachery of his owne men, and the ayde of the Normans, moued warre against his enemy.

Canutus finding himselfe vnable to match with him, went into Denmark, minding to returne thither immediatlie againe.

Ethelred being contrary to his expectation thus restored to his kingdome, shewed great crueltie vpon the Danes that remained in England, sparing no ther man nor woman, young nor olde. Therefore Canutus being herie desirous to reuenge the same, prepared a new army, and came into England against Ethelred with all speede he coule, raging wide and side with fire and sword. Ethelred in the meane season, whether by sickness or for sorrow, died, when he had reigned 38. yeres, and was buried in the north Ile of Saint Pauls Church in London.

Edmond the son of Ethelred by his first wife, succeeded in the kingdome, who (whether it were for the great strength of his bodie, or for that hee always vied to go in armour) was surnamed Ironside.

Canute in the meane time, with all his manie came by to London, & on the south side the Thames, he caused a trench to be cast, through the which he caused all his ships to be towed or drawne into the west side of the bridge. And after with a deepe and large trench and siege they compassed the Citie round about, and so shut by all going in or out, of all manner of persons: and after attempted to haue wonne it by assault, but that would not serue, the Citizens made so ballant resistance, that in the end, the enemies were repulsed farre from the walls: whereupon the siege for a time being dismissed, part of the army being left to keepe the ships, the other part went into the West Saxonie, with such speede, that they gaue no leisure vnto king Edmund to gather his armie, notwithstanding, with that small army which he had, he boldly met with them in Dorsetshire, and joining battell with them at Benham nere to Gillingham, he ouercame them, and put them to flight.

After this, king Edmund determining manfully to giue battell vnto Canute with a greater hoste then before, mette with his army at a place called Shereffane in Willocestershire, where he in the foreward fiercely fought, executing the office both of a hardie souldiour and ballant Captaine. But because Edrike of Straton, the offe named Traitor, and the beloued Almaricus, and Algarus the sonne of Meaninus, which ought to haue ayded him with the Southamptonshire men and Wiltshire men were of the Danes party, hee was sore wearied, but yet the first day of the battell, the fight was so errime and bloudie, that both the armies were so wearied, they were not able longer to fight.

The next day the king had ouerthrowne the Danes, but for Edrike of Straton, who seeing the Englishmen haue the better hand, he cutte off the head of a certaine man, named Osmearus, like to king Edmund in face and haire, and holding it vp, cried out, that the Englishmen fought in vaine, and held by the head, saying: Your master king Edmund is dead, die as fast as you can: which the Englishmen had no sooner heard, but they were ready to flie. But shortly after vnderstanding the king to bee alive, they took courage againe, and are carried vpon the Danes, and beate downe a great number of them. After this about midnight Canute commanded his people to depart with silence, and hastening toward London, went to their ships, and shortly after besieged London. Duke Edrike sued for pardon, and obtained it.

King Edmund hastened toward London, and deliuered the Londoners from the siege, chasing the Danes to their ships.

A trench cast, and ships towed about the south end of London bridge.

Gillingham fought in Dorsetshire. Benham.

About two daies after, king Edmund passed over the Thames at Wyntersforde, but passing the river manie of his men were drowned. He encresing his armie, halsted toward the West Saxons. And the Danes againe go by to London, but coulde there profite nothing: wherefore going from thence with their nauie, they enter the river of Arcine, and passe into Mercia, there to fetch spoiles, slaying all they mette, and burning Townes, and so laden with spoyle returne unto their shippes. After this their footemen passe in shippes into the river of Swerway, but their boyssmen toke prayes upon the land.

King Edmund againe passed the River of Thames at Wyntersforde, entered Kent, and fought with the Danes at Otford, and put them to flight: and if the false Edrike had not staied him at Eaglesforde or Nellsforde, hee had that daie gotten the full victory. So hee shoyte, the first and last battell was at Alesenden in Essex, nere to Rochford, here he put his army into thre battels.

In the meane time Canute bzinging his men into order, a fore battell was fought, and manie slaine on both sides. But Edrike perceiving the Danes to give ground, he with his power fledde, as he had promised to Canute, and so king Edmund and the English armie had the worst: there was slaine in that battaile, Duke Alfrike, Duke Godwine, Visekerrell Duke of East Angles, Athelwardus Duke, sonne to the Duke of East Angles, Athelwine called Gods friend, a duke: and almost all the compante of the English nobilitie. Cadnoth also bishop of Lincoln, sometimes Abbot of Ramsey, and Wolsey the Abbot, which were come together with their clergie to pray to God for the soules of that fought, were slaine. And Edmund went almost alone on foote to Gloucester, where he gathered a newe force to set upon his enemies, but Canute pursued him as he fled. And having prepared their armies, both the kings themselves attempted to fight by hand for the right of the kingdom in the Ile of Manis in Severne, in the which combate, they both being wearied, fell to a covenant to denide the same, so that the one halfe of the kingdom should be under Canutus, and the other halfe under Edmund, which Edmund not long after died at London, slaine by the treason of Edrike of Straton, and was buried at Glasterburie, leaving Edmund and Edward his children very young.

Canutus the Dane, taking an occasion, because in the covenant that was concluded concerning the deniding of the Realme, no assurance was made for the children of Edmund, he chalenged all England to himselfe alone by lawe as they call it, of growing to, which was a most easie thing for him to doe, because there was no man that durst erect himselfe as patron to defende the childrens right and title, and by this subtile and craftie interpretation of the covenant the Dane got the Monarchie of England, and helde the brother of Edmund, and continued the children farre awaie out of England, least they shoulde at anye time be brought againe and receive the full right. Some say, they were sent to a certaine man that was a Prince in Swerthland, there to be kept watched out of the waie: and that the Prince understanding they were king children, spared them, contrarie to the credite and trust that was committed unto him: which appeareth to be true, in that the same foraine Lord kepte and brought uppe the children honorable, the yongest of which, whose name was Edward, did afterwards marrie Agatha, the daughter of Henric the fourth, Emperour of Rome, of whome he had manie children, of which we shall speake hereafter. And the other, which was the elder brother, whose name was Edmund, died without children.

In the meane season Canutus, because he had no heire that lawfully might succede him in his kingdom (for Harolde and Swaine were begotten of a concubine) partlie that he might establish in time to come the kingdom that he had gotten unto his owne kinred that came by lawfull succession; and partlie that he might purchase to himselfe the friendship of the Englishmen, and of the Normans, procured to have given him in marriage Emma, the widow of king Ethelred, who at that time was with Edward and Alured her Sonnes in exile with Duke Richard in Normandie, which marriage seemeth to be made even by Gods providence, who had determined to restore the common wealth in England, whereby, as by the Lawe and Title of Recouerie, and returne out of exile, the monarchie of all England, which the Danes had taken from the Englishmen, and had possessed five and twentie yeres and more, did returne againe to the Englishmen that were the right heires. For Emma concluded marriage with the Dane, upon condition that the kingdom of England shoulde remaine unto none other but unto the children that were begotten of her, if anye of them did remaine alive: by reason of this marriage, shortly after the did beare Canutus a sonne of his owne name, commonly called Hardycanutus.

This second name was given him because of his great courage, like as his brother Harolde was named Harescote, that is to saie, Lightscote, because of his notable swiftnesse of foote.

By this assentie and alliance, the Danes became of the more strength and power. He kept the Englishmen in his service so long as he lived.

At the feast of Whitsmasse, king Canute being at London, commaunded the traitour Edrike of Straton to be put to death in his Pallace closelie for feare of tumulte. Some saie, hee was tormentted to death with firebrands and linkes: some saie one waie, some another, but dispatched hee was: for the king feared, through his treason to be circumvented of his kingdom, as his predecessors had bene before, to wit, Ethelred and Edmund. His bodie hee caused to be layde forth on the wall of the Citie, there to remaine unburied, to be seene of all men. With him also were slaine, Northman a Duke, son to Duke Leofwinus brother to Leofricus, and Ethelwardus the son of duke Egelmere, and Brichricus sonne of Elfegus prince of Denonshire: these died without fault (saith mine Author.) The king made Leofricus Duke in his brothers place, and helde him afterwards verie deare. King Canute subdued the Scots, whereby he was king of Englands, Scotlands, Denmarke, and Norway.

After that, king Canutus went to Denmarke, and so to Rome, and returned Canute founded anew the Monastery of Saint Edmund at Bury, restoring to the same, the donation which Edmund king of the West Saxons had given to Saint Edmund the king and Martyr, who was there buried: he displaced the secular Priests for their dissolute life, and placed there an Abbot with Monks, he gave to them many great liberties, and made a ditch overthwart Meltonmarket heath, it is now by some called, the Dineles ditch, to enclose the lands sometime belonging to king Edmund, and discharged the same of all tribute.

King Edward the Confessor, since that time, not onely confirmed the same liberties of S. Edmund, but also gave to Abbot Baldwin a Charte, and authority to haue an exchange of mints, and to come in his Monasterie: And moze to encrease their franchise, gave the manour of Eldenham and to towe, with eight hundredes to their possession (saith Iohn Lydgate) and trust it is, that I find in record, the franchise of Saint Edmundsbury, to containe the hundredes following, Blackborne, Wilsbyrge, Thedwarder, Wabbar, Colford, Shingo, Lackeford, and Goring halfe hundred. Thus much for the liberties of that towne. Now Baldwine a Monk, of Saint Dionys, physician to the said king Edward, being made Abbot of Bury in the space of nine and twenty yeeres, erected a newe Church of Stone, by licence of William Conquerour, brought from Caen in Normandy, landed at Waltham, and from thence brought by land to Bury: the foundation was accomplished, and the body of the Martyr, was translated out of a chappell called Botund, into a shrine prepared for him in the new Church of Bedfworth or Bury, in the yeere of our Lord God 1095. Thus much for Bury.

The church which king Canute, and Earle Tucketell builded on the hill of Aften in Essex, was dedicated with great honour, of Wollane Archbishop of Yorke and other bishops, the king and nobles being present.

Hee appointed to be king of Norway Swanus his sonne (as was saide) by Alfgine daughter to Athelme Duke of Northampton, and Lady Vulfune: but other saide hee was a Priestes sonne. He also appointed his sonne Hardicanutus by Emma to be king of Denmarke, and decreed at Shaffelsburie, when hee had reigned twentie yeeres, and was buried in Saint Swithins at Winchester. After whose decease and buriall, Queene Emma made her abode there.

Henry of Huntington of this Canute hath as followeth: When (saith hee) doe speake of the great deedes that hee did: first, that he married his daughter to the Emperour Conradus: that he went nobly to Rome, and came againe with precious gifts: that he set his fate on the sea strand while the sea was flowing, and commanded the sea not to rife, to wet his robes with clothes: but the sea keeping his olde course, rose, and wet both his fate and his thighs: whereupon the king started away, and saide: All men shall knowe and knowe, that the power and might of kings is vaine, and vanitie: and that none is worthy to haue the name of king, but hee that hath all thinges subiect to his commandment and lawes. And after this, this Canutus neuer bare Crowne upon his head, but hee set the same upon the head of the Crucifix at Winchester. Peter Picot, since chancelor of Paris, saith, that the custome to hang by the armour of kings and noblemen, and other in churches, sprang of that this Canutus refused to weare his crowne, and offered the same as he thweth.

Harold, for his swiftnesse called Harefote, whome Canutus had by a Concubine Alice of Hampton, a Shomakers daughter (affirming himselfe to be sonne of Canutus, and Alfgina the Earle of Northampton daughter) kept not upon the occasion and oportunitie offered, but using the force of the Danes that dwelt in England, invaded the realme, while his brother Hardicanute governed in Denmarke.

Hee took from his mother in law Emma, the most part of the riches and treasure that Canute his father had left her, and then with consent of the great lords beganne to raigne, but not so mightily as his father Canutus did, for a moze swift heire Hardicanutus was looked for, whereupon the kingdome was deuised, the north part to Harold, and the South to Hardicanute.

Edward and Alfred sons to king Ethelred, with manie knights, came out of Normandy, to see their Mother at Winchester, which sore troubled the mindes of many great men, who bare moze fauour to king Harold. Especially Godwyne Earle of Kent, faining to receiue Alfred as a friend, came to meete him, but in the end put him in prison, part of his company he put in fetters, and after put out their eyes. Of some hee caused their skinn to be plucked over their eares, chopping off their hands and feete. Some hee commanded to be sold, and others were murdered at Wilford.

After this, Alfgine was conueied to the Isle of Ely, where his eyes being first plucked out, hee was deliuered to the Monks to be kept prisoner there, where hee after hee departed this life, and was buried in the south Ile of the west part of the Church. Because Hardicanutus delated to come over being sent for, hee was utterly reiected, and Harold, who before was king of the Mercies and Northumbers, was chosen king of all England, who shortly after expelled his mother in law Emma out of the Realme. Hee reigned thre yeeres, died at Oxford, and was buried at Westminster, and after at S. Clements without Templebar at London.

Hardicanutus the lawfull begotten sonne of Canutus and Emma, as soon as hee had gotten his fathers kingdome, fetched home his mother out of exile: and in reuenge of displeasure that was done to her, and of the murder of his brother Alured, hee commanded the carcase of Harold to be digged out of the earth, and to be throwne into the Riuer of Thames, where by a sifter it was taken by, and brought to the Danes, who buried it in a church yard, which they had at London.

With done, the king appointed eight markes to be paid to euery sailor in his

his name, and sheweth markes to every pilote or master, which tribute was to be paid of all England, so grievous, that scarce any was able to bear it.

Shortly after, he sent for Edward the sonne of Etheldred his brother on the mothers side, to come into England, and embraced him with all love and favour. Being at a marriage feast pleasantly drinking with the Bide and other persons, in the midst of his cups he fell sodainly downe to the ground, and he remaining dumbe, departed this life the third yeere of his raigne, and was buried by his father at Winchester.

Edward boine at Ely besides Wyrd, the son of Etheldred, whome Hardicanutus had sent for into England at the age of almost fourty yeeres, was by the helpe of Godwine crowned at Winchester.

This Edward for his excellent holinesse, is untill this day called Saint Edward, who so long as he had gotten his fathers kingdome, of his owne free will released the tribute of fourtie thousand poundes called Dane gilt, which the English people, even from the verye beginning of the raigne of the Danes, was compelled to paye to their kings everie yeere. He was also the chiefe author and cause, that the law which we call the common Law, was first brought up, being gathered together out of the lawes and ordinances of foure nations, which were received when the Island was subiect to divers regiments and governmentes, to witte, of the Mercies, of the West Saxons, of the Danes, and of the Northumbers. He was hard to his mother, because she was hard to him in his minority, and also suspected with Alwine bishop of Winchester, whom he put in prison by counsell of Robert Archbishop of Canturburie: but after his mother had purged her selfe, Alwine was delivered, and Robert the archbishop conveyed himselfe out of England. He tooke to wife Edgitha, the daughter of Earle Godwine, who was a virgin most chaste, in whose breast there was a Schoole of all liberall Sciences (saith William of Malmesbury.) And for a farther testimony of the said Quene, Ingulphus witnesseth thus: Unto this Edward was given to wife, the daughter of Earle Godwine, a very beautiful woman, verie well instructed in learning, and for behaviour, and the rest of her life, a virgin most chaste, & for humility most holy, named Edgitha, in no point favouring of her father or brothers barbarousnes, but milde and modest, faithfull and honest, enemy, or hurtfull to no bodie: whereupon this verse was spoken of her:

I have seene her (saith Ingulphus) often, when being yet but a boie, I came to see my father, dwelling in the Kings Court. And often, coming from Schoole, when I mette her, she would appose mee teaching my learning and lesson, and falling from Grammar to Logicke, wherein she had some knowledge, would subtilly conclude an argument with me, and by a hand maiden give thee or foure paces of money, and send me unto the place where I should receive some vituals, and so be dismissed.

Now concerning this Edward, he was boine in England, as is afore shewed, but brought up in Normandy, and continuing there a long time, was in a manner manner become French, bying his brother, and drawing out of Normandy by himanie, whom he promoted to divers dignities, and created above measure. Among whom chiefly was one Robert a Monk of Gemetence, made by him first Bishop of London, and after Archbishop of Canturbury. And William the kings Chaplaine made bishop of Dorchester.

Then beganne the whole land under the king, and other Normans brought in, to leave off the English rites, and in manie things to imitate the maners of the French. All the noble men tooke it to be a great point of gentrie in their courtes to speake the French tongue, to make their Charters and debets after the manner of the French, and to be ashamed of their owne custome and use, as well in this, as in many other things. But here of more in another place.

He sent for home into England his nephew Edward the sonne of king Edmund his brother, who by reason of his long absence out of the country, was commonly called the Outlawe. This is that Edward the sonne of king Edmund surnamed Ironside, which remained alive, whome Canutus when hee had gotten England, had sent into Sweden with his brother. He knowing the abuse of his uncle, came againe into England, and brought with him Aegitha his wife, and Edgar, Margaret, and Christian his children, boine in Denmark, in hope of the kingdome, where hee lived but a while. Thus Saint Edward being disappointed, both of his nephew and his heire, so that Edward the Outlaw was both by nearnesse of blood, and by lawfull succession right heire unto the kingdome, without debate pronounced Edgar the Outlawes sonne, and his great nephew, to be heire of the kingdome, and gave him to surname Adelung, which name in those daies was peculiar onely to kings children, which were boine in hope and possibilitie of the kingdome: for this word Adelung, in the English tongue is as much to say, as Prince or Lord, the contrarye of which word is Vnderling, that is to say, a servant or bondman: or according to the Welch speech, Adelung signifieth heire: but because this Edgar was but young of yeeres, and in his age, by his testament he made Harold the sonne of Godwine (a stout man both in warre and peace) Regent, untill the young Edgar should bee of age to receive the kingdome, and that then he should be made the king: which thing Harold with a solemne othe promised to see performed and done. Notwithstanding, he like a Traytour (by force of armes) immediately after the death of Edward, refused the name of Regent, and pronounced himselfe king, which thing shortly after brought destruction both to himselfe, and to all England.

In the yeere of our Lord one thousand fourtie and five, King Edward gave a mightie navie into the Haven of Sandwich, against Magnus king of Norway, that meant to have come into England, but though the warres that Swanes king of Denmarke moved against him, his journey was broken off.

In the yeere of our Lord one thousand fourtie and sixe, Levingus Bishop of Exeter, Devonshire, and Cornwell deceased: and the bishopricke of Exeter and Cornwell was straight given to Leofike Baton the kings chamberlain.

In the yere of our Loide 1048. Magnus being dead, Swaine recovered Denmarke, and Harold Haruager sonne to king Swadus of Norway, returned into Norway, and shortly after sent Embassadors unto king Edward, offering to him peace and amitie, which hee accepted, and promised the like againe.

A great earthquake chanced on the first of March: a mortallitie of men and beasts followed, and lightning brent vp towne, and come in the fields, where through rose such a dearth, that one horse load of wheate was solde for five fillings.

In the yere 1049. the Irish pirates with 36. ships entring into the mouth of Seuerne, arrived in a place called Wiltscapam, and with the help of Galfich king of Southwales, spoiled about these coastes, and did much mischief. After this the false Galfich, and those Irish pyzates toyning their powers together passe over the river Wile, and brent Domesham, and slew all that they there found. Against whome Aldredus byshop of Worcester, and other of Gloucester and Herefordshires hastily went, but the Welshmen whome they had in their company, sent messengers to Galfich, willing him to make speed against the Englishmen, which hee did, and slew many of them, and put the rest to flight.

In the yere 1050. Edsine Archbisshop of Canterbury deceased, in whose roome the king placed Robert a Normanc, late bisshop of London, a great enemy to Duke Godwine, as shall be shewed in my larger Chronicle.

In the yere 1051. when the earth yielded not her fruites after the accustomed fertillenes, but famine consumed very many inhabitants, inasmuch that through dearth of corne, and want of bread, many thousands of men died: the good king Edward moved with compassion in ouer the poore, released for ever all England of the most greivous tribute called Dane Gilt. It is reported that the kings clemencie was moved to compassion, upon occasion as followeth. When his cradois (so) to were they then called) or treasurers (as we call them) had collected that greivous tribute called Dane gilt, and brought it into the kings chamber, the king being called to see the heape of so great treasure, was at the first beholding thereof much afraid, protesting, that he did see a Diuell dancing upon the heape of money, and making overmuch loy. And thereupon gave commandment, it should be fourthly rendered againe to the former owners thereof, & of so cruell an exaction, he would not keepe ore farthing, but released the said tribute for ever. Euflice Earle of Nullogne the elder, which had to wife Goda the sister of king Edward, arrived at Dover in Kent with a fewe ships, in the which Euflice whilest his souldiers calyly take by their finnes, they slew one of the towne men, in revenge whereof, not only the quarreller, but other of his company, with many of the Towne were slaine, which doing so much offended Godwine Earle of Kent, that hee assembled a great power out of all his Countreies, of Kent, Sussex, and Wessex, and his eldest sonne Harold out of his Countreies of Hereford, Gloucester, Hereford, Somerset, and Berkshire, & his son Swaine out of Galfier, East England, Huntington and Cambridge shires, so that he had a great armie, wherewith he marched towards Gloucester, where the king then lay, unto whom he sent messengers to denounce warre, except he would deliver Euflice, and his fellow Normans and Boloni-ans, which held a Castell upon the Cliffe of Dover: but king Edward when he understood that the armies of Leofrike Earle of Wessex, Siward Duke of Northumberland, and Ranulph Earle of Hereford were coming to his aide, he answered stoutly, that hee would in no wise deliver Euflice to the other demanded. But after this, Godwines armie entring into Gloucester, it was there agreed, that at a date appointed, the king and Earle Godwine should meete at London: & thus departing for the time, the king increasing his armie, led the same to London, and Godwine with his power came to Southwarke on the other side of the river Thamis into his own house, but there because his armie by little & little slipped from him, he fled, and the king forthwith pronounced him, with his five sonnes, to be banished, who straightwaies with his wife, and two of his sonnes came to Thorney, where his shippe being laden with gold, silver, and precious things, he sailed toward Flanders: his other sonnes take ship at Bristol, and sailed into Ireland.

The king forsaketh his wife Quene Edgitha for displeasure conceived against her father Duke Godwine, and sent her with one maiden unto Wiltton, in no honourable wise, where she was committed to the custody of the Abbess, William of Malmesbury addeth, that her goods being taken from her to the bettermost farthing, she was sent to Wiltton there to bee kept under the kings sister, least whilest all her parents were in sorrow for their Countrey, she alone should rest in ease: but a namelesse autho, that wrote a booke intituled Vita Edwardi, which he dedicated to the same Edgitha writeth thus. The king perceiving this honest cause of divorce, that in the Monasterie of Wiltton, where she had bin brought by, she should be, to quiet such troubles of the realme, & thus therefore with kingly hono, and princely company (yet sorrowfull) shee was brought to the bondes of the Monasterie of Wiltton, where almost one whole yere in prayers and teares she expected the day of comfort.

At this time the most noble Earle, or Duke of Normans, William, with a great traine came into England, to king Edward, whom the king honourably receiveth.

Emma late wife to the kings, Etheldred and Canutus, and mother to two kings, Hardicanutus and Edward, departed this life at Winchester, on the first of March, and was there buried.

Griffith king of Wales wasted a great part of Herefordshire, against whom the men of that country & Normans out of the castel, went, but Griffith obtained the victory, slaying many of them, and toke a great pray.

In the next yeere, Harold and Leofwine, sonnes of Earle Godwine, returning out of Ireland, entred Seamerne, arrived with many Ships in Somerset and Dorsetshires, spoiled manie Townes in the Countrey, slew many people, and returned with pray, then they saile about Poestelmouth, &c.

Earle Godwine landed in Kent, gathered a power, sayled to the Isle of Wight, waiking along the Sea coastes, till his sonnes Harold and Leofwine came with a flauie, which being come together, they take their course vpp the Riuer of Thamis, came to Southwarke, and there staid for the tide, and then lued by Anchor, and finding none that offered to resist them on the bidge, they sailed by by the south side of the riuer, & his armie by land, placing it selfe vpon the banks side, made thew of a thicke and terrible battail.

After this, the flauie turned toward the North shore, as though it would haue compassed in the kings flauie: but they that were with the king, and with Godwine, abhorred to fight against their owne kindred and countrymen, wherefore a peace was made, Godwine with his sons were restored to all their former honor, and the Normans were banished the land. Such as had given the R. eail counsel against the English, a few excepted, as Robert the deacon & his son in law, Richard fitz Scroby, Alnide the kings seler, Ansfidus surnamed Geereffer, and other whom the king before the residue loved, & had ben faithful to him and his people, these were permitted to remain in England. but when his strength failed him, on Thursday following he died in miserable torment, and was buried in the olde Monasterie of Winchester, whose Dukedome his sonne Harold toke vpon him, and his Earldome is giuen to Algarus the sonne of Leofricus Earle of Chester, thus hath Flurens of Winchester. Now to adde somewhat out of Vita Edwardi, Duke Godwine (saith he) and his sonnes being reconciled to the king, and the Countrey being quiet, in the second yeere after, died the said Duke of happy memorie, whose death was the sorrow of the people, him their father, him the nourisher of them and the kingdome, with continuall weeping they bewailed: he was buried with two wives honor in the old Monasterie of Winchester, giuing to the same Church giftes, ornaments and rentes of lands. Harold succeeded in his dukedome, which was a great comfort to the whole English nation, for in vertue both of bobie and munde he excelled all people, as an other Iudas Maccabeus, and was a friende to his Countrey, diligently supplying his fathers place, and walking in his steppes, that is to saie, in patience, mercie, and affabilitie to well willers, but to disquiet persons, theues and robbers, with a Lyons countenance he threatened his iust seueritie, thus much out of the auncient monument intituled Vita Edwardi.

Touching his Issue (saith William Malmesbury) Godwine in his first age had to wife the sister of Knute king of England, Denmarke, and Norway, of whome hee begate a sonne, which when he was past his childes age, whilst hee probably did ride vpon an horse, which the king his grandfather had giuen him, the horse bare him into the Riuer of Thamis, where he was drowned, his mother also was slaine with a thunderbolt. After her he married another, by whome he had five sonnes, to wit, Harold, Swaine, Tostine, Woolnod, Girche, and Leofwine, &c.

Siward Duke of Northumberland, ouercame Machute king of Scots, and made Malcolm the king of Camberlands sonne king of Scots.

Siward Duke of Northumberland departed this life at Pothe, and was buried in the Monasterie of Colmanho, dedicated to S. Olave the Martyr, which he had builded.

Griffith king of South Wales, and Algar spoiled the Monasterie of Hereford, slew the Canons and bent the whole Citie. Duke Harold repaired, but Remenius the Bishop reedified it of his owne proper expences.

Cito Edgare son to king Edmund Ironside, by procurement of his uncle king Edward came into England, out of Hungarie, where he had long remained, being now sent by the Emperour honorably accompanied together with his wife Agatha, and their Issue to wit, Edgar Adeling, Margaret and Christian, king Edward was purposed to haue made this Edward his heire of his kingdome, but he died, of Edgar Adeling his son ye shall heare more in the reign of W. Griffith king of Wales was killed by his owne people, his head with the head of his ship, and his armour was sent to Earle Harold, which he straight waie bringeth to king Edward.

Without the walles of London, upon the river of Thamis, there was a little monasterie with a few monks under an Abbot, here the king intended to make his Sepulchre, he commended therefore, of the tenths of all his rentes the worke to bee begun from the foundation, which happilie proceeded till the same was finished, he also caused the Parish Church of Saint Margaret to bee newe builded without the saide Abbey Church, for before the saide Parish Church stode within the olde Abbey, in the south Ile: This Church of Saint Margaret that king Edward builded, continued till the daies of king Edward the first, at what time the Staple of wools was at Westminster, and then the parishioners and staplers builded a newe the said Church of S. Margaret, the great chancel excepted, which was now lately made before by the Abbot of Westminster. The D. also having bene brought up in the auncient Monasterie of Runnes at Wilton, which Church was but of wood, began there a princelie worke of stone, and feruently persisted till the same was in princelie sort finished, dedicated, and indowed it with large possessions in Anno 1065.

This king Edward of famous memory (saith mine Autho:) before the date of his natione was elected of God, who perseuering in chastitie, led all his life dedicated unto God in true marriage, wherefore as we haue knowne promysed by god and sufficient men being witnesses, God greatly glorified him in his life with wonderfull signes, amongst the which, this that followeth was one. A young woman married, but without child: en, had a disease about her labes, and under her cheeke, like unto hernels, which they termed aloynes, and this disease so corrupted her face with vench, that she coulde scarce without great shame speake to any man, this woman was admonished in her sleepe, to go to king Edward, and get him to wash her face with water, and she should be whole. To the Court she came, and the king hearing of this matter, disoigned not to do it, and having a bason of water brought unto him, he dipped his hand therein, and washed the womans face, and touched the diseased place, and this he did oftentimes, sometimes also signing it with the signe of the Crosse, which after he had thus washed it, the hard crust of sinne was softened and dissolved, and drawing his hand by bladders of the holes, out of the hernels came little worms, whereof they were full, with corrupt matter and blood, the king still pressed with his handes to bring forth the corruption, and disoigned not to suffer the stench of the disease, untill he had brought forth all the corruption with pressing, this done, he commanded her a sufficient allowance every day for all things necessary, untill she had receiued perfect health, which was within a weeke after, and whereas she was ever before barren, within one yeere she had a child by her husband. And although this thing seeme strange, yet the physicians said that he often did the like in his youth, when he was in matrimony.

Next after this, mine authoys affirme, that a certaine man named Vlsinius Spilcome, the sonne of Vlmor of Nurgarhall, who when he betwix timber in the wood of Bzubeullena, laying him downe to sleepe after his sore labour, the blood and humours of his head so congealed about his eyes, that hee was thereof blind, for the space of 19. yeeres, but then (as he had bene moued in his sleepe) hee went woulwarde, and bare scoted to manie Churches, in euerie of them to pray to God for helpe in his blindness, and then last of all hee came to the Court, where a long time hee stode at the entrie of the kings Chamber, an earnest suiter, till at the length the king hearing of the blindmans dreame, hee said, by our Lady Saint Mary, I would doe much with a good will, if it would please God through me to haue mercie vpon the poore wretch, and thus being giuen to it by his seruants, he laid his handes & the water vpon the blind mans eyes, and straightway the blood dropped plentifully from him, and being healed, he cried with a cheerefull voice, I see the, O king, I see the, O king. Thus having recovered his sight, he kept the kings Pallace at Westminster a long season (for there hee was healed) after king Edward was dead, and deceased in the reigne of William Conquerour.

King Edward sickening on Christmas Eue, deceased on the fourth of January, and was buried at Westminster, on the day of Epiphanie, when he had reigned 23. yeeres, 6. monethes, and odde daies.

Alluridus Riualensis writing the life and death of this king, reporteth him to be a man bold of pride, a louer of peace, a vanquisher of Ire, a contemner of courtousnes, &c. And for example he writeth, that as king Edward on a time lay waking in his bedde, it chanced that his Chamberlain or Steward, taking monie out of one of the kings coffers, lest the same coffer open after him, and went his waies about the kings businesse, which thing being espied of a young fellow that was wont to wait on the kings table to beare away empty becell, he came to the coffer, thinking the king had bene a sleape, and thrust a great quantitie of monie into his bosome, and going awaie laid it where he thought best, and coming againe did the like, but when he came the third time, and that the king knew (as was thought) that his Chamberlaine was at hand, and willing the theefe to be boyde of danger, Thou art unfortunate saide the king, if thou wilt beleue me, take that thou hast, & get thee hence, for by Gods mother, if Hugelin come (for so was his Chamberlains name) he will not leaue thee one pennie, whereupon the young fellow ran his way, and was neither bittred nor pursued by the king, and behold, when the Chamberlaine came, and perceiued much monie to be gone though his negligence, he was in such sorrow, that his sighes and other noyse that he made betwixt him, whereupon the king rising, and seeming not to knowe the matter, asked what hee asked to bee so troubled, which when the Chamberlaine had tolde what had happened, holde thy peace saide the king, happily he that hath taken it hath more neede then we haue of it, let him haue it, that which remaineth is enough for vs.

On the brother to Harold.

Harold, the eldest sonne of Godwine, Earle of Kent, hauing obtained saye of the nobilitie take the Crowne, and that hee might in some behalfe seeme to make the young Edgar amends for the wrong he had done him, gaue him the Earledome of Oxford, and so from a king, he made him an Earle. But in the incense season England began to bee tossed & turmoiled with wars within and without: for the differiting of the right heire is alwaies wont to be the beginning of ciuill wars.

The 24. day of Aprill, a Comet appeared, not onlie to the people of this land, but also in other parts of the world seauen daies. Tofius enuying (as men saide) the prosperitie of his brother, stirred vp troubles in the Reialme, for hee joining himselfe to Harold the king of Norway, assaulted England in warlike sort, both by Sea and Land. Whose attempt whyles Harold of England prepared to withstand, William Duke of Normandie, who notwithstanding hee was a bastard, was of kinne to Saint Edward in the third and fourth degree of consanguinitie, seeing a convenient time and occasion offered to take the kingdome in, gathered a nauy of 896. ships, and came into England with a brave well appointed armie, alledging, that by all right and title it was due to him, by the gift of king Edwarde his kinsman, and also by the covenant that was made, and by other established betwixt Harold and him. He landed at Peimsey, nere vnto Hastings in Sussex, on the 28. daie of September, where in going out of the ship, the dukes foote slipped, but he recovered it well enough, and one of the souldiers that were next him, cried vnto him, he said, O Duke thou hast gotten Engl and, and thou shalt be king: he fortified there a pece of ground, and intrenched it, leauing there a competent number of his men to keepe the same, went then to Hastings, where he built another fortresse, not without vinding hee restrained all his host from roving, and by the space of fiftene daies, hee kept himselfe so quietly, that a man would haue thought he had meant nothing lesse then to haue warre.

Harold, notwithstanding hee was bare of men by reason of the battel that hee had fought against Tofius and the menne of Norway, yet hearing of Williams comming cwen so bloody as hee was in his armour hee went towards Hastings, being garded with a very small company of souldiers, his fatal destinie so disposing him forwarde headlong. Notwithstanding hee sent out before, them that should spy and blesse the number and force of the enemies, which when they were perceived to be among the Dukes tents, Duke William caused them to be led about the tents, and then made them good chere, commanding them to be sent home to the Lord safe without harme. When they were returned againe, Harold asked them what tidings they brought, and they with long commendation extolled the clemencie of the Duke, and in good sadnesse declared that all the host almost did seeme to be priests, because they had all their face & both their lippes shauen. For the Englishmen did leaue their upper lippes onhauen, with the haire growing alwaies, which thing also Iulius Caesar in his commentaries declareth to be an heathen fashion of the old Egyptians.

waye out of his mouth, and saide,asmuch as the Normans be of such great force, me thinketh it were not wisely done of you to soine battel with them, you cannot denie but that with or against your will, you made vnto him an othe, therefore you shoulde do more wisely, if you keepe you out of this present necessitie and strait, and do but onely leaue vs, and let vs abide the daunger to make a shew of battaile, we which neuer shewe to him maie iustlie draw our weapons in defence of our Country, you may iustly assist, and relesse vs if we die, and you maie auenge our death, if we be slaine. But such was the hardnesse of Harold, that hee would giue no good care vnto his counsaile, because hee thought it shame and reproch to turne his backe vnto any danger whatsoeuer, and with the same vnbisferetenes, hee draue away a monke that was duke Williams Ambassador, onely hee wished that God would be iudge betwixt duke William and him.

The sponke byought 3. offers, to wit, that either Harold shoulde vpon certaine conditions giue ouer the kingdome, or to be king vnder duke Wil. or elsse in the sight of both the armies, they two shoulde try the matter with the sword betwixt them, for Duke William chalenged the kingdome (as hee sayde) because king Edward by the counsaile of Stigand Archbyschoppe of Canterburie, of Earle Godwine, and Earle Swardus, had giuen it vnto him, (a thing unlike to bee true) if Harold would denie this, hee offered to stande to the iudgement of the sea & of the folk.

Of which message, the Ambassadour had none other answer given then I told you, whereupon he departed, and encouraged the hearts of his countrymen to battaile.

Then the stout Captaines on both sides set in order their battalles, according to the fashion of their Countreies. The Englishmen (as was reported) when they had spent the whole night in drinking, singing and dauncing, not sleeping one winke, in the morning, without delay fell vpon their enemies, all the footemen with their poleaxes being intrenched with their targets before them, made a ranke that nothing coulde enter vpon them, which thing without doubt shoulde haue bene for their safegarde, if the Normans had not sained as though they would haue fled, and by that meanes caused them to break the arraye wherein they had set themselves. The king himselfe stode a foote by the standard, and his brethren Cirche and Leofwine with him, to the ende that in such a common perill and leopardy, no man shoulde once thinke to flee or run away. Duke William after hee had got the victory, sent this standert to the hope, which was made after the shape & fashion of a man fighting, wrought by sumptuous art with gold & pretious stones: on the other side the Normans gaue the mules to acknowledge the firsts, and to praise al the night, & in the morning they communicated the Lords body. The footmen with their bowes & arrowes defended the first front, & the horsemen were set in the reeward divided into two wings. Duke William then with a loud voyce, declaring vnto them that God would be with them, because his quarrell was iust and good, called for his army immediately, and through the tumult and hasty running of his seruants, he put his coat of fence on the wrong way, to wit, the inner side outward, at which chance chance he laughed, and turning the right side outwards, said the pines of my dukedome shall bee turned into a kingdome. Then they beganne to sing the songs of Rowland, to the intent that the example of that man of armes should inflame them that should fight, then after they had called to God for aide, they beganne the battell, fought fiercelie, neither of both parts gaining place till the daie was farre spent, which thing when duke William did perceiue, hee gaue his men counsaile to make as though they would fly, & to withdraue the melles out of the felde, by which deuice the ranks of the Englishmen was broken, and while they meant to smite their enemies on the backs, the Normans turned themselves in good order, and set upon the Englishmen, being dispersed and out of array, and so put them to flight. Thus the Englishmen died a faire death in defence of their country, and yet they were not slache in reuenging of themselves, for they stood hard to it, and made great slaughter of them that pursued them, for hauing gotten a hill, they ouerthrew the Normans into the valley, as they courageously did clime to attaine the said hill, and with their darts which they shot, and stones which they cast upon the Normans, that were under them, with small labour beat them al into the bottome. Also the Englishmen with a sword, and to them wel knowne passage, running through a certaine ditch, did ouerthrow so many of their enemies following them, that with the dead bodies, they made theyr valley euen with the higher ground, thus it continued all that whole daie, that one while the English, another while the enemies had the better, so long as Harold was alliue, but in the closing of the euening, when he by the shot of an arrowe (which pierced his braine) was killed, the Englishmen fled awaie in the night season: one of the foul blows when Harold was slaine, did cut him in the legges with a sword, for the which dede duke William blaming him for his cowardlinesse and shamefull ad, put him out of the wars. Also duke William himselfe shewed his fiercenes in euerie place, three of his best hostes were slaine under him that day, the power of God so defending him that the enemy did drawe no blood of his bodie, notwithstanding the number of darts throwne at him. The two brethren of king Harold, to wit, Gernie & Leofwine were there slaine, with almost all the Nobles of England, and the Normans had the victory, especially (saith Rowle) by meanes of their wooden bowes and arrowes (which the Englishmen had not then in vse) for Duke William commanded his men that some of them should shote direaile forwarde, and other some upward, by reason whereof, the arrowes shot upward, destroyed the Englishmen as they stooped, and the arrowes shot direaile afore hand wounded them that stood upright. And king Harold himselfe (valiantly fighting) as before is said, was shot through the braines, whereof he died, when he had reigned nine monethes and odder daies. This battell was fought niner miles from Hastings in Southeser upon the 14. day of October being Saturday, in the year of Christ 1066. There was slaine of Englishmen 67974. saith I. le Tailor in his history of Normandy, of 47944. after other. And of the Normans 603. besides such as were drowned.

This was (saith Mathew Paris) the dolefull destruction of this sweete and pleasant lande, the kinges whereof (meaning the Saxons) at their first coming, ming, with barbarous countenance and gesture, in warlike sort, psoned all men to malice and hatred towardes them, who ouercame all men by warre and subtiltie: but after they had receiued the Christian faith, and by little and little applied their diligence unto Religion, they neglected the exercise of armes, for the kings did change their habites, and some at Rome, and some in their owne Countre, sought to change their temporall kingdomes for euerglasting kingdomes: and many which of their life time embraced worldly things, did yet distribute their treasures unto all the workers of mercy: but afterwards when charitie waxed colde, all their studie and traualle in religion slacked, and then came the destruction of the inhabitants: first at the coming of the Danes, and now in the expulsiue of the Englishmen by the Normans: for the noble men gluing themselves to gluttonie and lecherie, did not goe to the Church in the morning, as Christian men be to doe, but lying in their Chamber dallying with women, did heare the Priest hastily rattle up diuine service. The Clerkes also that had taken orders, if one had learned but his Grammar, euerie one wondred at him, the Monkes made a mocke of their rule, and were both sinellie apparelled, & metellicke bed fed. The common people were brought to bee a prais to the mightier sort, so that either their gods were looked from them, or else that was worse, their bodies were sent into farre Countries, to increase the riches of the great men that oppressed them, many when they had fulfilled their lust, and had got their maides with child, they sent them out to bee common harlots, all men in generall gaue themselves to drincking and gulling, and in that kind of exercise they continued sometimes night & day. These vices made the Englishmen effeminate, & womanish, whereof it came to passe, that running headlong against Duke William, they lost themselves and their country, with one, and that an easie and light battaile.

To conclude, the Englishmen were then apparelled in garments to the mid breast, their haire rounded, and their beards shauen, all saue the upper lip, their armes adorned with golden bracelets, and their skin marked, painted, and painted, at meat they forced the melles to sarfet, and drank till they vomited, the last qualitties they dealed to them that ouercame them, but I would not (saith mine author) you should thinke I speake these euillies of all Englishmen, for I know that many of the Clergie, did simply obserue the path of holinesse, and also of the lay people that did endeavour to serue God, &c.

When Duke William had gotten the full victory, hee caused his men that were slaine to be buried, and also gaue leaue that if any man would they might burye their enemies in like manner, he gaue the body of Harold unto Haroldes mother, at her request, taking no money, although by messengers she offered much, thus hee receiuing his bodie, buried the same at Waltham in Essex, in a Colledge which hee himselfe had founded to the honour of God and Saint Crosse, and had placed there a Deane and xi. Canons.

The death of Harold being knowne, Edwin and Morcar, two brethren of great towardnes, Charles, the one of Mercia, the other of Northumberland, which with their people had withdrauen themselves from the battaile, came now to London, and sending the Queene Edgitha, the late kinges sister into the city of Chester, they solicited the citizens to erect either of them to the kingdome, which enterprise of theirs being frustrated, they departed into Northumberland, supposing that Duke William would never come thither. The rest of the nobles with the Citizens of London would have erected Edgar the nephew of Edmond Ironside to the kingdome, and promised with him to give a new battaile to Duke William, but through the danger that was at hand, and the discourse that was among the nobles, they did neither. So that the Englishmen if they had agreed together, might have reformed the decay of their Countrey, but whilst they would have none of their owne Countrey men to be king, they brought in a stranger. In this meane time Duke William determining to passe to London, turned south of the right wale, over the west coastes of England, waiking and destroying through Suffolke, Kent, Surrey, Hampshire, & Berkehsire, till he came to Warringford, or Wallingford, from thence he passed over the River of Thames, commanding his army to settle themselves there for a while, from thence he passed through Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Hertfordshire, not ceasing to burne towne, and to hate the people, till he came to Berkeham, or Berkehamstede, where staying for a time, (for cause as that he shewed) thither came to him Aldred Archbishop of Yorke, Wulfane Bishopp of Worcester, Wilfre Bishopp of Hereford, Cito to Edgar, and all other the noble men about London, with many other, who altogether submitted themselves giving pledges, and swore fealtie unto him, with whome also he made a league, but notwithstanding he permitted his men still to burne towne, and to take spoiles.

The cause that Duke William staid at Berkehamstede, was this, there was at that time an Abbot of Saint Albones named Frederike, who when he hearde of Duke William his comming into Hertfordshire, hee caused the woods belonging to his Church round about Saint Albones, and so in the wales towards London to be felled, so that no man could passe that way for the trees that were layde crosse one over an other, and thus this Abbot for the time, kept his power from spoiling, for duke William could not come there, but was forced to coast about, to the Castell of Berkehamstede (as is afore sayd) whither by divers suretie he sent for Frederike the Abbot, and demanded of him, why such felling of woods was made about him more then in other places: whereunto Frederike answered, and said, I have done but as becommeth me, for if the spiritual persons throughout this land had done their endeavour against thee as they mought and ought to have done, it should not have bene in thy power to have entered the land so farre: quoth duke William, is the spirituality of England of such power? If I may live and enjoy that which I have gotten, I will make their power lesse, and especially I mind to begin with thee. The Abbot perceiving hee had saide so farre, as some as hee could departed home to his monastery, where calling a chapter of his brethren, he told them of duke William, what he had said, and then taking his leave of them, departed and went to the Isle of Cely, from whence he never returned to his Abbey.

When Christmasse approached, Duke William marched with all his army towarde London, whose routes comming together before him, to see the manner and behaviour of the people, found them assembled in the streets, determined to resist Duke William with all their might; but when the Duke came thither, he made a great slaughter of the Citizens, till perceiving themselves not able to resist him, they submitted themselves, and gave pledges unto him.

And thus ended the raigne of the Sarons, who were first sent for by Vortiger king of the Brytaines, as is afore said, about the yere of our Lord 450. and had continued sometimes in wars with the Brytaines, then with the Danes, and now with the Normans the space of 600. yeres.

This William was of a good stature, of a goodly countenance, and a valiant forwarde, his beards alwaies shauen, for so was the custome of the Normans, hee had great strength in his armes, so that many did wonder at him, because no man could dawe his boine, which hee would benche sitting on his horse backe, stretching out the string with his fote: hee made great and costlie feastes upon high and principall daies, keeping his Christmas offering at Gloucestre, his Easter offering at Winchester, and his Whitsun offering at Winchester, in each place being crowned, and this hee used euerie yeere so long as he continued in England. He caused all his nobles of what estate soeuer they were to come to those feastes, to the ende that the Ambassadors of feyrene countreies might wonder at the sight of such a multitude of people and preparation of delicate, and daintie fare, and hee was at no time more courteous, or ready to grant pardon to any that had offended, then at such times, onely conuolnesse of money was the thing, whereof he mought worthily be blamed.

Thomas Spot.
Will. Thorne.

King William took his tourney towards the Castle of Douer, to subdue that, and the countie of Kent: which when the Archbishop Stigand, and Eglesin the Abbot of Saint Augulines (being as it were the chiefe Lords and gouernours of all Kent) did perceiue and consider, that the whole Realme was in an euill state, and that whereas in this Realme of England, before the coming of the foresaide Duke William there were no bondmen, now all, as well noble men, as the common people, were without respect made subiect vnto the perpetuall bondage of the Normans, taking an occasion by the perill and danger that their neighbours were in, to provide for the safeguard of themselves and their Countrey, they caused to assemble at Canterbury all the people of the Countie of Kent, and declared to them the perills and dangers imminent, the miserie that their neighbours were come into, the pride and insolencie of the Normans, and the hardnesse and grieue of bondage and seruile state: whereupon all the people rather choosing to ende their unfortunate life, then to submit themselves to an vnaccustomed yoke of seruitude and bondage, with a common consent determined to mete duke William, and to fight with him for the lawes of their Countrey. And the foresaide Stigand, the Archbishop, and the Abbot Eglesin, choosing rather to die in battaille, then to see their nation in so euill an estate, being encouraged by the examples of the holy Macchabees, became Captaines of the armie. And at a date appointed all the people met at Swanefcombe two miles west from Chancel-ende, and being hidde in the woods, lay piously in waite for the coming of the foresaide Duke William. And because it can not hurt to be very wary in such cases, they agreed before hande, that when the Duke was come, and the passages on euery

the stopped, to the end he should no waie be able to escape, euery one of them, as well horsemen as footemen, should beare boughes in their haues. The next daie after, when the duke was come into the fields & territories nere vnto Swanefcombe, and saue all the Countrey set and placed round about him, as it had bene a stirring and moving wood, and that with a mirae pace they approached and dwelt nere vnto him, with great discomfite of minde hee wondered at that sight. And as soon as the Captaines of the Kentishmen saue that Duke William was inclosed in the middell of their armie, they caused the Trumpets to be sounded, their banners to be displayed, and theye downe their boughes, and with their bowes bent, their swordes drawne, and their speares and other kinde of weapons stretched forth, they shewed themselves ready to fight: Duke William and they that were with him, stode (as no maruail it was) loze astonied, and amazed, and hee which thought that he had already al Engl and fall in his fist, did now dispaire of his own life. Therefore on the behalfe of the Kentishmen were sent vnto Duke William, the Archbishop Sigand, and Eglesin Abbot of Saint Augulines, who tolde him their message in this sort.

My Lord Duke, behold the people of Kent cometh forth to mete you, and to receiue you as their liege Lord, requiring at your hands the things which pertaine to peace, & that vnder this condition, that all the people of Kent may enioy for euery their ancient liberties, and may for euermore vse the lawes and customes of their Countrey, otherwise they are ready presently to bidde battaile to you, and them that be with you, and are minded rather to die here altogether, then to depart from the lawes and customes of their Countrey, and to submit themselves vnto bondage, whereof as yet they neuer had experience. The Duke seeing himselfe to be drawn into such a straffe and narrow pinch, consulted a while with them that came with him, prudently considering, that if he should take any repulse or displeasure at the hands of this people, which be the key of England, all that euer hee had done before, should be vnto no purpose againe, and of no effect, and all his hope and safetie should come in daunger and teopardie: not so willingly as wisely hee graunted the people of Kent their request. So when the covenant was established, and pledges giuen on both sides, the Kentishmen being ioyfull, conducted the Normans (who also were glad) vnto Rochester, and yaldered by to the Duke, the Earle home of Kent, and the noble Castle of Douer. Thus the ancient liberties of England, and the lawes and customes of the Countrey, which before the coming of Duke William out of Normandy, were euill kept throughout all England, doe (through this industrie and earnest trauell of the Archbishoppe Sigand and Eglesin Abbot of Saint Augulines) remaine inuolubly obserued vntill this day, onely in the Countie of Kent. Thus farre Thomas Spot, after him William Thorne.

King William bought the Felwes from Khome to inhabite here: hee receiued homage, oath of fidelitie, and pledges of the nobles, and commanded that in euery towne and village a bell should be rung euery night at sight of the clocke, and that all people should then put forth their fire and candle, and goe to bedde, which order was observed through this Realme during his raigne, and the raigne of William his sonne. Thus were the English men forced to imitate the Normans in habite of apparell, chauning off of their beardes, service at the table, and in all other outward gestures.

The historiographers of that time accompted the yere to begin at Christmas, after which accompt then beganne the yere 1067. but after the accompt of England nowe observed, the yere beginneth not till the twentieth of March following.

And now because those houses maie not be intrembled unto whom King W. disposed the landes and possessions of this Realme for their good service, I haue thought good to publish the names of them as heretofore I haue done, out of the Chronicles of Normandy, gathered by William Tayleur of Abbeene.

To wit, Odo Bishoppe of Baton: Robert Earle of Mortaigne: These two were brethren to Duke William by his mother: Bandonni de Buillon: Roger Earle of Beaumont, that was furnished with the Beard, of him came the lineage of Melent.

Bishop of London.

William Bishop, and Godfrey Portgreue and all the barons of the Citie of London, in as large forme as they enjoyed the same, in the time of S. Edward before the conquest: in reward whereof, the Citizens haue fixed on his grave, being in the midst of the great West Ile of S. Pauls church in London, this Epitaph following:

G. Wilhelm viro sapientia & vite sanctitate claro, qui primum dno Edwardo regi & confessori familiaris, nuper in episcopum Londonensem erectus, nec multis post apud inuictissimum principem Angielmum Angliarum regem eius nominis primum, ob prudentiam fidemque singularem in consiliis adhibitus, amplissima huic urbi celebrissima privilegia ab eodem impetravit: Senatus populusque Londonensis bene memoranti posuit. Sedit Episcopus Annos 20. Decessit anno a Christo nato 1070.

TH William a man famous in wisdom and holines of life, who first with S. Edward the king and Confessor being familiar, of late preferred to be bishop of London, and not long after for his prudence and sincere fidelitie, admitted to be of counsell with the most glorious Prince William king of England, of that name the first, who obtained of the same great and large privileges to this famous citie: The Senate and citizens of London to him being well deserved, haue made this. He continued Bishop twenty yeeres, and died in the yeere after Christ his natiuitie 1070.

These Marble monuments to thee thy Citizens assigne, Rewardes (O Father) farr vnfit to those deserts of thine, Thee vnto them a faithfull friend, thy London people found,
And to this towne, of no small weight, a stay both sure and founde:
Their liberties restore to them, by meanes of thee haue bene,
Their publike weale by meanes of thee, large gifts haue felt and scene.
Thy riches, stocke, and beauty braue, one houre hath them suppress't, Yet thee thy vertus and good deedes, with vs for euer rest.

King William (leaving his brother Odo byshoppe of Bayon, and William Fitz Osborne whome he had made Earle of Hereford, to be wardens of England) returned into Normandie, which at that time was bent to thynke from him. He toke with him, Edgar Etheling, Stigandus archbishop of Canterbury, Frederike Abbot of S. Albons, Egelnothus Abbot of Glasseburie, Edwin Duke of Mercia, Morcarus Duke of Northumberland, Walden Earle of Northampton hampton and Huntington, Roger late Earle of Hereford, Renulph Earle of Cambridg, Gospatrike Earle of Cumberland, Guaker the son of Siward, and many other nobles of England, thinking they would be truer to him in a foreign country then in their owne: by their diligence he subdued the rebelling Normans.

When winter was at hand, king William returned, and set an impossible tribute on the English men.

William Conquerour gaue to Geoffrey Magnaule the Earldome of Essex, to the which Earldome, of ancient right belonged bearing of the kings banner, saith the Chronicle of Waltham.

After this, going into Devonshire, he besieged Excester, which the Citizens and other Englishmen held against him. The Countesse Guha mother of king Harold, and sister to Swanus king of Denmarke with many other fleeing out of the Citie escaped, and got them ouer into Flaunders, and the Citizens yielded to the king.

Matilda wife to king William came forth of Normandie, and on Whitsontide, was consecrated Quene by Aldred Archbishop of Yorke, Marleswine, Gospatrike, and other noble men of Northumberland, to oppose king Williams rough and boisterous dealing, and fearing to bee put in warde, taking with them Edgar Etheling, with his mother Agatha, and his two sisters, Margaret and Christian, went by sea into Scotland, where they were received, and well entertained of Malcolme king of Scots, who toke Margaret the sister of Edgar to wife. King William with an army went to Nottingham, and there builded a Castell. He also went to Yorke, and there caused two Castles to be builded, and put in the in garrisons: he commanded also Castles to be made at Lincoln, and in other places. Whiles these things were in doing, Godwine and Edmund surnamed the Great, sons to king Harold, returning forth of Ireland, landed in Sommerfetshire, where Edgredus that was master of the horse to king Harold, mette them with a great army, and fighting with them was slaine amongst many other. The two brethren hauing got the victorie, toke manie great prizes in Cornewall and Devonshire, and returned into Ireland.

It was the practise of king William to put the Englishmen into all places of danger, by that means to weaken their force: for against certaine Englishmen that after the battel at Hastings fled into Denmarke & Ireland, and came againe the third yeere after with a great power, he set an English captain with an hoste of Englishmen. so both the armies fought, and brought the victorie to the king: the strangers were chased into Ireland, but with great slaughter of themselves, and losse of their capitaine Ednothus, a man excellent in the time of the English men, both at home in his own countrey, and also abroad. He was the father of Harding, who liued in the time of king Henry the second. Thus when the power of the lay people was overthrowen, he also established, that no Clarke of the English nation should be suffered to come to any promotion. He abhorred much the gentleness of Knouth which sometime had bene king of England, for that he restored the m, whome he had overcome, vnto all the

But king William deposing them, distributed the Earldomes, Baronies, Bishopslikes and dignities to his Normans: onely Hereward alme mentioned in the yere of our Lord 1062. had reward with a prosperous end. For being in Flanders, and hearing, that the realme was subdued by strangers, and that his fathers inheritance (his father Leofinke being dead) was given to a Norman, and that his mother a widow was much troubled and injured, cometh with spede into England with his wife Thurfride, and gathering together a companie of his kindred, chased them out of his fathers inheritance. Then goeth to his uncle by the fathers side, then Abbot of Peterborough, and first making confession of his finnes, and absolution received, watcheth all night in the Church, in prayers and fasting, and the next daie offered his sword upon the Altar: and after the Gospell, the Abbot put the same beloved sword about Herewardes necke, with a benediction, and communicating the holy mysteries of Christ, from thenceforth remained a lawfull and souldour of knight.

Hereward returned into England.

This custome of consecration of a souldour, the Normans abhorred: and not onely this custome, but manie other they did alter and change: for the English men making deedes and charters, which to the time of king Edward had bene firme, by the subscriptions of the faithfull with Croeses of Golde, and other holie seales, the Normans did condemne those charters and deedes, and appointed them to make their charters and deedes firme, with a pinte, set upon ware by the spectall Seale of euerie one, under three or foure witnesses.

At the first, many formes and manors were given by bare wordes without writing: onely with the sword of the Lord, or his headpiece, with a borne, or standing goblet: and manie ornaments, with a quill, with a boile combe, a bolow, or arrow, to wit in the beginning of his raigne: but in the yeres after this manner was changed. They did so much abhorre the vcrp speech, that the lawes of the land were pleaded in the French tongue. And boies in Scholes were taught their letters, and principles in Grammar in French, and not in English, &c.

Of statutes and customes.

Among the lawes of William Conquerour, there is one of the Church as followeth. If any man breake the peace of the Church violently, he is in the jurisdiction of the bishops to haue iustice, but if the partie that is gualtie, flee from it, or arrogantly refuse the Bishops order, the king within forty daies shall be enjoined of it, who will presently take iusticie of him, that he shall satisfy God first, and then the king: but if within thirtie daies hee can not be found, the king by the wordes of his owne mouth shall outlawe him, and if after he be found, and maie be kept, he shall bee deliuered to the king alive, or els his head if hee defend himselfe, for hee beareth the head of a traitor, after the daie of his outlawrie, this is the generall law concerning our lawes.

Lib. Duclia.

King William gave to Robert surnamed Cumin, the Earldome of Northumberland, of whose coming thither, when the men of that country heard, they made themselves ready to forsake their houses, and to shift for themselves abroad: but suddenly there fell such abundance of snow, and roughnes of weather, that they could not in any wise flee, therefore they took a device and concluded, either to flee the realme, or els to die all together for the libertie of the country. The which thing when the Bishop of Durham understode, hee went out to meet the earle, and exhorted him to turne backe againe: but he suffering his souldiers to robbe and spoile, would not heare any counsel of health, but forthwith entered Durham with seven hundred men, spoiling like enemies through the house of Durham every where what they listed for the time, which lasted not long, for on the next morning early the men of Northumberland being gathered together, burst open the gates, and running by and to the walls, slate all that they found in that Citie, that took part with the Earle, whereby all the streets were filled with blood and dead bodies: some there were that defended the entrie of the house, wherein the Earle was, and had thought to haue saved himselfe, but the other by fire endeouored to burne the house, with all that were therein, whereby the west tower of the church was burnt, but through the wind that then blew out of the East, the church escaped burning: notwithstanding the house yet burning as it began, some of them that were within were burnt and other same, whilst they burst out to save themselves, were immediately slain, so that the Earle himselfe was dispatched, and all his souldours saving one that hardly escaped being wounded. King William taking great displeasure with these doings of the Northumbers, directed a certaine Duke with an army, to revenge the slaughter of Earle Robert: but when they were come to Alnerton, and was in the next morning setting forward towarde Durham, there arose such a darknesse of weather through thicke of clouds, that they could not see one another, so that they could not find their waie, whereupon they returned, and so it came to passe, God hauing pittie upon them, that they heard of the departure of their enemies before they heard of their coming towards them.

About the same time, by the testimonie of an old Chronicle in the Lib. Richmond at Richmond, king William gave such a gift of lands as followeth:

Lib. Richmond.

I William king, the third yere of my raigne,
Gave to the Norman Hunter, to me that art both life and deere,
The Hop and the Hopton, and all the boundes up and downe, Vnder the earth to hell, above the earth to heaven,
From me, and from mine, to thee, and to thine,
As good, and as faire, as euer they mine were:
To wimes that this is sooth, I bite the white waxe with my tooth,
Before Iugge, Mawde and Margery, and my yonger soane Henry,
For one bow and broad arrow, when I come to hunk vpon Yarrow.

King William gave lands to the Norman Hunter.

Lib. Ebor.
The Danes in-made England.

Somewhat before the feast of the natiuitie of our blessed Ladie, Harold and Canutus sonnes to Swamus king of Denmarke, Earle Esborne, Earle Tuckelus, Christerne their bishop, and many other, with 204. ships comming forth of Denmarke, landed in the mouth of the riuer Humber, where Olivo Edgare, Waltheus, and Merleswine, with many other, and the nante which they had assembled came to them, of whose comming Aldred Archbishop of Yorke being verie sorrowfull, made earnest intercession to almighty God, that he might not see the bitter ruine and destruction of his countrey, fell sick, and ended his life in the yere next following, as shall be shewed.

The eight day after the landing of the Danes, to wit, on the nineteenth day of September, the Normans that kept the Castle of Yorke, fearing least the houses that were nere to the Castle should be a furtherance to the enemies, to fill by the ditch, beganne to set fire on them, and to burne them vp: which fire increasing so exceedingly, invaded all the Citie, and consumed the Monasterie of S. Peter, together with the city, but this aue was grievously reuenged on them verie speedily, for before all the city was burnt, the Danish naue came, to wit, on the Monday, being the 21. of September, and breaking the castles, the same day slew above 3000. Normans, saving William Mallet and his wife, two of their children, and fewe other: which done, they returned to their ships with innumerable booties. Which doing, when it was signified to the king, he forthwith assembled an army, & halloed with an angry minde towards Northumberland, not ceasing to waste that Countrey all that winter, to kill men, and to doe all the mischief that was possible. In the meane time, messengers being sent to the Danish Earle Esborne, king William promised to giue to him no small summe of money, and to permit his army freely to take victuals, by the sea coast, with this condition onely, that winter being past, he should depart without battell. Esborne being too greedy of golde and siluer, not without great shame, yielded to his requests, and departed without more claime of this kingdome for that time.

By reason that the Normans had wasted England in Northumberland, and in certaine other places in the yere before, notice this yere, and the next that followed such a scarcity increased through all England, especially through Northumberland, and the countries next adjoining, that men were faine to eat horse flesh, cattes, dogges, and mans flesh; for all the land that lay betwixt Durham and Yorke, lay waste without inhabitants, and people to till the ground, for the space of nine yeres, except onely the territorye of Saint Iohn of Beverlake.

When Eglesine Bishopp of Durham hearde of the comming of King William, he and the elders taking aduise together, fledde to the Church of holy Land: but in the meane season the kings armie being scattered through out all places that sooner betwixt Sele and Ene, found nothing but empty houses euerie where: and then was bent the Church of Saint Paule at Parroto.

The Church of Durham being bereft of all ecclesiasticall service, was left like a desert, but Lent being at hand, when peace was made, the bishop returned againe, and entered the church the first of April, where he found the Image of the Crucifier cast to the ground, and altogetherspoiled of the ornaments. Through the counsell of William Fitz Osberd Earle of Hereford, and certaine other, in the Lent season king William caused the monasteries of all England to be searched, and the money which the richer sort of the English people, for the cruel spoiling which they saw in him had laide vp in the same Abbeies, he caused to be brought into his treasure. Roger of Wendouer Abbe, he bereaved all the Monasteries and Abbeies in England, of their golde and siluer, sparing neither Thalis nor Shyine, appropriating the said monasteries and Abbeies to himselfe: he brought under knights service, all those Bishoppicks and Abbeies that held baronies, which had bene free from all secular bondage, appointing them how many fouldours they should finde him and his successors in time of warres.

A great counsell was holden at Winchester by commandement of the king, who also was present at the same, Pope Alexander consenting therunto, sent by his Legates Ermenrich bishop, and the Priestes, Iohn and Peter Cardinals of the sea Apostolike, who exhibited there his authoritie. In which counsell Sigand Archbishop of Cantuarie was degraded for thre causes, to wit, because he did possesse vniuersally the bishoppicks of Winchester, together with his archbishoppicks, and because that whilest the Archbishop Robert was yet liuing, he had not only taken vpon him the archbishoppicks, but also in celebrating of diuine service, for a time used the Pall, which remained at Cantuarbury, when he was excommunicated by violence out of England, and after received the Pall of Benedict, whom the church of Rome did excommunicate, for that hee had invaded the Apostolike Sea by money. His brother also Agelwine Bishop of the East Angles, and diuers Abbots were there degraded by the kinges meanes, that other of his nation might bee placed in their romes, for the confirmation of his kingdome, many, as well Bishops as Abbots, who for no euident cause were depriued of their honour, and by the king vnto their liues end holden in prison.

When the feast of S. Iohn Baptist was at hand, Earle Esborne with his naue which had wintered in Humber, (according to appointment made) returned into Denmarke, but his brother Swain king of Denmarke banished him that reaine, for the money which (against his will, and the will of the Danes) hee had receiued of king William: whereby it appeareth, that Swaine B. of Denmarke succeeded not his claime to the crowne of England, as some haue affirmed, namely in a table, vniuersally intituled, The true portraiture of the countenances, and attires of the Kings of England, &c. collected by T. per diem perpetua contentio de Anglia fuit, sed nos pontifex numeris Guelicis persuasus, inter reges pacem firmare voluerit. Which is to be Englished thus: by twene Swene and the barke, there was continuall contention, although our Bishop being perswaded with the giftes of William, would have established peace betwene the kings. Marke how little this without treueth to his interpretation, and now to our purpose.

King William having placed a Canon of Bayon, named Thomas the elder, in the Archbishoppes See of Poike, doth also now call for Lanfranke Abbot of Cane in Normandie, that was a Lombard, borne in the cite of Bapiza, a man skilfull in science, prudent in counsell and government of thinges, and for religion and life most holie, him he made Archbishop of Canterbury. This Lanfranke being consecrated archbishop of Canterbury, he consecrated Thomas Archbishop of Poike, but not before he had made profession of subiection to the said Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury, which the said Thomas was ordered by the king to do, and did before his consecration.

Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury being in such fauour with king William, that the same William thought not good to deny any thing that he requested, procured by his industrie that the said king left his euill custome of selling his prisoners, which he toke in Ireland: which was a thing hardly granted to him, and to Wolfane Bishop of Worcester, the gaines that the king had by the sale of those Irishmen was such.

The Carles, Edwine of Mercia, Morcare of Northumberland, Siward lay named Bran, Eglewinc Bishop of Durham, with many knights and souldiers, both of the cleargie and lay people, fearing that king William would put them in prison, secretly fled out of the court, and for a time rebelled against him, till they perceived the thing they had taken in hand, went not well with them, and then Carle Edwine determining to goe to Malcolme king of Scots, was in the way thitherward slain through treason of his owne people.

Eglewinc bishop of Durham, Carle Morcare, Siward surnamed Bran, and Hereward, a right balliant person, with many other, went into woods and wild places of the countrey, because they were not able to abide the force of king William: and after they had done much harme in many places, at the last, they came into the Isle of Elp by boate, and chose there a place in the fennes, they make Hereward their Captaine of the warre, where hee did manie warlike feates, so often overcoming his enemies, so manie times belouding them, that he deferred perpetuall commendations, for as long as he could, he with ned the ruines of his countrey decaying.

Whereof when as king William was aduertised, hee gathered a great power, marched thitherward, and stopped their going out of the Isle on the East side thereof, and caused a bidge of canvas of two miles in length to be made in the West part. Hee also (saith Roger of Wendouer) builded a Castle from the ground vpp, in a place called Wilsch. Whereupon they of the Isle perceiving themselves so inclosed, they raised a fote of earth of turkes and timber in the marshes, which by the inhabitants of that countrey, is called the Castle of Hereward: this castle they raised against the assaulting of the kings hoste, and fought with their enemies many daies together. From thence the king went to the castle of Grantbidge, from whence, as the necessity of the time required, set forth others companies to bedge and trouble the next places unto the Isle, for the king himselfe was called vnto other businesse, and enforced to repaire into Normandie, to speake with Philip king of France. In the meane time Hereward, and the nobles of England obtained by price, which they were not able to doe by prayer, and won the Scots to take their part against the Normans. And also the Danes fauouring them, did greatly desire to triumph over the Normans. Further, there were within the Realme great commotions on euerie part, as well by the Normans, as other against the king, by perswasion of Carle Ralle de Walser, calling Hereward into that faction, and others the nobles of England, as Morcare, Echelm, Waltheum, Siward, and Edgare. At which time Hereward leaving the Isle of Elp, committed to him for safeguard, went towards the English, to whom a balliant company of young souldiers did toine themselves, which no man durst encounter.

Malcolme king of Scots with an innumerable multitude of Scots, passing through Cumberland, and turning aside towards the East, did cruelly forrage all Ceddale, and the places nigh adioyning: but when they came to a place called Hunnorsfelde, after they had there slaine certaine noble men of the English nation, the king of Scots sent home part of his army laden with spoiles. Then he set vpon Holbernelle and destroyed the same with a sodaine destruction: then raging through the groundes of Saint Cuthbert of Durham, he cruellie departed all men of their goods, and manie of their liues. At the same time also did he consume with fire, the Church of Saint Peter at Wethermouth, and others other Churches, with them that were thither fledde to saue themselves. And whiles the same Malcolme rode about the river banks, delighting his eyes with the cruell actes committed against the English people: it was tolde him that Edgar Echeling with his sisters of the blood royall, and manie other noble men, banished from their lawfull inheritance, were arrived at that haen: he came to them, and shaking hands with them, gaue them and all theirs licence with his assured peace to dwell in his kingdome as long as they would.

Besides these robberies of the Scots, Gospatric of Northumberland did waste Cumberland, and made there great slaughter and burnings, and after returned with great bootie, to a strong fortrell at Wabbungh, where hee with his fellows inclosed themselves: for at that time Cumberland was vnder the inhibition of king Malcolme, who when he heard what was done by Gospatric, he charged his souldiers to spare none of the English nation: whereupon, pittifull it was to beholde, olde men, and women, some were killed with swordes, some pierced with speares, the young babes taken from the mothers papies were cast by into the aire, and falling downe againe, were reueiled on their speares, and then the speare haues stricken into the ground in a balliant together: but the young men and maidens, such as were thought meete to labour, were bound, and forced to be slaves. Ex tab. Ofney.
Annoreg. 6.

At this time (saith Houeden) Scotland was so replenished with bondslaves, men and women of the English nation, that no village or cottage could be found without them.

The Castle of Eades in Kent was builded by Creuicure, a noble man, a Norman.

The Castle of Orford was builded by Robert de Olly the first, a noble man that came into England with king William the Conquerour.

Also William Earle Warren, that came in with William the Conquerour, and married Gundred daughter to the said William, this yere founded the Priorie of Iles in Suffex.

This yere, by the commaundement of Pope Alexander, and consent of King William the Conquerour, in the presence of the said king, his bishops, Prelates, and nobilitie, the title of Primacie, the which Lanfranke Archbyschoppe of Canterbury did claime over the Church of Yorke, and concerning the ordering of certaine Byschops, whome men were vncertaine unto which Archbyschoppe they shoulde especially belong, was examined and tried out: where, by the authoritie of olde Writings it was proued and declared, that the Church of Yorke ought to bee subiect unto the Church of Canterburie, and ought faithfully to obey the same, in all matters pertaining unto Chryslian Religion, as being Primacie of all England. And the Archbyschop of Canterburie, as Metropolitane, graunted the Archbyschop of Yorke and his successors, to haue vnder their iurisdiction, the Byschopricke of Durham, that is to saie, Lincolne, and from the great Riuer of Humber vnto the bittermost part of the borders of Scotland, and also all whatsoever doeth appertaine to the parish of Yorke vpon the side the Riuer, so that if the Archbyschop of Canterburie doe summon a councell in any place, the Archbyschop of Yorke and all his Suffraganes, Subiects and Clerkes shall be there present at his commaundement, and shall be obedient vnto his canons and orders, &c. at London.

King William went into Scotland, and Edric king of Scots did homage vnto him.

King William hauing in his companie Edric surnamed Syluaticus, or Wildoe, marched towarde Scotland with a nanie by sea, and with an armie of horsemen by land, to haue subdued Scotland, for that Malcolm had in the yere last before passed, so cruelly desolated the borders of his kingdome.

In the which iourney, when king William came vnto Durham, hee entered the Church with great deuotion for to pray, and afterwarde hee inquiring of the life and conuersion of the Confessor Cuthbert, and also of the antiquitie of that Byschopricke, hee confirmed all the Libertiees of that same Church, &c.

This being done, King William went into Scotland, against whome King Malcolm came vnto a place called Aberinthe, and became his man. And after king William deposed Gospatricke of his Earldome, laying vnto his charge, that he had consulted with them that helpe the Earle Robert Com-

men of Durham, and that hee was among the enemies, when the Normans were slain at Yorke: who being erpuised, Waltheus was entolled vnto that Earldome, being due vnto him both by father and mother, for he was the son of Earle Siward by Elfied the daughter of Aldred sometime Earle.

At the same time when king William returned from Scotland, he builded a Castle at Durham, wherein the Bishop might keepe him and his safe, from him builded, such as made assaults.

This yere Eglewine Byschop of Durham, who had bene by king William committed to prison first at Abindune, and since at Westminster deceased, and was buried there in S. Nicholas chappell.

King William went into Normandie, which Duke done was then rebellious against him, but with strong hand he subdued the Citie of Bayne, and the whole Countrey, especially by the helpe of Englishmen, whome he applied in these affaires, they spoiled the cities, townes, vineyards, and cornfields, whereby they greatly weakened and empouerished that prouince. Clito Edgar at this time came forth of Scotland, and passing through England, went into Normandy, and was there agreed with king William.

About this time the Monkes of Ely, seeing the miseries of themselves, and of the whole Island, determined to trie the kings clemencie, for there was such a dearth in the land, as the like had not bene sene, for al prouision being spent, many thousands died through hunger, since it was now the seventh yere since they had bene besieged, wherfore taking their iourney to Warwike a famous towne, they came to the king with great reuerence, commending themselves, and all that they had to his clemencie. Thurstane and his Monkes standing before king William, beseeched him for the mercie of God to turne his displeasure from their Citie, promising faithfully hereafter to obey him. The Abbot saide, that if the king would restore vnto the Abbey their possessions, violently taken from them, hee might haue sure entrance into the Ile: which the king granted, and commanded William de Warren, and Gilbert de Clare, that they shoulde become pledges for the same. Whereupon the Abbot conferred with them about the regathering together of their possessions. Who (going after to his owne) did first instruct Gilbert de Clare, and Earle VVarren of the manner of the rebellion, willing them not to feare for the often repulse of the enemies, for they shoulde haue his counsell and helpe, whereby the king might vnderstand that the power of the enemies was weakened.

Whereupon the king began to triumph, as though he had already got the victorie: he assembled therefore as great an armie as he could be both of horsemen and footmen, he toke his iourney to Ely, he prepared his engines, laid siege to the place which was of most defence, and daily laboured to overthrow that which Canutus neither with wit, or strength, with policie, or (wo)de could at any time subdue.

At length, though with difficulty wonderfull to be declared, he safely brought his army nearer then anie one thought he could haue done, which was euen to the waters of Ely, the Normans passed Cottinglade, neither did it grieve the king first to passe ouer many riuers, although he was almost drowned at the point point Sale: hee could not for marches or other neuer so dangerous, till the sounding voice of braze quickly drave the enemies out of the Iland, but the Normans compassing the enemies, did in a moment take a thousand of them, wherefore the king as soon as he had entered the Iland, went about the mores, marches, and crooked wailes, and with siege inclose the whole company of his enemies. These armed men are brought forth, first the Captaines, then the better sort of the other, where hee imprisoneth some, and put out the eyes, cut off the hands and feete of other some, and suffered the multitude of the common people to depart.

In this Ile he found abundance of beastes and cattell manifolde to recompence his slain horses and other damages. Edwine is taken, and with him many persons of name & power, who were bound in strict prison, but Edwine was escaped: forthwith the king sent a great company to keep the gates of the monastrey, to the end the Monks with crosses and other ceremonies should not moleste him, and entreate for pardon at his hand, whereunto hee must needs have granted. Wherefore when he came to the monastrey, he rode aloofe from the tombe of Saint Ethelred, and hurled a marke of golde upon the Altar. Which done, and having placed a garrison within the walles of the Monkes: he disposed of Grantzibidge, Huntingdon, and Bedford shires, committing them to such men as he had brought out of France: and likewise placing a strength of Frenchmen in the Castle of Alrech, he went out of the Iland, the same way by which he entered into it: there was no divine service since that unto the xxvij. of October, the time was so troublesome. After the king was departed, the Church doores were fast locked: and Gilbert de Clare entering the monastrey to see the monks places of offices, in the end came into the refectory, finding the Monks at dinner, said to them, Oh wretches and slothfull persons, had you none other time to dine in, but whilst the king remained in your Church: With which wordes they all rising, ranne to the Church: but when they found not the king there, they were greatly troubled: wherefore gaining no hope but in God, they required Gilbert de Clare, that by his means they might obtaine a firme peace, which in the ende taking upon him to doe, he went to the king, and with great difficultie obtained the same: with condition, that when the Monkes came before him, they should by prayer or price pacifie his displeasure against them.

This done, he brought the Monkes before the king to Wichford, where he then sojourned, who being with much adoe brought in favour with the king by the false Gilbert, and other noble men, promised seven hundred markes of Silver. For the providing whereof, the Monkes were enforced to spoile and sell the iewelles and ornaments of their Church, and then repaie to Grantzibidge to paie that money to the kings officers: but one great being lacking of the said summe, by the deceit of such as did tell it, the waight was not full, by so much. Whereof when the king had understood, hee was greatly offended with them, denying unto them all manner of hope of any further peace. Whereupon they were driven to make an other composition of a thousand markes, for the which they were faine for to spoile, and to sell whatsoever other kind of ornaments that were left, and yet notwithstanding, lacked that peace which they so much sought, and so deere bought. Walter boyme at Eboraine, was elected by the king, and then consecrated Bishop of Durham.

King William the Conquerour with a great power of Englishmen went into Normandie, which rebelled, and subdued it, spoiling the cities, towncs, vineyardes, &c.

Gregorie the seventh, Pope, excommunicated all committers of symonie, and removed married Priests from executing divine service, whereof rose great troubles in England.

Radulph whom lately before king William had made Earle of Rossefolke and Suffolke, or, as some write, of the East Angles, now hee toke to wife (against the kings commaundement) the daughter of William Fitz Osbert, sister to Roger Earle of Hereford, and celebrating most royally the marriage feast, with a great multitude of noble men at Erningham in Grantzibidge shire, concluding a pride of his marriage, for that his wife was the kings kinswoman, even upon the marriage day, when the feast was solemnly kept, and the riotous superfluity of the Englishmen was entered into the Normans thowates, the guests being drunken and full of wine, with a long circumstance of wordes, he opened his minde and purpose, whereunto the guests consented with a great shout. There was Roger Earle of Hereford, Radulphs wines brother: there was Waldeosus Earle of Northampton and Huntingdon, and many other, who all conspired the kings death. But on the next morrow, when the heat of the wine was digested, and the mindes of some of them come to better temper, the most part of them repented of that they had promised, and slipping away from the feast, Waldeosus as soon as hee could went to Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury, and toke penance for his othe which he had received against his will, and though his advise went to the king, then being in Normandie, and opening the matter unto him, yielded to his merrie. The other Nobles proceeding in their beguine conspircie, went to their Castles, and raised their people to open rebellion. But Wollane Bishop of Worcester, with a great bande of men of warre resisted the Earle of Hereford, so that hee might not (passing the River of Senerne) come to Earle Radulph at the appointed place with his campe, in whose companie was Aglewine Abbot of Cueltham, with his people, having called to his aide Vre the rifice of Worcester, and Walker de Lacie with their men, and other multitudes of common people.

But Odo Bishoppe of Bayon, and Godfrey Bishop of Constance assembling a mightie armie as well of Englishmen as of Normans, came to encounter Earle Radulph being encamped at Grantzibidge, where earle Radulph perceiving that his enterprise wanted force, fearing the number of them that came against him, he secretly fledde from thence to Northwich, where committing the Castle to his wife and knights, he getteth himselfe to flicke, and fled into little Baptaine, whom his enemies pursuing, slew all those of his men that they might come to: and after this they besiege the Castle, till that peace

Ingulphus.

These thinges being done, the king in the hartell returning forth of Normandy, put Earle Roger of Hereford in prison, wherein hee remayned all the dayes of his life: and all the Englishmen that had bene at the marriage, hee caused to have their eyes put out, their hands cut off, hanged on gibbets, or to be banished at the least. Earle Waltheofus also was committed to prison, although that hee went to the king, and had obtayned of him a promise of pardon.

Counte the sonne of Swaine, and Hacon the Earle came out of Denmarke with two hundred ships full of men of warre: but when they hearde that their factors were overcome, and banquished, they turned their backs, and sailed into fflanders, and durst not fight with king William: but William of Malinesburie saith that king William did likewise by the earle Hacon, as before he had by the earle Elborne.

Edgitha late Quene of Englande, wife to king Edward, called (of some) the Simple, or (of other) Confessor, daughter to Duke Godwine, and sister to Harold late king of England, departed this life at Winchester, whose corps, by the kings commandement was brought to Westminster, and there by her husband solemnele entered: there had a Tombe of silver and golde curiously wrought. This Quene Edgitha possessed on her death bed, that notwithstanding shee had bene manie yeres wife unto king Edward, yet now shee died a pure virgin.

King William banished certaine rebelles, others hee dismembred, as by putting out their eyes, and chopping off their hands. The earles Waltheofus, and Roger, by iudiciall sentence, hee condemned unto more streite prisons.

At this time (saith Ingulphus) Brand, Herewards uncle, Abbot of Peterborough, being dead, succeeded Thorold a stranger, by the gift of king William, which thing Hereward taking in ill part, that a stranger should rule over his kintred, hee invaded Peterborough, and chased away the Abbot. And though in the sayde Abbots defence, Iuo Talbois a most mightie Norman, and by the gift of king William made Lozde of all Hollar in Lincolnshire, Hereward tooke the sayde Iuo in open battell, and set him free for a great summe of monie. To this Iuo Talbois king William had given to wife Lucie, the sister of the earles Edwyne and Morcar, with all the landes and tenementes that to the said earles had appertained.

At this time moreover, to increase the calamitie, happened the cruel beheading of earle Waltheofus of Walden: and although Lanfranke Archbyschoppe of Canterburie his Confessor, affirmed him to be free from the conspiracy and faction, and that if it chanced him to die in that case, he should for his innocencie be counted a martyr, yet his most wicked wife, coveting to be married anew, did most hainously hasten the death of her husband. Certaine Normans also gaped after his Earle, namely of Northampton, and Huntingdon, and Iuo Talbois Earle of Angew, most greedy to make those landes and tenementes mentes his owne, by bloodshedding, this innocent and harmlesse man was beheaded without the Citie of Winchester, upon the last day of the moneth of May, and was there basely buried, in a place, where since was builded the chapel of Saint Giles: but sixtene daies after by permission of the king, his body was conveyed unto Crokland, and was there honorably buried. Iudith Earle VValtheofes widow, after the decease of her husband, with her two daughters, had the Lordshipp of Huntingdon given to her in the name of a dowrie, and there made their abode, untill such time as the king was willing to marrie her to a knight boyne in France, named Simon Syluaticus or Seintiz. For his brother came two brethren to the aide of the king, and to serve him with forty soldiers horsemen, their names were Guarnerus le Riche, and Simon de Sendiz, and their fathers name was Ranulph le Riche, after whose death the eldest son, Guarnerus went backe into his native Countrey, and succeeded in his fathers possessions: but Simon the younger sonne remained here with the king, unto whom the king gave the Towne of Northampton, and the Hundred of Shacpley, hee builded the Castle of Northampton, and also the Abbey of Saint Andrewes there. The king would have given unto him Iudith the widow of Earle Waltheofus, but she refused him, because that hee halted on the one legge: in wach whereof, king William bestowed upon him the whole honour of Huntingdon, and so was he called Earle of Northampton and of Huntingdon, &c.

This yere mine ofte alleadged Anthon Ingulphus, was by the kings gift made Abbot of Crokland, which Ingulphus, of himselfe, and his becalon to the Abbacie of Crokland writeth thus: I Ingulphus, an humble servant of God and Saint Guthlake, and of the monastery of Crokland, boyne in England, and of English parents, in the most beautiful City of London, for to attaine to learning, I was first put to Westminster, afterward to Oxford to studie. When I had profited in reading Aristotle above manie mine equals in age, I studied also Tulies Rhetorikes: waxing elder, loathing the base estate of my parents daily more and more, I desired to leaue my father and mothers house, and to be in kings and princes pallaces, to be attired in silkes and gorgeous apparell. And beholde, noble William, now our king of England, then Duke of Normandy, came to London, to talke with his cousin king Edward then king of England, with a great traine attending upon him, unto whom I soone toynd my selfe, thrusting forwarde, to dispatch all businesse arising, I became in a little time knownen to Duke William, and was of him verie well beloued, and with him I sayled into Normandy, there was I made his Secretarie, I ruled the whole court of the Duke at my pleasure, to the enuie of manie.

At length it was noyed, that many Archbishops and Bishops of the Empire, and many other Princes would go to Jerusalem, I among other, as well soldiers as clerkes, with the licence of my Lozde the Duke, prepared my selfe. Comming unto Constantinople, wee did reverence to the Emperour Alexes, &c. Departing from thence through Italia, we fell into the hands of Arabian robbers that tooke from us much money: wee came at the length to Ierusalem, where the Patriarke Sophronius received his honourable, and brought us to the Church of the holie Sepulture, and so to other places. In the spring returning home by Rome, and so into Normandie, I halted to the Abbey of Fountauill, where I received the habite of a Monk, meaning to purge and amend, as the grace of the holy Ghost inspired mee, the offences of my youth, and ignorances, &c. At what time duke William understanding of the death of king Edward his cousin expected a favourable wind in the port of Saint Valarke, to saile over into England, I presented unto him the Abbot's gift, to wit, twelve yong men chosen on Holsbachie and armed, with an hundred markes towards his expences in that voyage, and I returned to the Monasterie. After certaine yeres Walkerelus Abbot of Cropland was deposed of his office; King William sent to the Abbot of Fontauill for me, &c. To London I came to the king, there inuaded of the stasse and passuall office of Cropland Monasterie, and consecrated on the day of the natiuitie of our Lord. On the day of the conversion of St. Paul I first came to Cropland, and was installed, 1075.

The king passing ouer the sea, went into little Bytaine, and besieged there the Castell of Dolence, belonging to earle Ralph, but Philip king of France came with a great power vpon them, and tooke all victualles from them, so that king William was forced to leaue his siege with the losse of manie soldiers and hozes, with much other substance: and not long after king William made peace with them.

Walter Bpshop of Durham, borne in Normaine as is aforesaide, is slaine by the Northumbers, in a place called Gatelysh, in reuenge of a Noble man named Leulfus, befoze slaine by meanes of the Bpshoppes Chaplaine named Leofwinus. The sayde Leulfus in manie partes of England intoped great possessions by right of inheritance, but because the Normans euerie where practised their cruelty, he got himselfe with all his family to Durham, he had to wife Aegitha, daughter to Earle Aldred, of whome hee begate two Sonnes Vred and Morcare.

This Leulfus was so beloued of the Bpshoppes, that without his counsell, hee woulde doe nothing of anie great weight, for the which cause the Bpshoppes Chaplain Leofwinus greatly hated the said Leulfus, and therefore on a time going ing out of the court house, or mete hall called unto him Gilbert, a man to whom the byshop had committed the earledome of Northumberland under him to be gouerned, he requested him to reuenge his displeasure against the said Leulfus, and as soon as he could to put him to death, which hee performed in this manner, gathering together his men of warre, one night went unto the village where Leulfus dwelt, and there in his owne house, together with all his familie, slew him, which thing being knowne, the Byshoppe sore vexed in displeasure therewith, toke his hode from his head, threw it to the ground, and saide to Leofwine his Chaplaine, these thinges are done by thy meanes Leofwine, and therefore I will that thou know for certaine that thou hast killed me, and al my familie with the sword of thy tongue. Having this said, he got him straight into the Castell, and forthwith sending messengers through Northumberland, he caused to be declared to all men, that he was nothing pained to the death of Leulfus, but was now desirous to banish his sister Gilbert and all his fellows in that action, and for himselfe he was ready to purge himselfe according to the Ecclesiasticall lawes. This being signified, the Byshop and the friends of him that was slaine, professing to be at peace together, appointed a day and place of meeting together, where they might establish a more firme peace; to wch when the day came, they met at the place appointed, but the Byshop refusing to talke with them abroad, abode in the Church thereby with his cleargy and knights, and when the talke was began, once or twise he sent out to them of his counsaillers, to make an attonement, but they would not agree, because they believed that Leulfus was slaine by the Byshops consent, for the night after the slaughter of Leulfus, not onely Leofwine did reuelue Gilbert and his complices into his house familiarly, but also the Byshoppe did the like. Whereupon, all those that were found out of the Byshops place they slew, verie fewe excepted, that gate a wale by night, which thing perceived by the Byshoppe, he to satisfie the furie of his enemies, commanded his cousin Gilbert (whose life was sought) to depart out of the Church, whome as hee went, the men of armes followed with speare and sword, till they had slaine him and all their enemies, sparing onely two Englishmen that were servants to the Byshop, they also slew Leofwine the Deane of Durham, and other of the Prioules, as they coulde finde them out of the Church. When the Byshop perceived that by no meanes thei fury might be pacified, except the head of the author were cut off, he besought Leofwine to go forth, which when hee coulde not get him to doe, hee went himselfe to the Church doores, and besought them to graunt him his life, which when they refused to doe, hee couering his head with the skirt of his garment, went forth, and straightwaies with the enemies swades hee was dispatched out of his life: after this they bade Leofwine come forth, but hee woulde not, whereupon they set the Church walles and rouffe on fier, which hee continued a while, but when he felt the bitter flames about him, and began to smart, he leapt out, and being cut in peeces, suffered for his wickednes.

This detestable slaughter of the Byshop was committed on the 14. daie of May, when he had fate Byshop nine yeeres, and two monethes, the Sparrow failed to the place, toke the bodie of their Byshop into their sholpe, which which body they could hardly know for the number of woundes, being also spoiled of his garments, the body they carry to their Monasterie, which being translated thence to Durham, was there buried, but with no such solemnitie as other Byshops had bene buried, for his murderers roused by and downe all the Citie, and assaulted the Castell, but could not preuaile; whereupon at length they dispersed themselves here and there, and were consumed with many calamities, wandring like runnagates, and banished people, for when king William had knowledge of these things, he sent his brother Odo Byshop of Bayon, and manie Nobles of his realme with a great army, to destroy Northumberland, who whilste they fought to reuenge the death of the Byshoppe, brought all that land to desolation, many of the sely people that remained at home, they either committed to be beheaded, or other waies to be dismembred, many being vngodly charged, were forced to ransom themselves with money.

The said Odo toke certaine ornaments of the Church, among the which there was a Byshops staffe, maruillous for the matter and woymanship, for it was made of Sapphyre stone, who hauing set a garrison in the Castell returned.

This yeere was finished the booke named Domes day, or Domus Dei, being a perfect survey of the whole land, which booke remaineth in the kings Exchequer at Westminster, of the which booke making thereof, Ingulphus writeth thus.

King William for the taxing of his whole lande, toke this order in all England, there was not an hie of land, but he knewe the valewe thereof, and the possessor also, neither meire nor place there was, but it was valued in the kings role, the rents and profits, the possession and the possessor, were made manifest and knowne unto the king, according to the fidelitie of taxors, which being chosen out of euery Countrey, taxed or seised their owne Territories, or made their owne rent role. These men well willers and friends to our Monasterie, weighd not our Monasterie to the full paye, nor to the true measure thereof, preuenting and prouiding upon zealous affection towards vs, for the kinges taxations, and other burdens that after might befall.

This role is called the role of Winton, and of the Englishmen for the generalitie thereof, containing wholie all the tenements of the whole land, it is named Domesdaie. Such a role and very like, did king Aelfred once set forth, in which he taxed all the land of Englande by Shires, Hundreds, and Tithings.

And this role, as is before noted, was called the role of Winton, because it was laide in Winchester to be kept. Which Citie was the head of the West Saxons kingdome, committing vnto him by inheritance: At this time among all the particular kingdomes of England most noble and famous. In this role of Winchester, so most of all called, because it was made after the example of the other, were taxed and set downe, the Earledomes, Hundreds, Tithings, Woods, Parks, and all ffarmes, in euery territozy, or precinct, howe manie carncates of lande, howe manie ploughlandes, and acres, what pastures and fennes, or marshes, what tenements and tenants were contained, &c. men men said that the Dære in the new Forrest, by reason of a cloode of mist of infected airc, got a disease of goyng, and so spoiled him. This new Forrest is a place whither king William the father of Richard, had laid waile, overthrowing towines, villages, and Churches, by the space of 30. miles and more, bringing the same into a chafe for deer, an horrible thing it was to see, that there before men did inhabit and dwell, and where God was honored: now Dære, Goates, and such other kind of wild beasts do wantonly conserue about, & not so much as made to the use of men. Therefore it is declared for certaine, that in the same Forrest, William his son, and his nephew Richard the son of Robert Duke of Normandy, did by the severe iudgement of God find their death, Wil. with an arrow that was shot in his breast, and Richard had his neck broken, or as some say, as he rode through the wood on horse backe, he was hanged vp by the chaps vpon the bough of a tre.

King William in his life time shewed great fauour vnto his mother, who before his father was dead, had married a certain man of mean substance called Herlewinus of Canterulle, by him king William had brethren, one named Robert, whome he made Carle of Boyton, a grosse and dull witted man: The other brother was called Odo, who when he was Duke, he promoted to the Bp. shope of Bayon, and when he was king, he made him Carle of Kent, he being a man of subtil wit, was vnder the king Willcelod of al England, after the death of William firz Osborne, in somuch that hee being wonderfull craftie and subtil in heaping vp of treasure, and one of a maruellous obdinate, being absent from the citizens of Rome, had almost bought the papacy by stuffing the bagges of straungers with letters and money. And (by reason of the opinion, that all men had of him, that he should go to Rome to bee Pope) all matters of controuersie throughout the whole Realme were brought vnto him, which matter the king toke verie euill, and laid him in prison as shall be shewed in places conuenient, saying that he would not appehnd the Bp. shope of Bayon, but that he would appehnd the Carle of Kent, his seruantes being constrained therunto with threats, bewrayed such plenty of golde, that the heape of yellow mettall did excede the opinions of all men: moreover, manie bagges full of grounden gold were dylawne out of Miners, which hee had buried in certaine places.

William Bp. shope of Durham, by licence of the king and the Nobles of the Realme, went to Rome and obtained of Pope Gregorie the seventh, to bring the Monks from Barrow, and Wermouth into the Cathedall Church of Durham; he gaue to them lands, Churches, ornaments &c. all which king William confirmed by his Charter.

A wicked sedition arose betwene the Monks, and Thurstane the Abbot of Claffenburie, which Thurstane king William had taken forth of the Monasterie of Cane in Normandie, and (being a man furnished with no wisdome) made him Abbot of Claffenburie. This man among other his felowes, despising the song called Gregories song, began to counsel the Monks to learne the song of one William of Festamps, and to sing it in the Church, which to doe when they refused, as they that had bene euer bled not onelle in this, but in other service of the Church to follow the maner of the Romane Church, suddenly on a day with a company of armed men, (the Monkies not aware thereof) brake into the chapter house, and the Monkies flying through excessive feare into the Church, even to the high Altar, the men of warre pursuing with their darts and arrowes, shot, not sparing to hit the Crosses, Images and thynnes, and ran one Monke through y<sup>e</sup> body with a speare, as he embraced the altar, and so slew him, an other was slaine with an arrow, lying as it were hidden under the altar, the other constrained of necessity, defended themselves with formes and candlesticks of the Church, so that although they were sore wounded, they dawe all the men of armes behinde the quere, and so it fell out, that two being slaine, 14. were hurt of the Monkies, and some of the men of armes, were hurt also, this matter coming to iudgment, because it was found that the Abbot was in all the blame, the king removed him, and set him in his house againe in Normandy, manie of the Monkies were bestowed in Bishops houses, but after the Conquerours decesse, the Abbot got his Abbey againe, at his sonne William Rufus hands, buying it with 500. pound of silver, and waarding through the possessions of the Church, certaine pères together from the Monasterie, ended his life miserably as he well deserved.

Of Odo Bp.
shop of Bayon.

About this time many tempests raging in this world, certain Southsaiers of Rome declared, who should succede unto Hildebrand in the Popedom, they affirmed after the decesse of Gregorie, Odo to bee Pope of Rome. Odo Bishop of Bayon, hearing this, who (with his brother) governed the Normanes and Englishmen, little esteeming the power and riches of the West kingdome, unless by right of the Popedom, he might largely rule all the inhabitants of the earth, he sendeth to Rome, he buyeth a pallace, he seeketh out the Senators, whome with great giftes given he fopneth with him in amitie, and his pallace he adorne with much cost, and superfluous trimmings, he sendeth for Hugh earle of Chester, and a great company of the chiefe knights, and hartely prayeth them to goe with him into Italy: and the prodigall man, unto his prayers addeth great promisses. They, for that the Normanes were light, and desirous to see foraine Countries, straightwaies assented unto the presumptuous Bishopp, to whome the Princeborne of Albion, and Normandie fastidied not, and consented also to forsake their huge Landes, which they possessed in the West Climate, and promised by their faith to accompany the foresaide Bishopp to the River of Doon. Proud king William, when he heard of such great preparation, allowed not thereof, but thought it to be hurtfull to his kingdome, and many others, wherefore he hastily sayled into England, and suddenly unloked for: in the Isle of Wight met with Odo the Bishopp, now desirous with great pompe to saile into Normandie, and there the chiefe of his Realme being gathered together in the kings hall, the king spake in this sort.

Vita W. Con.

King William returned from Normandy to the Isle of Wight.

His Oration to his nobles,

Excellent Pères, hearken my wordes diligently, and I beseech you give unto mee your wholesome counsaile. Before I sailed over the Sea into Normandie I commended the government of England to my brother the Bishop of Bayon.

In Normandie manie have risen up against me, and, as I may say, inward friends, and foraine foes have invaded mee, Robert my sonne, and certaine younglings, whome I have brought up, and to whome I have given armes, rebelling, and my false clientes, and bordering enemies cleaned unto them, but they profited nothing, God whose servant I am, defending me: neither yet obtained they any thing of mine, but yron in their wounds.

They of Angew gathered together against me, whom with feare of preparation to warres I pacified, with these businesses I have bene provoked beyond the Sea, and there I have staid long, and laboriously have given all my endeavour to publike commodities. In the meane time my brother hath greatly oppressed England, and hath spoiled the Churches of their lands, and rents, hath made them naked of the ornaments given by our predecessours, and hath seduced my knights, who ought to defend England against the Danes, Irishmen, and other enemies our trouble some unto me, and condemning me purposed to traine them out beyond the Alpes into foraine kingdomes, an over great dolour grieveth my heart, especiallie for the Churches of God which he hath afflicted.

Christian kings that have reigned before mee, have loved the Church of God, with honour: and gifts of manie kindes, they have enriched it, therfore now (as we beleave) they rest rejoycing with a happy retribution in a pleasant seate. Adelbert, and Edward, Saint Oswald, Althulph, Aelfred, Edward the elder, and Edgar, and my cousin and most deare Lord Edward have given riches unto the holy Church the spouse of God, and my brother to whom I have committed the government of the whole kingdome, violently plucketh away their gods, cruelly oppresseth the poore, with a vaine hope, stealthly awate my knights from me, and hath exasperated the whole Realme, by oppressing it with uniusk taxations. Consider you worthily what is to bee done hereupon, and I beseech you insinuate it unto me.

And when all they fearing to great a personage, doubted to pronounce sentence against him, the valliant king saide, hurtfull rashnesse is alwaies to bee repressed, oftentimes heretofore hee strave against his father, and then likewise stomacked for certaine follies, presently departed awate to the king of France, &c. now the king committed his said brother Odo to prison, where he remained about the space of foure yeres after, to wit, to the death of king William.

Odo Bishopp of Bayon put in prison.

King William taketh of every hide of land throughout England 6. shillings, and then sayled over into the parts beyond the Seas.

backe part of his armie, part he kept with him all winter, and in the feast of the Nativite he helde his Court at Gloucester, where unto thre of his Chaplaines bee came thre Bpshoppes, to Maurice the Bpshoppes of London, to William that of Hereforde, and to Robert the Bpshoppes of Chester.

King William caused all England to bee described, to understand what land euerie of his Barons did possesse, how manie knights fees, how many plough landes, howe manie villans, how many beastes, or cattell, yea how much rentie money euerie man possessed within his kingdome, from the greatest to the least, and howe much rent euerie mans possession might yeelde, thus the land was replete with manie mischiefes, that came of this doing.

In the Whitsun weeke king William honoured his sonne Henry at Westminster, where he then held his Court, with the order of knighthood, which order of knighthood, how the same was ministered I read not, but as Iuxta Ingulphus. In time of the Barons before the conquest of the Normans, the English mens custome was, that he that should be consecrated to lawfull warfare, should the evening going before the date of his consecration, to some Bpshoppes, Abbot, Bpshope, or Priest, contrite and compunct, make confession of his finnes, and absolved, should continue all night in the Church, and give him selfe to prayers, deuotions, and affliations: And on the morrowe bearing the devline service, should haue a sword put about his necke, and communicating at the same service the holie mysteries of Christ, should thenceforth continue a lawfull knight, which custome of consecrating a knight the Normans despised.

Shortly after king William commanded that Archbishops, Bpshops, Abbots, Carles, Barons, Viscounts, with their power of men of armes should meete him on the first daie of September, at Salisbury, whither when they were come, hee caused the men of armes to sweare to him fealtie against all men.

The same yere Clito Edgar with licence obtained of the king passed the sea with 200. men of armes, and went into Apulia, whose sister Christine entred into the Monasterie of Rumsey and was made a Nunne.

When the Normans had accomplished the will and pleasure of their Lord upon the Englishmen, & that there was scantily any noble man left of the English nation to beare any rule over them, but was come to passe it was a reproch to be called an Englishman: There sprang up twelke tolls, a custome, & the more people spake of equitie, the more wrong was done. Those that were appointed Justices were the authors of all vnrightheousnesse, who so ever did take a Bribe, or a Coate had his eyes put out, and no man durst speake against it, for the cruel king loved wilde beastes, as though he had bene father of them, and by twelke counsell hee brought to passe, that where men were wont to be habite in towne and villages, and where God was wont to be honoured, that all kinde of wilde beastes did sport themselves, so that men saie for certain, that for the space of more then xxx. miles, god profitable coyn ground was turned into a chase for wilde beastes: this was called the new Forest in Hampshire, wherein be 9. walks, 9. keepers, 2. rangers, a bow bearer, and the Earle of Armeale is lord Warden by inheritance. In building of Castles this king excelled all his predecessours. Normandy came to him by inheritance, & Normania he got by force of armes, he made Armoica or Britain obedient unto him, in England he reigned alone. Scotland and Wales he subdued, he laied peace so well, that a yong twelke might without daunger carrie a burden of golde through all places of England safe.

King William having giuen unto Remigius a Bpshope of Hereford, the Bpshoppes of Dorchester, he nowe misliking that the Bpshoppes seat shod in a small Citie, whereas in the same diocesse was the citie of Lincoln, which seemed to be more mete for his seate, he bought lordshippes in the top of the hill, and builded there a Church, and notwithstanding that the Archbishop of Poike affirmed that place and Citie to bee part of his Diocesse, Remigius not regarding his wordes proceeded and finished the work which he had begun, and when he had finished the same, he adorned it with Clarkes that were appoynted both in learning and manners: he was but small of stature, but stout of hart, brown of barke of colour, but cleare and excellent in wordes: hee was once accused of treason to the king, but a certain servant of his, by iudgment of the fiery sword, purged him, and returned him to the kings favour.

There was a great water flood through abundance of raine, so that bluer hills being softened fell, and overwhelmed manie villages. About the same time king Wil. had builded the Abbey of Battail in Souther, on the place where he overcame Harold, in which place he set Bpshopes, and dedicated the Church to the holie Trinitie, and to Saint Martin. He also founded Selby Abbey in Yorkeshire, and the Priorie of Saint Nicholas at Worcester, and the Abbey of Saint Stephen in the Citie of Canne in Normandy, where he was buried, hee gave priuiledges to Saint Martins le Grand in London (which Church was founded before the conquest, by Ingelricus and Edwardus his Brother, cousins to king Edward the Confessor) hee also gave to that Colledge all the lande and more, without the Posterne called Creeples gate of London, on either part of the Posterne, that is to saie, from the North corner of the Wall, as the sluers of the wellies there remanuing depart the same spoye from the wall, to the running water which entrench the Citie (to wit, through the wall, and so through the Citie, though under ground, to the sluier of Hamis, and is called Walbrooke, of coming through and from the wall.) The description of king Williams seale, with the names of the testis, (among the which is Ric. Gilbert pince, Wilk. Weller pince, Arfatus the kings Chancellor, &c.) 3. omitted for brevity.

This yere was a great death of cattell, and a fore disemperature of the aier, whereupon a great mortalitie of men happened, so that manie dyed first of the fevers, and after of famine.

In the meane time a deuouring fire spread abroad over almost all the principall Cities of England, the Church of Saint Pauls in London was burnt, with the more part of the Citie, which fire beganne at the entrie of the Colledge

Saint Paul, to wit, the South and the North sides, for king Edward the second graunted that the Churchyard should be inclosed with a wall, for the murders, and robberies that were committed there. And when the Citizens of London claimed the East part of the Churchyard to be the place of their assembly to the folkemote, and that the great steeple at that time there situate, was to that use, that all the inhabitants of the City might heare. They claimed also the West side, that they might assemble themselves together with the Lorde of Wapnards Castle, for viewe of their Armour in defence of the Citie. This matter was in the Towre of London referred to Heruins de Stanton and his fellowe Justices Itenerantes, but I finde not the iudgement of that controuersie, wherefore it is like the Church prevailed, for the wall euen to this time continueth, although now on both sides hidden with dwelling houses.

bones found
of great length.

This pere in a prouince of Wales called Rose, was found the Sepulchre of Wavyn or Gawen, upon the sea shore, hee was sisters sonne to Arthur the great king of the Brytains, being as is affirmed by many of the length of xiiii.
foote, he reigned in the partes of Brytaine, with to this day (saied Windover) is called Walwyth, a most famous man in war, and in all manner of ciuilitie, as in the actes of the Brytains is declared.

The Bishop Sigand of Gloucester, Scotland Abbot of S. Augustines at Canterburie, Alfus Abbot of Bath, and Thurstan Abbot of Divesor, deceased.

This pere king William remaining in Normandy, being at variance with Philip king of France, continued there a long while, whose patience the saide
Philip did (as men said) abuse, with these or like words.

The king of England lieth at Roane, and keepeth his chamber as women doe when they be deliuered of childre, and nourisheth his fatte belly, with which saith king William being offended, saide, when after my childbirth I goe to Church,

Church, I will offer a thousand candles to him, swearing by Gods resurrection and his brightnes, &c.

About the latter end of August, king William in a great displeasure entered France, where hee wasted and spoiled all as he passed.

Last of all hee stered the city of Speure, & burnt it with our Lady Church, and two Anchors that were inclosed there, who perswaded themselves they ought not to forsake their house and came in such extremitie, whereat the king rejoycing, charged his men to feed the fire, and came himselfe so nere, that with the beate of his harness he got a disease, and to the increase of his sickness, (it was said) his horse leaping over a ditch, did burst the inner part of his bellie, with the paine whereof he was soe afflicted, and returned to Roane, where shortly after he ended his life.

This wise noble man feeling himselfe grievouslie diseased, deferred not to do good unto himselfe in time to come, & also to many others, wherefore he commanded all his treasure to be distributed vnto Churches, poore folkes, and ministers of God, and politicklie assigned howe much hee would give vnto euery one, and commanded the same to be written out by notaries before him.

Amongst the which giftes I finde that hee gaue to the Church of Saint Stephen in Cane, and the spouns there, two manors in Dorsetshire with their appendantes, one Manor in Devonshire, one other in Essex, manie hides of land in Warkeshire, some in Norfolk, and a mansion house in Woodstrate of London, with manie annotations of Churches, but speciallie to be noted, he gaue his Crowne and ornaments to the same belonging, to the saide Church, which hee before had founded, for the redeming of the which Crowne and kingly ornaments, king Henry the first, sonne to the saide Conquerour, gaue to the saide Church of Saint Stephen, the manor of Wyldeton in Dorsetshire.
King William also sent great summes vnto the Cleargie of Speure, that thereby the Churches which hee had burned, might be repaired,

Of keeping faith and iustice, of holding the lawes of God, and peace, of obseruing the priuiledges of the Churches and Statutes of the fathers, hee admonished all those that were present, and his sayings worthy to be remembered, mixed sometime with teares; hee eloquentlie bitered in this sort.

Being laden with many and grievous sinnes (O Christ) I tremble, and being ready to be taken by and by vnto the terrible examination of God, I am ignorant what I should do, for I haue bene brought by in the feates of armes, euen from my childhod, I am greatlie polluted with effusion of much blood.
I can by no meanes number the evils which I haue done, this 64. yeres, ed without faile to render an account to the iust iudge.

done almost 56. piers, in great danger of enemies. Those whom I have governed, have often laide snares for mee, and wickedly have brought unto me damages and great injuries.

Turcell my nourisher, and Osborne Herfastus sonne, the Wapster or Selver of Normandy, and Earle Gilbert the father of the Countrey with many other necessary for the common wealthe, they have fraudulently slaine, with the things therefore I have tried the faith of my Countrey: oftentimes in the night for feare of my kinsfolke, I have bene secretly caried by my uncle Gualter out of the principall chamber, and brought unto little houses and lurking corners of pover men, lest by those traytors that sought my death I should be found: The Normans if by a good and hard government they bee ruled, they are most valiant, and in doubtfull thinges invincible, they excell all men, and for their strength, they contend to overcome all their enemies. Wherefore they feare in pieces and consume one another, for they couer rebellions, they desire rebellions, & are ready to al mischief, let them therefore be constrained with a strong censure of government, and with the yoke of discipline compelled to walke by the path of iustice, for if at their pleasure, without a poke they be permitted to go, like a wilde untamed Asse, they and their prince shall be overwhelmed with penurie and reprochfull confusion. And this I have lately learned by many trials, my neighbours and kinsmen that ought by all means to defend me against all mayfall men, with often conspiring have risen by against me.

Guy Harold the duke of Burgundy his son by my aunt Adaliza rendred me euill for good, for I receiued him courteously comming out of a strange countrey, and honoured him as a brother, and gaue unto him Aernoun and Bironand, not a little part of Normandy, he hath derogated much from me both in his wordes and aces, detesting and declaring me to bee a bassard, to degenerate and to be unworthy the government, and as an enemy hath defamed mee, what neede I say more, he hath falsified his faith unto mee, he hath rebelled against me, and my Beeres, Ranulph of Bayon, and Haimo Teothed, and Nigel of Constantine, and many other more he hath withprowen from me, and hath constrained them by his wicked persuasions to be perjured persons with him, vntill of late therefore of his homage and fidelitie which he ought unto me, he went about to take all Normandy from me.

Thus therefore being yet without a beard I was constrained to take by armes against him, and in the plaine at Malebune to fight against my kinsman and owne seruant.

When God assisting me, betwene Cane and Argiers I overcame my enemies, who by Gods appointment being overthrowen, I freely possessed my fathers right.

That done I besieged a cast of Bayon, and therein included Guy fore wounded, and fled from the battell, nor I suffered him to depart with them until I had compelled him as a common enemy out of Normandy, and obtained all his strong holds. Not long after this an other grievous aduersitie came unto me, for my uncles Malgerius Archbishoppe of Roane, and William his brother, to whom

readie to all

whome I had freely given Arches and the Carleborne of Calegi, condemned me as a bassard, and called Henry the king, and Engelram Earle of Pontine against me. Presently after I had heard of such rumors in Constance I entred into the Seyne, many rumors dissuading me, and sent before me to Arches a fewe souldiers which were more seruenter to fight, and I followed after not with a great army, & besieged the strong fort, but before I could come unto the Countreies betwene the two Rivers, Sevan and Serene, my souldiers had pericuted Earle Engelram passing to enter the Castle, and had slaine him, manfully fighting, (for he was a most shapely souldier) and had put to flight all his companies.

These of the Castle I besieged with an harde besieging, and forced the perjured Earle to exile, neither yet permitted I him in all his life to returne to that which hee had lost. And also the forward poylate that was neither deuout to God, nor trustie unto mee, I deposed by decree of the Pope from his Bishoppes seate, and placed for him Maurice the venerable Monk, whome God gaue unto me from the city of Florence in Italie. Henry delighted with his kingly power, & hot with warlike boldnesse, and greatly piched forwards with the derogations of mine enemies oftentimes hath endeuoured to treade me under as one vnarmed, and by many meanes to feare me, and to appoint unto me vnlawfull faces. Often with a huge armie he hath entred my land, but hee neuer relouped of the praise of my spoiles, hee often entred my lands, but hee neuer merrie, nor without shame returned home to his owne, many strong men he brought hither with him, whome for that by my sword and my souldiers (two words the grieve,) they were slaine, hee neuer caried back againe. Heretofore king Henry ouermuch inflamed against mee, deuised his huge host into two partes of France, that he might oppresse our landes with a double burking in with violence, for hee himselfe brought an armie of eight hundred footmen into Chyolene Diocesse, that they might destroy all euens unto the River of Some, and the other companie hee committed to Odo his brother, and to Raynold of Clarimount, and to two Constables Raffe of Montdesice, and Widon of Pontine, that by the shallow places, they shoulde come enter into Normandy, and invade Drani Calcegi, and the whole Towne of Roane, and shoulde utterly destroy with sword, fire, and robbing, euery to the Sea.

This therefore I understanding, on the other side, I went so; wardes, not fleghtly, against the kinges tentes, and reposed my selfe and my souldiers by the shore of Some, and wheresoeuer hee endeuoured to destroy my lande with weapons and sword, I prepared a reproch, but Robert Earle of Ankeuse, and Roger Mortimer, with other most tried souldiers I sent against Odo, and his legions, who when almost at Calcas, which is called the dead Sea, they met with the Frenchmen, the companies on both partes being, provided, a terrible battell was fought, and on both partes great effusion of blood, for euery where there were most valiant fighters, and euery unto death ignorant to die, here were the Frenchmen for desire of gaining, there strike the Normans with a seruant hope of escaping, and defending them-

retues and their dwelling houses, at the last God helpeth, the Normans vanquished, and the French men scode away. And this battaile they had beyond Some in Winter, before Lent, the eight yers after the battaile at Valdesdorne.

Then Wido Earle of Pontine was taken, and Odo with Raynold and others that were lustie in quicknesse of soote were byuen away. Raulphe also the Earle had likewile bene taken unless Roger the Prince of my warre had supported him, for lately he had done homage unto him.

Therefore in such necessitie he requited him with a faire competent service, when he protected him thre daies in his Castle, and after permitted him to go safe home to his owne, for this offence I cast Roger out of Normandie, but a little after, being reconciled unto him, I restored him the rest of his honours, yet the Castle of Mortimere, wherein he kept mine enemy, by right, as I suppose, I toke from him, but I gave it to William de Warren his kinseman and lawfull ballall.

Wido Earle of Bayon I held in prison so long as it pleased me, and after two yeres I received againe homage of him, with such honour, that from thenceforth hee should alwaies be faithfull unto mee, and should everie yere give unto me Shouldiers service, wherefore I commanded with an hundred Shouldours.

This done I gave him great rewardes, and so honoured, sent him away in peace. After this fight ended, by and by as I certainly had tried the rumours, I sent by Raulph of Oren those things that had chanced on the farther side of Some unto the king of France, which thing hee hearing, straightwaies rose up, and with his hoile speedely fledde, and neuer after did lie one night in my land, and thus even from my childehood with innumerable pressaures on everie side I have bene letted, but by the grace of God, I have bene honourably delivered from them all.

Therefore I was made hateful to all my neighbors, but God assisting me in whom alwaies I put my trust, I was overcome of none.

This oftentimes have the Byptaines, and them of Angewo, and Cenomania grievously tried.

Godfrey Martell Earle of Anioy, and Conan Prince of the Byptaines, and Robert Frise Prince of Puterell, have laide waite to entrap me by many subtil inventions, but God keeping mee, they were never satisfied of their desire.

A Royall Diademe that never any of my predecessors did beare, I have gotten, which only heavenly grace, not right of inheritance hath given to me. What labours, and perillous conflicts I have sustained beyond the Seas against those of Excester, Chester, and the Northumbers, the Scottes, the Gaules, Postwegians, and Danes, and against other adversaries that endeavored to spoile me of the Realme of England it were hard to declare, in all which the lot of victorie hath come unto mee: And although manly greedynesse upon such triumphes relopeth, yet inwardly a careful feare picheth and byteth mee, when I consider that in all those, cruel rashnesse hath reigned.

king William held not England by right of inheritance.

Wherefore I humbly beseech you, O Prelates, and Ministers of Christ, that you will commend me to the almighty God, with your praies, that hee will forgive me my sins, wherewith I am greatly pressed, and by his unspcakable mercy, will make me safe amongst his.

My treasures I commit to be given to the poore and to Churches, that those things that have bene heaped up by wicked doers, may be disposed to holy uses of the Saints, for you do remember howe sweetely I have loved you, and how strongly against all emulations defended you.

The Church of God, that is do wit, our mother, I never violated, but in every place where reason required did willingly honour, I have not sold Ecclesiasticall dignities, simonie alwaies detesting I have reieted in election of Pastors, I ever searched out the merite of life, and his learning of wisdom, and so nere as I could committed the government of the Church to the most worthy.

And this may be faithfully proved in Lanfranke Archbishoppe of Cantuarie, this in Anselme Abbot of Becco, this in Gerebert of Pontanel, and in Durand Trearne, and in manie other Doctors of my kingdome, whose famous praises (as I suppose) sounding in the bittermost corners of the earth may be tried.

Such fellows I chose to talke with, in the fellowship of these I found trust and wisdom, and therefore relopeng I wished ever to enjoy their counsells. Nine Abbeies of Monkes, and one of Nunnes, which by my fathers were founded in Normandy, I helping by the assistance of God have increased, and with augmentations of many things, which I have given them they are gloriously magnified.

Moreover, in the time of my government, severant Monasteries of Monkes, and fire of holy Nunnes are builded, where great service unto God, and much almes to the poore is daily bestowed for the lone of the chiefe king. With such camps Normandy is fenced, and in these fortres let the poyntings come to fight against the devill, and vices of the flesh. Of these truly either I by Gods inspiration have bene builder and founder, or els a fervent helper, and well willing interder.

All things also which my Noble men in lands or rentes, have given to God and his Saintes for their spirituall healt in Normandie and England I have courteously granted, and the Charters of the giftes, I have frely confirmed with princely authoritie against all emulations and troubles.

These studies I have followed from my first yeres, these I have used my helmes to be kept in all times. In this, my childe, follow me continually, that here and for ever before God and men, you may be honoured.

This chieflly, O you (my deare bowels) I warne you that you continually cleane unto the companie of god and wise men, and be obedient to the government in all things if you will long gloriously prosper. It is the doctrine of godly wisdom, to discern god from evill, to kepe justice at all times, and with all force to thune wickednesse, to save and helpe the like and poore, to suppress and vanquish the proud and unwill, and to bidde them from troubling

bling of the simple, to frequent devoutly the holy Church, and about all things to love the worshipping of the divinity, and to be obedient without any weariness day or night, in adversity and prosperitie unto the law of God.

The Dukedome of Normandie before I fought against Harold in the vale of Senlac, I granted unto my sonne Robert, for that he is my first begotten, and hath now receiued homage almost of all the Barons of this countrey: the honoꝝ granted cannot be taken away againe, but without doubt I know that truly it will be a miserable region that shall be subiect to his dominion or government: for he is a proud and wilful knave, and to be long punished with cruell fortune.

I doe constitute none heire of the realme of England, but commend it unto the everlasting creator; whose I am, and in whose hands be all things, for I possessed not such an honoꝝ by right of inheritance, but by the instinct of God, and with much effusion of mans blood I took it, and the perjured Harold being false, or his fauourers taken away, I made it subiect to my dominion.

The naturall sonnes of the Realme I hate more then right required, the Noble men and bulgare sort I cruelly vexed, manie husbandes I disherited, innumerable, especiallie in the Towne of Poike, with hunger and sword, I brought to death, for the which the Countrey men beyonde Humber take in against mee the armie of the King of Sweueland, and slew Robert of Cumin, with a thousand squidous within Puresme, and other of my Nobles and most approued young Schoollers in diuers places. Wherefore moued with an immoderate rage, like a wood lyon, I hastied vnto the Northerne English men, their houses, their come, and all their possession and household stuffe I commaunded to be burned, and great droues of beastes, and flockes of sheepe enerie where to be killed: therefore I punished with the sword of such horrible hunger the multitude of both sex, and so manie thousandes both of young and olde of the most beautifull Countrey (Whose woorth the griefe) I cruelly killed. The officers therefore of this Realme, that with so manie sinnes I haue obtained, I dare not giue to anie but to God, lest after my death, they be made yet worse by my occasion. William my sonne, who alwaies from his first yeres hath sticked vnto me, and according to his power hath willingly obied me in all things, I wish in the Spirit of God long to liue in health, and if it be Gods will, happily to flourish in the throne of the Kingdome. These and manie such like wordes William spake, and an amazednelle inuaded the standers by, that possibikely measured things to come.

After that Henry the younger sonne heard nothing to be giuen vnto him of the kingly treasure, lamenting with teares, he saide vnto the king: And what (father) doe you giue vnto me? To whome the king saide, Five thousand poundes of silver out of my treasure I giue vnto thee. To this Henrie saide, What shall I doe with that treasure, if I shall not haue a dwelling place of habitation: Whereunto his father answered, Be of a patient minde my sonne, and comfort thy selfe in God, quietlie suffer that thy elder brother goe before thee. Robert shall haue Normandie, and William England, thou in thy time shalt haue all the honour that I haue gotten, and shalt exell thy brethren in riches and power. These wordes thus spoken, the king fearing lest in such a wide Realme sodaine trouble should arise, wrote a Letter vnto Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie, and being signed with his owne seale, gaue it vnto William Rufus his sonne, commanding him presently to saile ouer the Sea into England, and that done, he kissed and blessed him, and speedilie directed him to take the Crowne, who in short time came to the porte called Whitstane, and there he heard his father to be dead. Henry also hastied diligently to receiue the nominated summe of money, and to call necessary fellows, in whom he might trust.

In the meane time, the Physicians, and the kings seruantes that kept the languishing Prince and the Nobles that came to visite him, beganne to speake vnto him for the prisoners that hee kept in halde, and humble besought him to haue compassion vpon them, and to release them. To whome hee saide, Morcare the noble English Carle I haue long kept in prison, and that traitorlie, but it was for feare, lest by him, if he were at libertie, the Realme of England should be troubled. Roger also of Wyke, for that he vertis subduerely raged against me, and prouoked Ralph of Guaderbis others sonne and manie others against me, I haue straitly kept in prison, and knowe, that in my life he should not come forth. So many I cast in prison deserting it, though their owne peruersitie, and sundrie others mo, for feare of sedition to come; for this is the rule of rightconnesse, as the diuine Law by apostles giuen vnto the gouernours of the world requireth, that the wicked be oppressed, lest they destroy the innocent. But now being at the point of death, as I desire to be forgiven, and absolved by Gods mercie from my sinnes, so I presently command all prison doores to be opened, and all prisoners except my brother, the Bishop of Bapon, to be released, and for the loue of God to be frelie dismissed, that hee may haue mercie on me. Notwithstanding, I haue decreed that they depart out of prison with this condition, that first for more security they giue their othe to the officers of the common wealth, that they will by all meanes keepe peace in England and Normandie, and according to their power manfully resist all aduersaries of the same.

And when Robert Carle of Poitou heard his brother to be commaunded by the kings sentence to perpetuall prison, he greatly sorrowed; for Herkenwinus of Canteruill take vnto hisse Herlewine duke Roberts concubine, of whom he begate two sonnes, Odo and Robert. And Duke William, who after wards was king, enriched his father in law with manie great honours in Normandie and England, and set vp with great possessions his sonnes, Ranulph whom he had gotten of another wife, and Odo and Robert, his brothers by the mother: for after that hee had for small offences expelled out of Normandie William surnamed Werclenge Carle of Poitou, sonne vnto Carle Magens, hee gaue the Carledome of Poitou vnto his brother Robert Herkenwinus sonne.

Hugh also Bishoppe of Bapon sonne of Rike Chadele; being dead, he granted the foresaid Prelates dignity to his brother Odo, whom afterwards in England he made ruler of the Carledome of Kent. To conclude him, for his excelluence (as before is plainly related) king William took in the

He of all right, and kept foure yeres in prison, neyther yet at his death for his insolencie, woulde release him. Wherefore the foresaide Earle of Morton greatly sorrowed, and for his brother both by himselfe, and by his friends humble intreated, and with prayers wearied the languishing king. And when manie had earnestly desired him for the Bishop of Bayon, the king wearied with the requestes of so many, said: I marvel that ydientlie you thinke not, whom, or what a man he is, for whom you intreate: do you not aske for such a man, as I tellie hath bene in appearance, a contemner of religion, and a crafty stirrer of sedition: haue not I corrected him now the foure yeres? A Byschoppe, who ought to haue bene a most iust gouernour of the Englishmen, and was in dede the worst oppressor of the people, a sponge, and a destroyer of Abbeyes. In deliuering a scottish person, you doe euill, and desire a great hurte vnto your selfe, it is plainly seene, that my brother Odo is light, and ambitious, following the desires of the flesh, and vnnaturall cruelties, and he will neuer bee brought from balowzie, and hurtfull vanities. And this I haue in manie thinges seene, therefore I haue imprisoned, not a Byschoppe, but a tyrant, and without doubt the destruction of manie thousandes. These thinges I speake, not of hate as an enemie, but as a father of the Countrey, I prouide for the Christian people, for if hee behaue himselfe chastlie and modestlie as of very right becommeth a Priest and Minister of God, a greater lole woulde bee at my heart then I can declare. Currie one psonding the amende ment of the Byschop. The king said againe, Will I, will I, your petition must be graunted, for that I being dead, sodainelie a vehement mutation shall bee of all thinges. Against my will I graunt, that my Brother bee deliuered out of prison: but knowe you, that by him death, or a great impediment shall bee brought to mante. From Baldricke also the sonne of Nicholas, for that he sought to leste my seruice, and without my licence went into Spayne, I toke all his landes for a punishment; but now, for the loue of God, I restore them to him againe. A better young Souldiour in armes then hee is, I suppose is not to be founde, but hee is prodigall and light, and wandereth to vniuers places.

Thus King William, although græued with ouermuch paines of the inward partes of his bodie, yet effectually enioied his wit and liuelie speech, and vnto all demanders gaue prompt and profitable counsell of matters of the realme.

To conclude, the Ides of September on a Thursdaie, the Sunne nowe clearly spreading his beames throughout the round world, the king raised vp, beate the sounde of the great bell in the Metropolitane Church, and asking wherefore it sounded, his seruantes answered, Sir, it ringeth now to pyrie of our blessed Laste. When the king with great deuotion lift vp his eyes vnto heauen, and holding abroad his handes, sayde: I commend my selfe to our blessed Lady Mary mother of God, that she by her holie prayers make reconcillie vnto her most deare sonne our Lord Iesus Christ. And the seke words spoken, hee presentlie perished by the ghost, on the ninth day of September, when he had reigned thwentie yeres, eight monethes, and sixtene daies, at the age of thyscore and foure yeres. The chiefe Byschops, and others that were present with them that had kept the king all the night without groaning or calling, now seeing him vpon a sodaine to haue presentlie departed, were greatly astonished, and made almost madde. Furthermore, the richer sort of the straght, taking their horses, departed auaile, and hasted home to defend their owne. The inferior sort, or clientles also, seeing their Master in such sort to haue departed, snatched a waile the armour, vessel, apparell, limmen, and all the kinges household stuffe, leauing the kinges dead bodie almost bare in the stoie of his house, fledde auaile. Beholde, I praise you, that wondrous shew is, euerie one as a fild snatched that hee coude of his stuffe, and presentlie fledde auaile with their praye. Impletie therefore, Iustice falling downe impudentlie commeth forth, and exerciseth rauenous pillage vpon the reuenger of rauenous pillers.

The same of the kinges death shewe abroad, with swift wings, and wyde and broad brought sole or seare to the hartes of the bracers. For the death of king William the berie selfe same daie that hee died at Roane, was vnto his kined in Rome, and Calabria also thewed, as after wards by them in Formandie it was truelie related. Cruelie the euill spirite greatlie reioiced, when hee sawe the seruants that vehemently gaped to snatch and take away all by death of the Iudge to be free. A wondrous pompe! how contemptible art thou, because thou art euer vaine and slippery? Rightly thou maist be compared to a bubble in the water, that in a moment so prouidelic testeth by thy selfe, and so vaine lie thou shalt be brought into nothing. Behold the mightie prince vpon whome aboute a hundred thousande Souldiours willinglie waited, and whome manie Countreies with trembling feared, now is in his owne house by his owne seruantes shamefully spoiled, and from the pyrie, vnto the third house left vpon the bare ground. For the citizens of Roane hearing of the death of the prince were greatlie feared, and almost all like drunken men, were so troubled, as if they had seene a multitude of enemies to be nere vnto the Citie, euerie one departed from the place where hee was, and asked counsaile of his wife, or his companions that hee mette, what were best to doe. Currie one either carped or creepe to carrie their goods from one place to another, and with feare hid them, least they shoulde bee founde. At the last, the religious men, Priests, and sponkes, gathering their powers and senses together, ordained a procession, and decentlie went forwarde vnto Saint Gerasius Church: and according vnto the custome of holy Christians commended the soule of the king to God.

Then William the Archbishop commanded that his bodie shoulde bee carried to Cane, and there in the Church of Saint Stephen the first Martyr, whiche hee had builded shoulde bee buried. But his brethren and kinsmen were nowe gone from him, and all his seruants had wickedly left him as a barbarous person, wherefore there was not one of the kinges knights to be found that woulde take care for the requies of his bodie.

Then Harlino a certaine countrey knight, being pricked with his stonish god nature, manfullie, for the loue of God, and honour of his countrey, toke vpon upon him carefullie to see the kinges funerall solemnized. Therefore the dyers with ointmentes, and carriers of the dead bodie, and a Waggon bee byzed at his owne proper costes, they carried the dead bodie of the king to the haven of Hone, and putting it in a Shippe, by Sea and Oze lande, brought it unto Cane. When the Lord Gullebert Abbot, with the count of Spokes re-verentlie came forth to mete the corpes: to whome, weeping, and praying, cleared the whole multitude of the Clergy and laity: but presentlie perurie for-tuire powred out upon al together a great terrour, for straightwaies a terrible fire burst out of a certaine house, and cast by huge flames, and hurtfullie increased a great part of the towne of Cane. All the Clerkes therefore, with the laie people run to reppelle the fire, only the Spokes ended the office begun, and singing, brought the kinges bodie to the Abbey Church.

To conclude, to bury this great duke and father of the country were gathered together all the bishops and abbots of Normandy, of the which was William Archbishop of Roane, and manie other Bishops and Abbots which were long to name.

All they came together at the solempne funerall of the famous King, and buried him in the Presbyterie betwene the quire and the Altar. The masse ended, when the Coffin was now set in the earth, but the bodie yet remained on the Water: The great Gullebert Bpshope of Eboisen, went by into the pulpet, and eloquentlie pronounced a long Sermon of the magnificence of the dead king that he valliantly had enlarged the boundes of Normandy, and had extended his Countrey more then all his predecessors, peace and justice he kept throughout all his dominions. Thieves and robbers hee manifoldly chastised, with the rule of righteousnesse, and the secular Justice, Spokes, and unarmed people hee strongly fenced with the sword of vertue. The Sermon ended, and for pittie manie weeping and protesting his words to be true, he required the people with this addition, for that no man mortall can live in this life without sinne, in the loue of GOD wee praye you all for the dead sajner, that you will make intercession for him unto Almighty God, and if he have offended anie you, charitable to forgive him.

When Anselme fitz Arthur rising from the companie, with an high voyce bittered such a plaint. This ground whereon you stande, was the dore of my fathers house, the which that man for, whome you doe make intercession, when as yet he was Duke of Normandy, violentlie took from my father, and all right denied, mightilie founded this house. This ground therefore I challenge, and openlie reclaime, and in Gods behalfe I forbid that the bodie of the taker awaie by violence be covered in my earch, neither yet shall he be buried in my inheritance.

After that the Bishops and other noble men heard this, and understood by his stridenes, who testified him to have false true, they sent for the man, and all violence set aside, mollified him with gentle speeches, and made peace with him:
for, for the place of his buriall, they presentlie gave him threescore hillings, and for the rest of the ground which hee claimed, they promised him an equivalent price, and so in a small time, for the salvation of their speciall friends whom they

they plowed, they made an agrément, and (by the consent of Henry his sonne) 100. pound of silver was given. Further, when the bodie should bee put in the tombe or coffin, and was violently pressed, that the same, through the follie of the rough masons, was throte, and straight, his fat belly (not botwelled) cracked, and an intolerable stinke filled the standers about, and the rest of the commonaltie, so that the smooke of frankincense, and other gummes or spices, copiously ascending from the censers prevailed not to exclude the woyle smell: therefore the Dyestres halloed to finish the buriall, and presentlie with feare to get them to their cellas. And thus haue I truly shewed the fall of the Duke, and not a balne Comedie, to make men laugh: which also sufficeth to proue, that the bodie of King William coulde not bee found incorrupte more then foure hundred yeres after the same was buried (as some haue sabuled) neither yet his bodie to be of eight fote length: for then, such as wrote of his life, raigne, and description, would so haue noted, who all agree in one, that he was a man of meane stature, bigge bellied, &c. And last of all, for a full confuting of the false fable, when his restlesse bones, which so hardly had obtained entombing (as ye haue heard) did afterward as unluckely againg lose it in the yere of Christ, 1562. to wit, when Chastillon, conducting the remnant of those that escaped at the battell of Dreux, took the Citie of Cane, certaine savage souldiours, as well English men as others accompanied with foure Capitaines, did beate downe, and bitterly deface the noble tombe and monument of that renowned Conquerour, and bloody king, pulling out all his bones, which some of them spitefullie theye away (when they could not finde the treasure they falsely surmised had bene laide vpper there) and others, to wit the English snatched, euery one to haue some piece of them, not making anie wonder of them, as they would haue done, if the same had recded the length and bignesse of mens bones of latter yeres, where as in deed, there was no such thing noted in them, as I haue bene certainly informed by English men of god credite, who were present etc. witnesses at the spoile of that monument and bones, and brought some part of them into this realme.
Thein maketh mention of this matter in his vniuersall Cosmographie by king of Cane.

Now to speake of the issue of this noble Conquerour, thereof I haue before, partly touched: He had by Matild his wife daughter to Baldwine Earle of Flaunders, Robert surnamed Curthos, as some write, but as safely Cornelius Martin, and Peter Balchazar, in their booke of the Carles of Holland, Courteaise, to wit in English, shote thighe, who after his father was Duke of Normandie. Richard that died young in the new foirell, as he was a hunting in the place where his father had ouerthowne Churches, and Townes to make harbour for beastes, hee was buried at Winchester, on whose monument, hee was written Duke of Bologne. William surnamed Le Rouse, or the Red, who succeeded in the kingdome of England. And Henry, unto whome he gaue 5000. pound of silver out of his treasure (as ye haue heard before). He had daughters, Cicilie Abbess of Cane. Constance married to Alan Earle of Wexstaine. Adela wife to Stephen Earle of Blois. Margaret promised to Harold king of England. And Aclianor betrothed to Alfonso king of Castile.

William the Redde fetched from Winchester the treasure, which all the pères of his fathers raigne had bene gathered, and gaue the golde to the Monasteries, and to the parish Churches, euerie one five shillings of silver, and to euerie borough towne he gaue an hundred pounds to bee dealt to the poore. He also adorned a memoriall of his father with a great heape of silver, and golde, and precious stones.

William Rufus.

William le Roufe or Redde the third sonne of William Conquerour, beganne his raigne the ninth daie of September, in the yere of our Rode 1087. and was crowned at Westminster by Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie, the first daie of Maye. He was of person a square man, red coloured, his haire somewhat yellowe, his forehead square like a windowe, his eies not one like the other, not of anie great stature, though somewhat big belied, he was variable, inconsistent, couetous and cruell, hee burdened his people with unreasonable taxes, pilld the rich, and oppressed the poore, & what he thus got, he prodigally spent in great banquetting and sumptuous apparel, for he would neither eate, drinke, or weare any thing, but that it cost vnnecessarily deere. As for example it was in those daies written (and for vs now to be noted) that in a morning his Chamberlaine bringing him a new paire of hosen, hee demanding what they cost, and the chamberlaine answering three shillings, the king being wroth, said, Away beggar that thou art, are those met hosen for a king to weare, bring me a paire of a marke, or thou shalt see repent it; then his chamberlaine fetcht an other paire that were much worse then the first (for a better paire could not be got) and said they cost a marke, where with William was well pleased. Thus farre haue I noted the saying of William, because it importeth the simplicitie of apparel in those daies used, so farre different from the excess of this present time.

Odo bishop of Bayon, and Earle of Kent, with his brother Robert Earle of Mortaigne and Hereford, and almost all the nobles of England, raised war against king William, and would haue had Robert his eldest brother to be king; but king William by faire words pacifying some of the principal conspirators, besieged the rest in the Castle of Rochester (which Odo Earle of Kent had lately repared) and with much labour lastly overcame them.

Lanfranke archbishop of Canterburie deceased, he reuend the great church of Canterburie, restoring reu. manours to the same. He repaired the walls of that Citie, builded two hospitalls, the one of Saint John, the other at Bartholomew. He restored the church of Rochester from foule secular Clergies, to fitte sponkes. He alwaies attended his Booke, and travelled to copen the corruption of Writers. He was a great benefactor to the Abbey of S. Albons, giuing towardes the reparations thereof 1000. markes, and also got Redboine to be restored thereunto. Spozoner by his testament he gaue to that church a hundred pounds of silver, besides ornaments.

When Lanfranke was dead, king William kepte in his owne handes the Churches and Monasteries of England, after their Pastours were dead, making great spoile, and letting them out to farme to such as would giue most for them.

This king William, so long as Lanfranke liued, seemed to abhorre all kinde of vice, so that hee was accounted a mirrour of kings: But now when Lanfranke was dead, he first shewed himselfe for a while variable, as it were, betwixt vice and vertue, and after, to wit, toward his later daies, al indeuor of vertue waxing colde, the heate of vices increased in him, he set his mind to crading; and one Ranulph a Clarke (or Secretarie) a man of base birth, by his faire tongue and subtill wit, being come to promotion, bid picke for ward his countenance. This Ranulph was a poller of the rich, and an vnder of the poore, a conficatur of other mens inheritances, an inuictuall lawyer, the king would ofte laugh at him, and say, he was a man alone, which could compass his matters so well to please his Master, he being the Author: Churches were set to sale, so lone as the Incumbent was dead: for straightway this Ranulph was sent to take inuention of al that was found, and the same to be confiscate to the kings use, and inquirie was then made for one meete to be set in the place of the Bishop, Abbot, or other deceased, not for their worthinesse, but for their money that would giue most, who at the length theyd haue that promise naked and bare, notwithstanding they pated deere for it. There was no man rich but Collectors of money, no cleark but men of law, not of conscience, no Pilles but flarmons. What crime soeuer any man had committed, so lone as he did appeale for the kings aduantage by accusing other, he was heard, & the rope was taken from their neckes. The courtiers deuoured the substance of the husbandmen their tenants: When the laying out of haire, and the superfluite of garments was found, the tendernes of the body, and wrestling with women, nice going, with dissolute behauiour was in vze, there followed the court a number of effeminate persons, and great companies of ruffians, whereby the same court was not a place of maiesty, but a brodded house of vnlawfull things, such as ought to be abolished.

This was a token of great insolence in the king, that when the Jewes at London came to him, and brought him presents, he encouraged them to fight against the Christians, swearing by Lukes face, that if they did ouercome, he would become one of their secte.

On the eleuenth day of the moneth of August, about thye of the clocke in the afternone, a great earthquake made all England astraide, with a terrible wonder, so that all buildings did (as it were) leape vpward, and immediately set themselves in their olde place: after the which there followed great scarcity of fruite, and late harvest of coyne, so that the same was scarcely inned at S. Andrewes tide.

Robert de Ollie the second, founded the Priorye of Olney besides Driford. King William being desirous to take Normandy from his eldest brother Robert, and to bring it under his dominion, he first bought the castle of St. Valery of one Walter, and the castle of Albemarle of Odo, and put into them men of armes to waite Normandy. Which thing being knowne to duke Robert, he sent his messengers vnto his soweraigne Philip king of France, requiring him to come to aide him in Normandy, who indeede shortly after brought a great power, and besieged one of the forenamed Castles, wherein king William had placed a number of men of armes. Of which siege when king William understode, hee sent over no small portion of money vnto king Philip, requiring him to withdraw his siege, who receiving the money returned home.

of Glamorgan and Morgann wrought out
within hande.

About this time, one Iustus sonne to Gurguntus Carle of Glamorgan, and Morgannoke, refusing to obey Rhelus, sonne to Theodore Prince of South Wales, sent Aeneas sonne to Gedinorus, sometime Lord of Demetia into England, to take muster of souldiers, and there received a great army, under the conduct of one Robert Fitzhamon, and joining with other rabbles out of Wales and Brecknia, met with Rhelus in Blacke hill, and there slew him, and so paying the Englishmen their wages, discharged them. But they taking revenge vnto the godnesse of the losse, and the great variance which was then amongst the Welshmen, as in sometime the Saxons had done, they turned their force of armes against those which had intertaineed them, and sone displaced them wholy of all the champaign, and the best of the Countrey, which Robert Fitzhamon divided amongst twelve knights which he brought with him, reserving the better part to himselfe, who building there certaine Castles, and joining their power together, defended their farmes and Lordships which they had taken and possessed, whose heires peaceably enjoy the same unto this date: but Iustus scarcely referred to himselfe and his, the hill Country. The names of the twelve knights were these:

- 1 William Lowdon.
- 2 Richard Granuile.
- 3 Paganus Turberuile.
- 4 Robert Saintquintine.
- 5 Richard Siward.
- 6 Gilbert Vmfreuill.
- 7 Roger Berkerowle.
- 8 Reynald Sully.
- 9 Peter Soore.
- 10 John Fleming.
- 11 Oliver Saint John.
- 12 William Easterling: now for shortnesse called Stradling.

Thus was the Lordshippe of Glamorgan and Morgannoke won out of the Welshmens handes, which Lordshippe contained in length from Rimbidge on the East side, to Dallenham in the West side seven and twenty miles. The breadth from the haven of Aberthaw on the South side, to the confine of Brecknockeshire, about aporetts Castle, is two and twenty miles.

In this province are next vpon a river of the same name Pontaine, that is to say, Stonebridge, sometimes called Colobridge, Lantwit, Wecny, Dinwid, townes, and castles, besides Caer Dabill, a most ancient Castle and fortress, which by report was created by the Romans, and Caerdd the principall town of the shire, standing vpon the river Tafe, Englishmen terme it Caerdd or Cardife. Also, within the body of the said Lordship were eightene Castles, five and thirtie knights fees, a halfe, that held of the same Lordship by knights service, besides a great number of freeholders. Also, the said Lordship being a Lordship Marcher, or a Lordship Royall, and holden of no other Lordship, the Lordes thereof, euer since the winning of the same owing theire obedience onely to the Crowne, haue used therein Iura regalia with the trial of all actions, as well reall as personall, and pleas of the crowne, with authoritie to pardon all offences, treason only excepted.

Now to returne to king William: he in this meane time making warre against his brother Robert duke of Normandy, took the Castles of Malerike and of Albemarle, then sending his souldiours into his brothers countrey, he began to spoile and robbe. But through the diligence of friends, agreement was made betwene them, vpon condition, that Robert his brother should giue vp into the kings handes, the castles that he had gotten of him, to wit, the countie of Wilt, the Abbey of Ffescampe, the Abbey of St. Michaels Mount, and Heref-bourgh, &c. And those Castles which were reuolted from the duke in the countie of Spaine, with the Castles which stode against him in Normandy, the king should subdue them, and restore them to the duke, and all the lands in England pertaining to the Normans, which for their loyalty to the Duke they had lost, he should restore to the Normans. Also he should giue to the duke so much land in England as was covenanted betwene them. Moreover, it was agreed, that if the Duke died without issue male, the king should be his heire: and in like case, if the king died without lawfull issue male, the Duke should be his heire. Which covenants were confirmed by the othe of twelve Barons on the kings part, and as many on the Dukes part.

In the meane time Henry younger brother to the king and Duke, with a power of men of armes entered Saint Michaels Mount, and wasted the kings landes, taking prisoners, and robbing other. Wherefore the king and Duke with an army besieged mount Saint Michael, all the Lent season, oft times fighting with their brother Henry, where they lesse both men and horses, but prevailed little. The king on a time coming out of his pavilion, and seeing the enemies a far off riding in a battterie, he alone rode against them, and set vpon them, thinking that no man durst breake his bolde as to withstand him: but straightway his horse was slaine vnder him, and himselfe brayne by the one fote: and when the knight that had overthorne him, took his sword in his hand to smite him, he cried out, Hold thy hand haue, I am the king of England. The whole company of men of armes knowing his voice, straightway they reuerently took him vp from the ground, and brought him another horse:

and hee looking for no stroke, sprang upon the horse backe, and with an angry countenance beholding all that stood about him, said: Who was it that ouerthrew me? And the knight which had done the deede, saide: I not thinke that you had bene the king, but a knight, did ouerthrow you. With the which answer the king being pleased, swore by Lukes face, thou shalt be my knight, and shalt bee written in my white Booke, with the reward of a worthy knight.

Malcolme king of Scottes, with a great armie invaded Northumberland, meaning if he had sped well to proceede further, but he was disappointed in his first attempt, notwithstanding he returned with great praises. Whereof when king William vnderstode, hee returned into England with his brother Robert, and shortly after with no small naup and army of horsemen and footmen, he went into Scotland to invade king Malcolme, but before he could come thither, almost all his naup was drowned, and many of his horsemen perished through hunger and colde. King Malcolme mette with king William, which when Duke Robert behelde, he called to him Clito Edgar, whome king William had expelled out of Normandie: upon trust of whose helpe, he made peace betwixt the two kings, with condition, &c. Duke Robert also pacified the kings wrauth against Clito Edgar.

On the nineteenth of October, a vehement stroke of lightning, shaking the steeple of the Abbey at Winchester, made a great hole in the stone work thereof nere to the toppe, rent one of the beames in the church, and cast downe to the ground the head of the Crucifer with great violence, and brake the right legge of the same Crucifer, the Image of our Lady also, that stood by the crosse, being shaken with the blowe, fell to the ground. Also a great smoake afterwards with a marvellous filthy smell, filled all the church, which continued long after: although the Monkes toke holy water, and incenses, went about the houses of the Monasterie, singing Psalmes, &c.

Tempest of wind at London, more then five hundred houses blew downe.

And on the seventeenth day of November, a mighty tempest of wind out of the South west, beat downe in London stre hundred and six houses, and shaken the Churches, especially the Church of Saint Mary Bowe in Cheape, where the winde brake in with such a vehement force, that two men were theewith flaine in the Church, and the roose being raised with the beames thereof were carried in the ayre a great while, and at the last fell to the ground. There were dyuen with their fall into the ground, that there appeared of some of them the seventen, and of some the eight part, to wit, but foure fote above the ground: which beames of rafters were seauen and twentie or eight and thentie fote long, which was a wonderfull thing to see them so pierce the ground (not parted then with stone) and there to stand in such order, as the workemen had placed them on the Church, untill such time as they were cut euen by the ground. The Tower of London was also broken, &c. When king William had repaired such Castles as the Scottes had impeyed, and builded the newe Castle upon Eime, hee returning south of Northumberland, came through Mercia into Worcester, and kept the Duke with him till Christmas, but he would not performe any promise made with him, which the Duke taking grievously passed

Bishop of Salisbury
Bishop of Winchester.

This deceased Wido the 42. Abbot of St. Augulines by Canterbury. After whose buriall, the monkes of St. Augulines went to king William to obtaine licence to chuse a new Abbot, which request was not onely denied the m by the king, but he also charged them upon a great paine, not to elect any, saying, that he would holde in his hand, all the Spirituall livings in the whole realme, and would dispose of them at his pleasure: so the Monkes of Saint Augulines returned frustrate of all hope therein. Now it happened at the same time, there was in that Monasterie a certaine Monke, in religion young, but grave in discretion, a Norman borne, and king Williams kinsman, by name called Hugh de Floriaco. This Hugh having bene a valiant souldier, had long served king William the elder, and the said king William Rufus, as well in Normandie, as in England. Hugh, as yet by profession a souldier, on a certaine time comming to Canterbury with king William Rufus, upon deuotion did visit St. Augulines church, where by Gods speciall grace, ravished with the love of God, and delighting in the chaste life of the Monkes, he would not goe out of the limits of the monasterie before he had procured to be made a monke and brother of the said monasterie. Which being granted, the said Hugh went into Normandie, distributed his goods unto his kinsmen, and to the poore, because he had no wife nor childe, and returned unto the monasterie, and put on the monkish habite, and so remained a Monke. The Abbot Wido being dead (as it is said) at the last it was decreed that two circumpect Monkes, together with the said Hugh, who had scarce continued one yeere of probation should be sent to the king to procure his fauour by prayer or price, that he would graunt them licence to elect an Abbot. When these presented themselves unto the kings sight, and saw his cousin, who in time before had served him in the habiterie of a souldier, to be now clothed in habite of a monke, he was so dismayed in minde, that gushing out with teares he said, I do grant you this count of mine to be your Abbot, and at your petition I doe give him the gouernment of the Abbey of Saint Auguline, neither do I permit you to chuse any other, whom, unless you doe presently recuse, I will shortly burne your Abbey to ashes. When the Monkes seeing no remedy, submitted themselves to the kings will in the premises. But the foresaid Hugh long time refused the honour, saying, that he was as well unworthy, as insufficient, because he was a man in a manner unlettered, and one that had verie little skill, as well in religion, as in ecclesiasticall ordinances, but the king and the monkes forced him to accept the honour offered, neither did the king suffer him to depart from the Court before he were consecrated Abbot, which was done in the kings Chappell at Westminster, by Maurice Bishop of London. This Abbot did manie laudable aces to the great commoditie of that church. King William would waare against the Welshmen, but prevailed not, for he lost many of his best knights, and much cattell, as well at this time, as at other.

A souldier became a monke, and was Abbot of Saint Augulines.

John Bishophe of Welles a Turon bozne, by consent of king William for a gre at summe of money translated his bishops sea to Wate.

This pere a noble man of the Normans bloud named Picot, vicecomes of Herefe, at request of Hugolin his wife, founded a church to the honor of God & S. Giles, nere unto the castle of Cambridge, but afterward, to wit, in an. 1102, the Chanons were remoued to Barnwell, by Paine Peuerell. The towne of Cambridge toke name of a fair large bidge, made ouer the riuer Grant there running, and so named Grantbidge (corruptly Cambidge:) it increased by mean of this bidge, which was the ruine of Grantcester, sometimes a famous citie, situate little more then a mile from Grantbidge. The Castle was builded in the first pere of William Conquerour, as male appeare by the description in Doomes day Booke in the Erchequer, which hath thus. The borough of Grantbidge defended it selfe for one hundred in the time of Edward the 1. In this borough haue bin, and yet are 2. wards: in the first ward are 54. mansions, of them 2. be waisted: In this first warde Allan hath 5. burgesses that pay nothing, & earle Porzon hath 3. mansions of the land of Litchel: and there be 3. burgesses, which in the time of Edward the 1. paid 5. shillings and 8. pence halfe peny, at this day they pay nothing: Ralfe of Bant hath 2. burgesses that pay nothing. Roger seruant to Bishop Remigius hath 3. burgesses that paie nothing. Erchingor hath 1. burges that paie nothing: this ward was accounted in the daies of king Ed. for 2. wards, but for the castle 27. houses were thowen down. In the second ward were 48. mansions in the time of king Ed. whereof 2. be waisted, of them 13. paie nothing, the other 32. pay all customes, Carle Allan hath of them 5. burgesses that paie nothing, and 9. remaine in the hands of the Englishmen. In the thirde ward were 41. mansions, of them 11. be waisted, the other 30. pay all customes. In the fourth ward were 45. mansions, of them 24. be waisted, the other 21. pay all customes. In the fift ward were fiftie mansions, one of them is waisted, all the rest pay the customes. In the seventh ward were 37. mansions, 3. of those 37. frenchmen haue, and pay nothing. In the eight ward were 37. mansions, a priest holdeth one & paie nothing, 3. are waisted. In the ninth ward were 32. mansions. In the tenth ward were 26. mansions, 7. of them are waisted, but yet they defend themselves. The customes payable for this towne were 7. pounds by pere. And for Landgale 7. pounds, and 2. oyes and 2. pence. The burgesses in the time of king Edward lent the sherriffe their carts thise in the pere: now they are demanded nine times. They found neither boates nor wagons in the time of S. Edward, which they doe now by custome set upon them, They claime of the Carle Picora common pasture, which he hath taken from them. The same Picote hath made there three Millcs, which taketh away the pasture, and destrcteth manie houses, and one spill of the Abbot of Ely, and an other of the Carle Allan, the spillcs paie nine pounds the pere. The same Carle Picot hath of the heriot of the Lagemens seven pounds, and one palfrey, and one knights armor. Alurike Godriclon when he was sherriffe had of one of the twenty shillings for a heriot. Thus much Doomes day for Grantbidge, whereof more shall be said in place conuenient.

Hugh Lupus earle of Chester, sent into Normandy for Anselme, by his counsell to build an Abbey of S. Werbridge at Chester.

King William lying sicke at Gloucester, and thinking he should haue died, his Barons put into his head, his promise to God and the world, that he would amend his life. And forthwith he gaue vnto Anselme Abbot of Becce, the archbishoppicke of Canterburie; and to Robert Bloct, his chancellor, the bishoppicke of Lincoln. But when the king had recovered his health, he repented him that he had not sold those bishoppicks for a great peece of money.

Malcolme king of Scots comming into England was met withall, and disdainely slaine, with his son and yetre also, by Robert Mowbray Earle of Northumberland.

William Waren first earle of Surrey, and Gundred his wife, founded the abbey of Lewes in Sussex.

King William builded againe the Citie of Carlile, which was destroyed by the Danes 200. yeres before: hee also builded a Castell there, and out of the South parts of England sent men to inhabit.

This pere was a great famine: and after, so great a mortallitie, that the quicke were scarce able to burie the dead.

King William made great wars in Normandy against his brother Robert, through the which both Englande and Normandie were sore oppressed with exactions.

The Welchmen spoiled the Citie of Gloucester, with a part of Shrewsbury and won the Ile of Anglesey to their subiection.

The Bishoppicke of Hereford was translated to Hereford, by Herbert being Bishop there, sometime Abbot of Ramsey.

King William sent his brother Henry into Northumberland with a great powder, because Robert Mowbray Earle of that countrey refused to come to the kings court: the countrey was spoiled, the Earle was taken, and many were dismembered, some had their eies put out, &c.

King William with a powder entred Wales, but not being able to followe the Welchmen among the hilles, he builded two Castelles in the borders, and returned.

Great preparation was made by the Christians to go against the Infidels at Ierusalem: Peter the hermite being their first leader, and after Godfrey of Lorraine, called Godfrey of Boloigne.

In a Councell holden at Salisbury, William de Owe was accused to the king of treason, who whiles hee prouoked his accuser to fight with him in combat, by the kings commandement his eies were plucked out, and his stones cut off. Spanie innocent men were also accused, of which number was William de Aluerie, a man of goodlie personage, godfather to the king, his Auntes sonne, and his selwer, yet the king commanded him to be hanged: which William making his confession to Olmond Bishoppe of Salisbury, was first whipped throughout by all the Churches of the citie, who dealing his garments to the poore, went naked to hanging, bloodying his flesh with often kneeling vpon the stones: and at the place of execution, he satisfied the Bishop and people, saying,

King William being returned out of Normandie into England, kept his feast of Whitson tide very royally at Westminster, in the new hall, which hee had lately caused there to be builded, the length whereof was 270. foot, and 74. foot in breadth: and when he heard men say that the hall was too bigge, and too great, he answered and saide, This Hall is not bigge enough by the one halfe, and is but a bed chamber, in comparison of that I minde to make. A diligent searcher might yet finde out the foundation of the Hall, which he had purposed to build, stretching from the River of Thames, euen vnto the common high way. As witeth H. Huntington, he chalenged the inuestiture of Bzetales, he pilld and shaued the people, with tribute, especially to spend about the Tower of London, and the great Hall at Westminster.

King William having transferred into his treasure three hundred pounds by yere forth of the Bishopricke of Durham, and six monethes being past of the fourth yere, from the death of William Bpshp of Durham, gaue the Bpshprie to Ranulph, who for certaine excellent parts about the king was named the kings Chaplain, but some haue written that he gaue the king a thousand pound for that Bishopricke. This Ranulph was first familiar with Maurice bishop of London, but falling at variance, because the Deanry was taken away from him, he went to the king in hope of a higher place, in which point his hope was not deceived, for being admitted, and hauing a good wit and ready tongue, in short time he obtained to be preferred afore all other estates of England, who being called to be Procurator or Chancellor of the whole realme, did manie times beaue himselfe so proudly, abusing his authoritie, that he little esteemed to offende many, who laboured with continuall accusations to cloud the clere minde of the king toward him, whereof when they failed with baine labour, they imagined how to haue killed him. For which cause, one Gerald, armed with audacitie and deceit of other, taking a boate with a few persons, met with the Chaplaine Ranulph at London, humbly requesting him that he would make speed vnto his spasser Mauricius Bishop of London, lying very sicke at his house vpon the riuer of Thames, who being almost ready to depart the world, greatly desired to speake with him. In affirming the truth whereof, he had brought a boate for him from his spasser, wherein hee might more speedily be carried.

Ranulph suspecting nothing, entered the boat with a few of his companie, which boat Gerald with a straight course directed in the middle of the streame vnto the sea: and when the Chaplaine demanded why they rowed so long, and did not turne to the shore, they sayned that the port was further off, where they should haue convenient place to land.

cho: in the midst of the floude, which, as it seemed, awayted for his coming, did presentlie suspect the deuisse of their deceit. And being transported unto the suspected Shippe, in the which was harboured a great number of armed men, perceiving no hope to escape, hee cast the King which he wore on his finger into the Sea: and his Secretarie did throw his Seale into the midst of the floude, lest through those Seales the state of things might bee disturbed by counterfeite processe, and Wittes set forth by the deceyving enemy. After this his men are set over, being first bounde with an othe, not to disclose anie thing of the sealing atwaie of their Passier.

Howe the Shippe leaving the River, with boyled sailes, entered the deepe Sea, directing their course towardes the South, and Ranulph sitting in the foreparte of the Shippe. There arose a contention among the shipmen for the manner of his death: and two are chosen forth, either to leane him into the sea, or to knocke out his braines, who shoulde for reward obtaine those garments wherewith hee was clothed: of which persons, when the one shoulde haue his roabe or uppermost garment, and the other would also possesse the same, this contention protracted time of his death. At length there sodaynelie arose a fierre wind from the South, which troubled the Sea from the very bottome, and the Heavens were covered with darkenesse. Which tempest so tossed the Boate hither and thither, that they coulde neither goe forwarde, nor retorne backe againe to land. And when the spast and Cables were broken, the Ship was not onelie carried on the water, but she also carried in her the water, nothing being more certaine then death to them all, which they looked for, onelie such was the course of the Sea, that the Shippe was returning to the place from whence she came, and yet the waves beating her backe, the murderers, a new determine for the death of the chaplaine, lest he escaping shoulde reuenge such iniurie.

But one which was next to Gerald in the Shippe, abhorring this wickednes, and being nere to the Chaplaine with sorrowfull repetition sayde, But alas, Ranulph, thou shalt not be murdered, but if thou wilt pardon me this wicked conspiacie, I will stand by thee to thy defence, as a companion of thy life or death. Whereunto he (as he was alwaies bold spirited) with great noise calling upon him, saide: What dost thou thinke Gerald? What dost thou request of vs? Thou art my man, thou owest faith to me, call backe thy mind from the wicked deede thou intendest, demaunde what thou wilt, for I am he that glue more then thou canst demaunde. Then Gerald, not so much allured by words, as feared with the authoritie of the man, did consent, and bringing him out of the Shippe, now beaten to the shore, did procure him honourable furniture, at his owne house. But not trusting the former promises, he procured his owne safetie by banishment into perpetuall exile. Ranulph therefore calling knights together, is brought to London with manie armed men, and a great noise of people, to the astonishment of all men, supposing him to haue bene slaine, he as then was sodainly reuiued, and set againe as executor of the kings affaires, and received the Bishoppicke of Durham, being consecrated in the Church of Saint Paul in London.

King William being a hunting in the new Forrest, wood was brought him that his people were besieged in Spaine: he forthwith took shipping, though he were vehemently perswaded to the contrary, for that there was at that time a great tempest: to whome he answered, he neuer heard that anie king was drowned. At this time he got more honour then euer he did in all his life, for he chased his enemies, and returned with victorie.

This yere, as well in Scotland as in England, on the third day of November the sea broke in ouer the banks of the Thames and other rivers, drowning manie towne, many people, with innumerable numbers of oren and sheepe: at which tempest, the lands in Kent, that sometime belonged to Duke Godwyne, Earle of Kent, were covered with sandes and drowned, which are to this daie called Godwyne sandes.

The Monastery of Gloucester, which Abbot Serle had builded from the foundation, was now dedicated.

This yere many strange things came to passe, the diuell did visible appeare unto men, and sometime spake unto them.

Afterouer, in the Towne of Finchamsted in Barkshire, nere unto Abingdun, a spring did continually by the space of fiftene daies flowe plentifully with blood (or the likenesse thereof) so that it did colour and tinct the next water broke unto it. Of which things, when men tolde the king thereof, hee laughed them to scoone, and gaue no credite to them, neither yet to his owne dreames, nor the visions that other men told him of.

King William on the morrow after Lammas daie, hunting in the newe Forrest of Hamphire, in a place called Chorougham, where since a Chappell was builded, sir Walter Tirel shooting at a deer, his arrowes hit the king in the breast, that he fell downe stark dead, and neuer spake word. His men, especially that knight got the man away, but some came back again, & laid his body upon a Colliers cart, which one felis leane breast did draw unto the Citie of Winchester, where he was buried on the morrow after his death, at whose buriall, men could not weepe for sole.

This king was taken out of this world in the midst of his unrighteousnesse, who being wicked to his owne people, and to strangers, was most wicked to himselfe. The countries about him he psonned with wars, and England was so miserably oppressed under him, that it could not recover, for he and his traine spoiled and subuerted all things.

He died in the yere of Christ, 1100. and in the 13. yere of his raigne, on the second day of August, when he had reigned 12. yeres 11. moneths, lacking eight daies, and was buried at Winchester, in the Cathedral Church or Monasterie of Saint Swichen, under a plaine slate marble stone, before the lecture in the quere, but long since his bones were translated in a Coffin and laid with King Knutes bones. ## Henry Beaucherke.

Io. Rouic.

Henry, the yongest sonne of William Conquerour, borne in England, at a place called Selby in Lincolnshire, brother to William Rufus, and the first of that name, for his learning called Beaucherke, brought up in the studie of the liberrall artes at Cambridge, chieflie through the trauaile of Henry Newborow Earle of Warwike, (who appealed all debates of that time to the contrarie) obtained the dominion ouer this Realme of England, and began his reigne the second of August, in the yere of our Lord 1100, and was crowned at Westminster on the first day of August, by Malrice Byschoppe of London, because at that time Anselme Archbishop of Canterburie, was by persecution of William Rufus expelled.

This Henry was a noble Prince, strong and mighty of body, high of stature, and amiable of countenance; blacke haired, and that somewhat long about the elcheuones; faire eyes, broad breasted, well in flesh, full of merie conceits. Hee was excellent in wit, eloquent in speech, and fortunate in battaile, and for these thre hee had thre notable vices, Couetousnesse, Crueltie and Lecherie.

Hee married Mawde the daughter of Melcolme and Margare, King and Quene of Scots, of whom he begate William and a daughter named Mawd. At the beginning of his reigne, he restored the state of the Cleargie, asswaged the grievous punishments, reduced againe Saint Edwards lawes, and amended them. He put out of his Court all vice and wanton persons.

He reformed the olde untrue measures, and made a measure by the length of his olue arme, which was then called Armo, and now the same is called a yard, or a metre, &c.

He restored to his subjects the vse of lights (as the night, with lights and also fire, had ben forbiiden by his father to be used, after the ringing of a bell, at eight of the clocke at night.

The same Jordan gaue 14. acres of ground lying in the field next adioining unto Clerkenwell, to build thereupon a house of nuns, wherein he with Muriel his wife, were both buried in the Chapter house.

Robert Shorthole Duke of Normandie, the kinges eldest brother, which was now returned from Hierusalem made warre vpon his brother Henry for the Crowne of England, who assembled a strong armie, and landed at Poerke mouth, but by mediation a peace was made, on condition, that Henry should pay 3000. marks pærelie to duke Robert: and if the one died without issue, the longer liuer should inherit. Winchester was bent the 17. of May, and Gloucester was bent the 20. of May.

Robert Fitzham, who came with the Conquerour out of Normandie, with Sibell his wife, sister to Robert Belasme Earle of Shrewsburie, founded a new Church of Shenelesburie, with the offices thereto belonging, and enriched it with large possessions, and was there buried.

Robert de Belasme Earle of Shrewsburie, eldest Sonne to Roger Mountgomerie, strengthened the Towne and Castell of Shrewsburie, so did hee the Castles of Bridgenorth, Wichle, and Arundell, with viualles and armed men against king Henrie: but the king being warned thereof, he gathereth his power and besiegeth Bridgenorth, which Towne was yelued vnto him. And this being knowne to them of Arundell, they forthwith submitted themselves, with condition, that their Lord Robert de Belasme, might be permitted frælie to passe into Normandy. Also they of Shrewsburie sent the keies of their castell, and pledges of their obedience, and then Robert, with his brother Ernulfus and Roger of Hoptiers abured this land for euer.

This yere the Priory and Hospitall of S. Bartholomew in Smithfield was begun to be founded by Rahere (a man of a singular and pleasant wit, & therefore of many called the kinges iester and minstrel) in a place which before had bene a marshy ground, a common laishale of al: bores & filth, & the place where felons and other transgressors were executed. This Rahere ioined vnto him a certain old man named Alsine, that had not long before sold the parish church of S. Giles, nigh a gate of the city of London, then called Cæples gate: this man he bled as a counseller & companion in his building of the Church and Hospitall, and the one of them, to wit, Rahere, became the first Priory of that priory, & the other, to wit, Alsine, became hospitaller or superior for the poore, & went himselfe daily to the Chambers, & other markets, where he begged the charitie of devout people for their reliefe, promising to the liberrall giuers (adueaging testimonies of holy scripture) reward at the hands of God.

King Henry gaue the earldome of Leicester to Robert Beaumont earle of Arkeint, that came in with William Conqueror. This Robert new founded the college of secular Chanons in the castell of Leicester, before by wars defaced. Robert the second surnamed de Boleu, his son Earle of Leicester, and Amicia his wife, for Robert his father, and Mabel his mother, founded an Abbey to the honour

Robert duke of Normandy comming into England, through the subtiltie of king Henry his younger brother, released to him the tribute of three thousand marks of silver, which he should have received yearly.

Hugh Lacy founded the monastrie of S. John at Lanthony, the Chanons of which place were since translated by Miles, high constable, and earle of Hereford, to a place nere unto Gloucester, then called Hyde, since called Lanthony.

Juga Baynard ladie of little Donmow, caused Maurice Bishop of London to dedicate the church of Donmow which he had founded, and the same day she gave to it halfe a hide of land. This lady juga was late wife to Baynard, that first builded Baynards castell in London.

William earle of Spoxton was disseised of all his lands in England, and all his castels made leuell with the ground, and the countrey soe bereid with the kings exactions.

Now the flames of wars being translated into Normandy, prevailed there, being kindled by the assemblies of traitours, as with fire which catcheth in all things that is about it. Normandy is a patient sufferer of mischiefs, though it be no large region: it doeth tolerate sedition verie long, and by restoring of peace ariseth into a fertile state of subsistence, letting out the bioplemaker into France with free passage. Contrariwise, England doth not suffer rebels long. Robert de Belesme earle of Shyresbury comming into Normandy, having confederates of his wickednes, among whom was W. Morton, the son of Robert the kings uncle, who from his childehood ever envied the glory of Henry, for not content with two earldomes of Spoxton in Normandy, & Cornwall in England, he required the earldome of Kent, which his uncle Odo held, being so presumptuous, y<sup>e</sup> he would say, he would not put on his uppermost garment, except he might obtain of his uncle his desired possessions. But the betraying him with subtil answers, did not onlie denie him that which he demanded, but began to challenge from him such things, as he said, he held unlawfully: whereupon the said William being disseised of all his landes in Englande, in a rage got him into Normandy, where besides the same assaults he made against the kings Castels, he raged against Richard Earle of Chester, the sonne of Hugh, invading, taking, and spoiling such things as appertained unto him, who was then but a child in yeeres, and in the kings wardship.

There appeared about the Sun foure circles, and a blazing star.

King Henrie raised a great armie, and passed the sea into Normandy, against his brother Robert, and got the towne and Castell of Cane, and bent Bayon, with the Church of S. Mary, by the help of the President of Angeow, & many Castels more he wan, whereupon the Priories of Normandy submitted themselves unto king Henry. The Flemings having a great parte of their countrey destroyed, came unto England, and obtained a place to inhabite in, nigh the River of Tweede, but afterward they were removed thence, and sent into West Wales.

Endo

Endo Wapiser or Sewer to king Henry, founded the monastrie of Saint John in Colchester of regular Chanons of Saint Austens rule, commonly called blache Chanons, and this house was the first that ever was erected in England of that order. King Henry having set things in an order in Normandy, he sailed and returned into England, that hee might increase his strength and returne againe.

Robert duke of Normandy came to his brother at Portsmouth, and friendly required him to beare brotherlie love toward him, but king Henry falling his conscience accusing him, for obtaining the kingdoms by defrauding of his elder brother, and fearing men more then God, first hee reconciled the nobles of the Realme with faire promises, thinking afterwards to make amends for his great wrongs, by founding of an Abbey, which he purposed to build.

The Duke returning into Normandy, the king followed with a great power, where betwene them were manie soe battayles fought, but at the last the valiant and most stout man Robert was taken, and William earle of Spoxton, Robert de Belesme, William Crispine, & other, to the number 400. men of arms, but Robert de Belesme escaped, when hee sawe that manie of his men were taken.

This yere appeared a blazing starre, from thre of the clocke till nine, and on the spawnde Thorsoate was scene two full spones, one in the East, and an other in the West.

The first Chanons entred into the church of our Lady in Southwarke called S. Mary Overy, founded by William Poundarge knight, and William Dancys Normans, William Gifford Bishoppe of Winchester assisting them in that worke. Algodus was first Prior there.

When king Henry had set in order Normandy according to his pleasure, he returning into England, brought with him his brother Robert, and William of Spoxton, and put them in perpetuall prison: from whence shortly after duke Robert deceiving his keepers, sought to scape, but he was taken as he fled, sitting on his horse in a deepe mire and tough clay where hee felle fast: and by his brothers commandement had his eyes put out, and kept straiter till his dying daie, which was about 26. yeeres after, when hee pined a waile for sorowe and griefe of mind.

It appeareth by the private historie of Dunstable, that in the joining of the two high waies of Watling and Thening, there were great woods, which were selled by king Henrie, to represse the cuiles that were there committed by one Dunne, a most famous theefe of that time, of whom the place was called Dunstable, the said king therefore built there a Boro, by the which he also erected a pallace for himselfe, making the Burgeses there as free as anie other Burgeses of the Realme were, to the which towne the king granted both faire and sparket.

And this yere he began there to build a faire church of priory, placing there in regular Chanons, and gave to Peter the first Prior, and his successors there serving God, the towne of Dunstable and 4. cultures of land about the towne, with great privileges, as appeareth by his Letters Patents, this Priory was

Richard the tenth, and last Abbot of Ely deceased, and was buried among his predecessours at Ely. This Richard being a man of gre at wit, perceiving that the ancient priuiledges of his house were daily violatid, by sundrie great personages, especiallie, by the Byschop of Lincoln, who challenged episcopall iurisdiction ouer the house, notwithstanding that the same was clearly exempt thereto by the ancient priuiledges, went to the king, and dealt with him in such sort, that he obtained his regall consent, to chaunge the Abbe into a bischoppe: vnto the which place was named for the first bishop one Harucus then bishop of Worcester. And because there was yet no prouince assigned, where this new bishop should haue iurisdiction, the king sent for the Byschop of Lincoln Robert, and of him obtained, that the country then called Grantbidge might bee his prouince, and gaue vnto the Byschop of Lincoln the manor of Spaldwicke, in recompence of the iurisdiction which hee before had ouer the countie of Grantbidge, and so Harue was placed in the Byschoppe.

King Henry sayled into Normandy with a great army against the king of France, who with the Earle of Flanders, and other went about to make William sonne to Robert Courtoise Duke of Normandy, but at king Henries arrival, they returned home without honour. King Henry lay at Roane, and had great creations out of England.

This yere king Henry began the foundation of the Abbey of Cercester, or Churnecheester, which standeth upon Churne riuer. There was in this place before the Conquest, a faire and rich Colledge of Prebendes, Reimedes Chancellor to king Edward the Confessor was Deane of this house, and buried in the body of the church of Churnecheester, as appeareth by Epitaph on his tombe. King Henry also builded there the hospitall of S. Iohn, &c.

The Towne of Peterborough with the Natchy Church there, was burned downe to the ground. Also the Cite of Bath was burnt the same yere.

In March was exceeding lightning, and in December thunder and haille: and the Spone at both times seemed to be turned into blout.

Moreover, she gave Spanors, and a spille, commonly called Aliggon Hill to the abbess of Barking, for the repaying of the bridges and high wale. But afterwarde, Gilbert de Mountfichet builded the Abbey of Stratford in the marshes, the Abbot thereof by giuing a piece of money, purchased to himselfe the Spanors and Mill aforesaide, and couenanted to repaire the bridges and wale. Till at length, hee laide the charge vpon one Godfrey Prat, allowing him certaine loanes of bread daily, that he should repaire the bridges and wap. Who being holpen by the aide of trauallers, did not onely performe the charge, but also was a gainer to himselfe: which thing the Abbot perceiving, he withholdeth from him parte of the bread promised. Whereupon, Godfrey demaundeth a tole of the wayfaring men, and to them that denied, hee stopped the wale, till at the length, wearied with toyle, hee neglected his charge, whereof came the decay and ruine of the stone bridges and wap.

About this time, certaine noble men of the horsemen being religiously bent, bound themselves in the hands of the Patriarke of Hierusalem, to serue Christ after the manner of regular Chanons, in chastitie, and obedience, and to renounce their owne proper will for ever. Of which order, the first was the honourable man Hugh Paganus, and Gawfride de Saint Andemare: and where at the first, they had no certaine habitation, Baldwin king of Hierusalem graunted them a dwelling place in his pallace by the Temple, and the Chanons of the same Temple gaue them the strate thereby to build their houses of office in, and the Patriarke, the king, the poples, and prelates gaue them certaine reuenues out of their Lordships. Their first profession was for safeguard of the Pilgrimes, to keepe the waies, against the lying in waite of thanes. About 10. yeres after, they had a rule appointed them, and a white habite by Pope Honorius, at that time, where they had bene nine in number, they began to increase into great numbers.

Afterward in time of Pope Eugenius, they had Crosses of red cloth sewed on their uppermost garments, to be known from others thereby: and in short time, because they had their first mansion hard by the Temple of our Lorde in Hierusalem, they were called knights of the Temple.

But William his son, somewhat more then 17. yeres of age, who through his fathers kingdomes, lacked nothing but the name of a king, commanted an other ship to be prepared for him, all the young sons of the nobilitie flocking thither for the company of him, as their play: forre and the sailers also tipped with too much wine, in lustines bagged that they would quicklie leane the other behind, that went out before them. So in the darknes of the night, the youth lacking wisdome, and overcharged with drinke, discharged the ship from the land: she sailth swift as an arrow, and cutting through the dauncing clouds, by the negligence of the drunken sailers, dashed vpon a rocke about water, not far from land. The poore soules rose with great cry, besirred them with their pyroned stanes, long labouring to get the shippe from the rocke: but fortune was against them, bying their paines to no purpose: so the side of the shippe, leaning against the rocke, cracked, and the broken sternes hung downe: noles it did cast some into the sea, and the water coming in, drowned other, when with casting out a boate, the kings sonne was taken in, and might haue bene saued by returning to land, had not his base sister the Countesse of Perche, wra-ling with death in the great ship, craued her brothers helpe. He moued with pitie, commanted the boate to be rowed to the shippe, that he might take in his sister, and straightwaite the boate did sinke, being overladen with the great companie that leaped in, and so drowned them all, onely one clowne escaped, which swimming all night vpon the spall, shewed all the chaunce of the tragédie in the morning. There was neuer shippe so miserable to England, nor so famous aboade. There was drowned with William, Richard the kinges other sonne that hee begate before his kingdome, of one of his Subiectes, Richard earle of Chester, his brother Owle the kings sons Tutor, the Countesse of Perche, the kings daughter named Marie, and his niece the Countesse of Chester, sister to Theobald, William Bigot, Geoffry Riddle, Walter de Curcie, Geoffry Archdrakon of Hereford, and also manie the best knightes, and Chaplaines that were in the Court, and noble mens sonnes fit to be knights, to the number of 160. persons, they came together to shew the kings son sport, or do him anie seruise they could: but they made the miserie the more, that they could not bee easilie founde, for searchers being placed all along vpon the sea coast, found scantie one of them. King, for the space of fixe yeeres and eleuen moneths.

King Henry returned out of Normandie into England.

And in the first of August, the king beganne a great councell at London, in the which councell, by authoritie of the Pope, the feast of the Conception of our Ladie was confirmed, the which councell of the Cleergie, (through the simplicitie of the Archbishoppe of Cantuarbie) were by the King deceiued, for they graunted the King to haue the erection of Justice concerning the foraeie of Priestes, for their keeping of concubines which the Bishoppes afterwarde repented so late: but they could not helpe it. For the king took infinite summes of money of Priestes, and suffered them to doe what they would.

About this time, men forgetting their byrth, transformed themselves by the length of their heares into the habite of women kinde. One of the knightes of the Realme, a man very proud of his long heare, at the length stricken in conscience, it seemed vnto him in his sleepe, that one did choake him with the heares of his head (for all men were shauen of their faces.) Wherefore, being awakened, he caused forthwith the superfluitie of his heares to bee cut off. Which example took place throughout all England for the time, and almost all the knightes were contented to haue their heares cut off. But one yere was scarcely past, when all that thought themselves courtiers, fell into the former vice, & so contended with women in their long heares, that when they were decayed, they knitte about their heads, certaine roles, and coverings, being ignorant, or forgetting the Apostles saying. Let it be a reproch vnto a man, if he endeuour to haue his heares grow long.

The tenth of May the Citie of Rochester, in presence of the King was sore defaced with fire.

King Henry gaue his daughter Matild the Empresse, to Geoffrey Plantagenet Earle of Angewer, to be his wife.

King Henry in the moneth of August passed the sea into Normandie, where he remained for a time.

This yere King Henry returned into England. And Matild the Empresse also, the same yere, and calling a great assembly of noble men at Northampton, the former othe was renewed by them that had received it before.

A great murraine of cattell went ouer all England, so that the like had not bene sene in many yeres.

King Henry being sore troubled ofte times in his sleepe, declared the same vnto Grimbalde his Physician, the effect thereof was, that some time it seemed to him, that he saue a great multitude of husbandmen with their rusticall toles stande about him, threatening him, for wrongs done by him against them: Sometimes hee seemed to see his knightes and souldiers in armour, threatening him. Sometimes the Bishops, Abbots and Clergie, with their pastall staves threatening him: Which sight so feared him in his sleepes, that oft times he rose naked out of his bed, took weapon in hand,

King Henry in
ning on the sea.

In the moneth of June, when King Henry was entred his Shippe to returne into England with his traine, the sea was wye troubled, so that the Shippe was in manner ouerwhelmed with the floodes, and the winde was contrarie unto him, so that seeing death at hand, hee bowed that the tribute called Dane gilt, should not for 7. yeres be creaced. He also vowed to repent him of his former life, to reconcile himselfe, and enen after to obserue iustice.

The Whilition which being byed with a great rewarde to cleaue his head to take out the bzaine, with the stincke thereof died, so that he enioyed not the rewarde that was couenanted. Thus among a great manie that King Henrie slew, this Whilition was the last.

Henry.

King Henry was buried at Reading, which he had founded. He also founded the Priorie of Dunstable, hee conuerted a rich Colledge of Prebends in the Towne of Etrenceller, into an Abbey of Chanons regular: hee also builded there an Hospitall of Saint Iohn: and new builded the Castle of Winton, by on the hill, with a Colledge there, one mile from the old towne of Winton. King Edward the thirde builded much of this Castle, encreased the number of Chanons in the Colledge, adding to the 8. Chanons, a Deane, and 15. Cha- nons more, and foure and twentie poze impotent knightes, and other Mini- sters, as appeareth by his Charter dated the two and twentieth of his raigne, hee founded there the order of the Carter. King Edward the fourth toke from the Colledges of Eton, and Cambridge founded by King Henry the first, almost a thousand pound by yere, and gaue to Winton. He also builded the faire newe church now bled, same onely the toppe and crossing, which was since finished by the Lord Reinold Bray, and other knightes of the Carter. In place of the olde Colledge church, King Henry the seuenth builded a Chappell, where he meant to haue bene buried: but altering his minde, lesse the same unfinished, and builded his Chappell at Westminster, he made the faire can- way betwene Winton and London. King Henry the eight made the outer gate-house, which is called the Erchequer of the Honour, where hath bene, and yet continueth a moneth court, kept by the Clarke of the Honour and Cas- tle, for the pleas of the Forrest and honours. In which, among other thinges, is to be seene the yereley account, of the charges, of the planting of the Wines, that in the time of King Richard the second grewe in great plenty within the little parke, as also of the making of the wine it selfe, whereof some part was spent in the kings house, and some parte solde to his profite, the tythes where- of were paie to the Abbot of Waltham, then parson both of the olde and newe Winton.

ny to haue bene there. But true it is, I haue read in the Tower of London, a patent, graunted by Edward the fourth, in the two and twentieth yere of his raigne, to one Thomas Crabbe Esquire, to be admitted one of the almes knights at Windsor. Quene Elizabeth hath also much enlarged with buildings the said Castle. All which, whether you regarde the wholefomenesse of the ayre, and beaultie of the soyle, or the beauty, strength, and situation of the place, or the pleasant pastime arising out of the forest, chase, and soveretene parkes that wayte vpon it, or the good neighbourhode of the rich Riuer of Thames that runneth by it, I haue thought it good to set downe thus much.

This Henry the first also builded the manor of Woodstocke, with the park, which he walled with stone seven miles compasse, bestroyng for the same, diuers villages, churches, and chappels. This is the first park that euer was in England; he placed there, besides great store of oare, diuers strange beastes to be kept and nourished, such as were brought or sent to him from farre countries, as Lyons, Leopards, Linces, Porcupines, &c. By his example, Henry Carle of Warwicke, made his park of Madgenoke, nere unto Warwicke, since called the old park. He had issue by Maule his first wife, a sonne named William, that was drowned in the sea, and a daughter named Maule, whom with her sonne he appointed to inherite the Crowne and Reialme. He had also issue by his concubines, a sonne named Richard, and a daughter named Mary, which were both drowned with their brother William, Robert fitz Roy, whom he made Carle of Gloucester, Reginald after ward made Carle of Cornewall, in the fift yere of the raigne of king Stephen, a daughter married to Alexander king of Scots, and other.

Stephen Carle of Boston, and of Boloigne, sonne to the Carle of Bloys, and Adela, William Conquerours daughter, and nephew to king Henry the first, claymed the kingdome in the month of December, Anno 1135.

He coming into England, was repulled by them of Dover, shut out by them of Canterbury, but receiued of the Londoners, and peers of the land, admitted king, and crowned at Westminster on S. Stephens day, by William Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry by shop of Winchester, and Roger bishop of Salisburie.

This was a noble man and hardy, of passing comely fauour and personage, he excelled in martiall policie, gentleness and liberality toward all men, especially in the beginning: and although he had continuall war, yet did he neuer burden his commons with exactions: but vniuersally, and contrarie to his oath made to Mawde the Emperesse, daughter to king Henry, he took on him the crowne of England.

A fire

A fire kindled in the house of one Ailward nere unto London stone, consumed Eastward to Aldgate, and Westward to S. Erkenwalds chyrche in Pauls church. The Annales of Bermondsey, say, that London brdge was also at that time burned: which might well be, for then, and long before, there was a brdge of timber, as before I haue touched. And further, to confirme the same, I finde in the Annales of Bermondsey, that in anno Christi 1122. the 22. yere of king Henry the first Thomas Arderne gaue to the monks of Bermondsey the church of S. George in Southwarke, &c. with five shillings rent by the yere out of the land of London brdge.

Flemings entered into Denonshire, and besieged the Castle of Excester a long time, which Baldwin de Reduers held against them, but at length when they with in the Castle wanted necessary things to liue by, they compounded. Baldwin with his wife and children are disherited and expelled the land. From hence king Stephen went to the Isle of Wight, and took it from the said Baldwin de Reduers.

A battell was fought at Gohet, betwixt Normans and Welchmen, where a hundred and sixtie persons on both sides were slaine, whose bodies lay in the fieldes, and were horribly tose and deuoured of wolues.

After this were made great eruptions by the Welchmen, who destroyed churches, towne, castles, corne, cattell, newe men, women, and children, rich and poore, or solde them in foraine countries.

In October a sore battell was fought at Cardigan, in the which, such slaughter of men was made, (that the men except which were lede awaie captiue,) were of women taken and led away, that there remained to the tenth a thousand, their husbandes with their small children partly drowned, partly bznt, partly slaine, so that the brdge being broken ouer the riuer of Tude, there was a brdge made of mens bodies and boxes drowned.

In March king Stephen passed the Sea to subdue Normandie, where hee took manie Citiees and strong Castles, and made peace with the King of France.

The third of June Saint Andrewes in Rochester was bznt, with all the Cite, and the bishops and monkes skalles in the church. And on the fourth day of June S. Peters the Archbishopps Sea in Worke, S. Maries without the walles, and an Hospitall which the Archbishop Thurstone had builded, with 39. other Churches: also the Trinitie church in the suburbs of the same Cite, within a small time after were bznt. Also S. Peters Church at Wasse, and all the Cite, the 27. day of June was bznt. And the same moneth the Cite of Acogete was consumed with fire.

England began to fall into great troubles, which caused king Stephen to returne out of Normandy before he had finished his businesse there, so that he came ouer into England in the moneth of December.

King Stephen besieged Bedford and tooke it, then he went with a strong power into Northumberland, where he staid not long, but went to Gloucester, where the citizens receiued him with great reioycing. Miles the kings counsaile brought him into the kings pallace there, where all the citizens were to him swoyne. From thence he went to Hereford, because that he heard the Castle was holden against him: and on Whitsunday hee late crowned in the church of Hereford. When they that kept the Castle sawe the kings power to increase, they yielded themselves. The king took also the Castle of Webbhelegge, which Geoffrey Talbot had helde against him.

The same date that the king departed out of Hereford, all beyond the river of Wille was bzent by the said Geoffrey.

The king returned to Wroth, where he took Roger the bishop of Sarum, with the bishop of Lincoln, and his sonne Roger: the bishop of Ely escaping, went to the castle of Eves, and kept it against the king: but at length it was deliuered.

The same time Robert Earle of Gloucester renounced his allegiance to King Stephen, fortified Bristowe, and other castles. Also Miles the kings constable revolted.

Wherefore the king besieged the castle of Bristow, but at length being tired, he turned to other of the earles castles, and seeing his enemies still increasing, hee called out of Flaunders men of warre with William de Ypres their leader, whose counsell he chiefly followed.

The same yere Roger bishop of Salisbury, a great builder of Castles and houses, departed this life. There was found in his coffers fourtie thousand marks of Silver, besides much golde, and diuers iewels that came to the kings hand, so that he had gathered treasure, but wist not for whom.

Loceline a knight of Lincolnshire, hailing to his son one Gilbert, whome for some imperfection of his limbs, he thought vnnuete for the world, made him a Priest, gaue him a benefice in a towne of his owne in Lincolnshire called Hemperingham. This man was author of a religious order, which were called Gilbertines, and began in the reigne of K. Stephen, he inclosed within one house both men and women, but secured them by such high walls, that the one neither saw, nor heard the other. His order in his life time increased to r. houses, containing in all to the number of 700. brethren, and 1500. sisters.

The Nobles sent for Mawd the Emperesse, promising her the poss. Mon of the realme according to their othe made to her. In the meane time, David king of Scots, promising to reconer the crown of England for the Emperesse Mawd his nece, in most cruell wise invaded Northumberland, where, by Thurstone Archbishop of Yorke, the Stambert being set by at Aluerston, the Scots had an overthrow at Conton, more then foure miles Northwest from Aluerston, and were slaine about ten thousand, on the 22. day of August.

In the month of Iuly Robert Earle of Gloucester returned into England with his sister the Emperesse, and a great army, which arrived at Portsmouth. The Emperesse was receiued into Arundell castle by Adelze late wife to King Henry, as then wife or concubine to William Earle of Arundel.

Earle Robert went to Wallingforde, and thence to Gloucester, and raised those countries.

The king helde his siege before Marleborough, but aduertised of the Emperesse arrival, he halst towards Arundel, where being by false speech pacified, he commanded his brother Bishop of Winchester to bring the Emperesse unto Bristow, and he himselfe followed earle Robert with his armie. The Emperesse staid at Bristow till October, and then went to Gloucester, her coming thither being knowne, Miles the high Constable, and manie other Nobles took part with her against King Stephen.

Earle Robert

The king besieged Wallingford castle, but posted not, and therefore raising a Towre of wood before it, stuffed it with men of war, and went to win the castle of Spalmeburie.

The army of earle Robert won the citie of Worcester, bzent the most part of it, and laden with the spoile, departed thence.

The Shrike of that citie, in reuenge hereof, destroyed the towne of Sudley, and with the spoile thereof returned to Worcester.

After this the king with a great armie, came from Wroth to Worcester, where he gaue the honour of high Constableshippe (being taken from Miles of Gloucester) unto William the sonne of Walter Beauchampe, Shrike of Worcester, and then returned to Wroth, and so to Salisbury.

The king went to Reding, and after with his armie towards Ely, but the Bishop fled to Gloucester, to earle Robert, and the king won the castle of Ely, and spoiled Algellus the bishop (who was fled to the Emperesse) of all that to him appertained, and then returned.

Robert earle of Gloucester with a great power invaded the towne of Nottingham and spoiled it: the Townes men were taken, slaine, or bzent in the Churches whereunto they fledde. One of them more rich then the others was taken and led to his owne house by his takers, to shewe them where his treasure laie: hee bringing them into a lowe Sellar, whilst they were busie to breake open lockes and coffers, hee conuicted himselfe awaie, and shutting the dores after him, set fire on the house: and so the theues to the number of thirtie, were bzent, and by reason of this fire all the Towne was set on fire, and bzent.

King Stephen besieged Lincoln against Ranulph Earle of Chester, but Robert Earle of Gloucester, came with a great power, and rescued the same, chased the kings army, and took him prisoner on Candlemas day: first he was had to Gloucester, and after to Bristow, and there committed to prison, and put in prions.

The Emperesse reioicing at this her good hap, departed from Gloucester, and came to Cicester, with Bishoppes, Barons, and other in great number, from thence she went to Winchester, where met her Lords spiritual and tempozall in great number, the city with the Towre and Crowne of the realme was deliuered into her hands.

The Bishop of Winchester, that was K. Stephens brother, accursed all that stood against the Emperesse, and blessed those that took her part. From thence she departed to Wilton, where the archbishop of Cantebury came and saluted her. When Easter was past, she went to Reding, where she was receiued with all the honour that might be: thence she went to Wroth, where the castle was deliuered unto her by Robert de Olly: then went she to S. received with all honour. Here the citizens of London came and yielded the citie to her, whereupon she went to London, and so to Westminster, where she being received with procession, remained certayne daies, taking order for the state of the realme, and there she gaue the Bishopricke of London to Robert de Sigello a Monk of Reding.

King Stephens wife, and many Barres of the realme, made suite to the Emperesse to haue the king restored to libertie, and not to the kingdome, promising to perswade with him to become a Monk, but she would not heare. The Bishop of Winchester requested her to giue vnto Eustace his nephew, King Stephens son, his fathers Cardedome, but it would not be. The citizens of London required her to restore King Edwards lawes, but she being puffed vp with pride, would not grant their request, whereupon they conspired to take her prisoner: but she advertised hereof, fledde with shame, leaving behinde her all her furniture of householde and apparel.

Henry Bishop of Winchester, casting which way to deliuer his brother, perswaded the Londoners to aide him. The Emperesse got her to Oxford, and from thence to Gloucester, and thence with her assured friend Miles again to Oxford: because the trusted most in him, she to do him honor, gaue him the Cardedome of Hereford. And now having got a great army, about Lammas went againe to Winchester, and lodged in the Castle there. The Bishop abashed of her sodaine coming, departed out at one Gate, as she came in at another. He getting a great army, with the helpe of the Londoners besieged the citie, and the second of August committed the Citie to the fire, with the which, the Minnie, and houses of office, with more then twenty churches (some wighte fortie) and a great part of the city, with the monastery of S. Gimbald, and the houses there to belonging, were brought to ashes.

About the exaltation of the Crosse, the Emperesse being wearied of long siege, got her to horse backe with her brother Reginald earle of Cornwall, and many other. Eric Robert followed with a great number of lords and knights, but the bishops men setting on them, slew and toke a great number.

The Emperesse fled to the castle of Lutetshall heauie and almost dead for feare: from thence she was brought to the Castle of Kiers, and from thence to Gloucester, bound in a horse-litter like a dead carcasse.

Eric Robert being pursued, was taken at Stobbyslodge with Eric Waren, & many other, and presented to the queene, as then newly entred into Winchester.

Carle Robert was deliuered to William de Ypres, who put him in prison in the castle of Rochester.

Miles erle of Hereford hardly escaped, and came to Gloucester almost naked.

The bishops men burnt the monastery of Runnes at Marwel, &c. the books and ornaments of the Runnes were taken and borne away, and men staine euery before the Altar. These things thus done, the bishops wrath was somewhat appeased, but his couetousnesse increased, so that being prompted thereto by the Prior of the newe monasterie in Winchester lately burnt, he toke off of the Crosse that was burnt five hundred pounds of silver, & thirtie marks in golde, three crownes, with as manie seales of fine Arabike golde, set with precious precious stones: all this he laide vp in his owne treasure.

King Stephen and Carle Robert being straitly kept, at length through mediation of friends, a peace was concluded, that they should bee deliuered, the king to his kingdome, and the Carle to his libertie.

Geffrey Mandeuille fortified the Tower of London: and Robert Bishop of London was taken at Fulham by Geffrey Mandeuille.

Geffrey bishop of Durham deceased, when he had late bishop of Durham 13 yeeres: he builded the Castle of Aluerton, which he gaue to his nephew William, whom he toynd in marriage with the Carles neere of Albemarle.

The king and earle being set at libertie, did not onely reuue, but multiplie their malice: the king repayed his power and expences, the Carle went ouer the Sea to Geffrey Carle of Anlow, whome he found occupied in warres against certaine of his subjects of Anlow, so that he could not come into England with him: whereupon he taking Henry, eldest sonne to Geffrey Carle of Anlow, and Mawd the Emperesse, with certaine chosen men of armes, returned into England.

King Stephen hearing that earle Robert was gone out of the realme, and the Emperesse to lie at Oxford, with a great power came and besieged her two moneths space.

Carle Robert with Henry sonne to the Emperesse, and other his complices, landed at Warham, where he besieged the castle, which was defended by Hubert de Lucie, who at length yielded the same. In the meane time, the Emperesse seeing that she was void of all helpe, with a womanish subtilty deceiued the kings scout-watch, cloathing her selfe and her company, fine in number, all in white, and vpon a night went ouer the Thames on foote, which was then hard frozen, and white with snow: that night she went to Wallingford, and the Castle of Oxford was yielded to the king. After the winning of Warham castle, Robert went to visit his sister the Emperesse, who was not a little ioyfull to see him and her young son Henry, which Henry remained at Wiltow for the space of foure yeeres, and there was brought vp in learning.

King Stephen after the robbing of many churches, burning and robbing of towns and villages by the hands of the Fleming soldiers, he and his brother Henry bishop of Winchester, builded a castle of the Runny at Wiltow, to represse the incursions of them of Salisbury. Carle Robert the first of July fell suddenly vpon them in Wiltow, and set the towne on fire. The king with the bishop fled with shame, the earles men toke the kings people, and sacht his plate and other things: there were taken of the kings men berie many, and among other, William Martell seldner to King Stephen, who was sent to Wallingford, there to be kept prisoner. William de S. Barbara was made bishop of Warham.

Miles earle of Hereford died and his eldest son Roger succeeded him.

William of Ypres founded Worley Abbey in Kent.

King Stephen toke Geffrey Mandeuille Earle of Essex, at Saint Albons: which Geffrey could not be set at libertie till he had deliuered the Tower of London, with the Castles of Malden and Plyer. When the Carle was thus King Stephen entered Lincoln, and there wore his Crowne, after whose departure from thence, the earle of Chesler came to recover the town, but could not bring his purpose to passe, the citizens shewed such defence. The Empresse being wearied with the discord of the English nation, went ouer into Normandy, choosing rather to sit vnder the defence of her husband in peace, then to suffer to mainte displeasures in England. King Stephen banished Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, and the archbishop interdicted al the land that was subiect to the kings dominions, till peace betwene them was made.

In the moneth of May, Henry the Empresse sonne, with a great companie of chosen men of armes and other came into England, vnto whome foytwithy manie Castels and strong holdes were deliuered, and hee made a newe coine, which was called the Dukes coine, and not onlie he, but also al the potentates of the Realme, as well byshops, as earles and barons, had each one his owne coine: but afterward the duke did inhibitte the most part of these coines. The Duke taking with him Ranulph earle of Chesler, Roger earle of Hereford, and diuers other, he went to David king Scottes, of whome he was so fullie recei-ued, & made knight. When king Stephen heard, that David king of Scots, with his strength, and Henry son to the Empresse with his westerne Lordes, were together at Carlisle, he came to Wyke with a great army, for feare they should attempt anie thing against that Citie, and so laie there the moneth of August.

at length the one partie as well as the other departed: but Eustacius the kinges son being made knight, exercised many cruelties in the lands of the earles, that took part with Henry the Empresse sonne.

Henry the Empresse son, being made knight, sailed into Normandy. All England was full of trouble and noise of war, set forth to fire and rapine, through discord betwixt king Stephen, and certain earles that took part with Henry the son of the Empresse.

Robert earle Ferrers, founded the Abbey of Spertuall.

Geffrey Plantagenet earle of Anslow, and duke of Normandie deceased, and left his son Henry to be his heire.

A divorcement was made betwene Lewis king of France, and Elianor his Quene, because they were a kin in the 4. degree. Spozoner, she was defamed of adultery with an Infidell, &c.

King Stephen besieged the Castell of Worcester, which hee could not winne the last yere, and then he sawe note also that hee could not obtaine his purpose, he builded two Castelles before the same, stocking them with garrisons, and went from thence, but by counsell of Robert Earle of Leicester, the kinges castelles were overthrowne, and the castell besieged, deliuered from danger.

Henry Duke of Normandie, took to wife Elianor, sole daughter and heire to William Duke of Aquitaine, shee was first married to Lewes, the seventh of France, by whome shee had two daughters, whereof, Mary the eldest, was married to Henry the Large, earle of Champagne: Ales the second, to Theobald, earle of Bloys. Lewes king of France, was divorced from Elianor, and yet was not content with this second marriage, because hee was loath, that anie other should beget sonnes by her, whereby his daughters might bee disherited.

King Stephen called a Parliament at London, declaring to Theobald archbishop of Canterbury, and the other byshops, howe he would utterly disherite Henry duke of Normandie, and confirme his owne sonne Eustace to be his successor by crowning him king: but the Pope had sent a commandement to the Archbishoppe, prohibiting him to crowne king Stephens sonne, because his father had usurped the kingdome, contrarie to his Othe. Which thing (as was thought) was brought to passe by the subtiltie policy of Thomas Becker, a Chap-laine borne in London.

King Stephen and his sonne, being not a little offended at the rebell, caused the byshops with their Diuites to be closed vp in an house, threatening with terrors to extort of them, that which with prayer or pice they could not obtaine. The Archbishoppe stilled standing in his purpose, some of the Byshops through feare went from him, at length the archbishop by a marvellous hap, escaping, got ouer the Thames, and so to Dover: and thence transporting over the seas, escaped the threats of the king and his son, and depyrted his sonne of his court to honour.

Elian or wife to duke Henry dyd beare him a son named William, which was a name proper to the dukes of Aquitaine and Anjou.

The duke besieged Stamford Castell, and want it, and then he went to Nottingham and thence to that. The king in the meane time besieged Ipswich and thence to that. At length, through the great labor of the archbyschop of Canterbury, and the other bishops, the king commanded the nobles to meet at Winchester, where the duke being received with great soie, the king, in sight of all men adopted him his sonne, and confirmed to him the principality of all England. The duke received him in place of a father, granting to him all the duties of his life to enioie the name and seate of the kings preheminance.

William Archbyschop of Poike, about the feast of Pentecoste, died at Poike of poison, as some supposed, and was buried in his Cathedral Church of Saint Peter.

Duke Henry in the Dawes of the Epiphany, came together with the king to Oxford, where the earles and barons by the kinges commandement swore fealtie to duke Henry, leaving the kings honors so long as he lived. This assurance being made, they departed asunder, but shortly after they met againe at Dunstable, there to intreat of the state and peace of the kingdom.

Shortly after duke Henry with King Stephen and certaine Lords of England came to Canterbury, and from thence to Dover, where they had communicanication with Theodrike Erie of Flanders, and the countesse the dukes Aunt. When the king and the Duke had dismissed the Erie of Flanders, and were turning towards Canterbury, the daughter of the Duke was prepared by a conspiracie of the Flemings which envied both the Duke and peace: but behold, sodainly the kings yonger son William priue with the conspirators, on Barham Downe fell off his horse, and breaking his legges, he gathered all the company about him in sorow. The Duke in the meane time understanding the appointed treasons got him to Canterbury, and so escaped his enemies hands: from thence by Rochester and London, he came to the sea, and passed over into Normandie.

Hugo de Puteaco, treasurer of Poike and Archdeacon of Winchester, was made bishop of Durham.

In October the king met the Erie of Flanders againe at Dover, and talked with him.

After the earle was dismissed, the king was taken with a sodaine paine of the Illiack passion, and with an olde disease of running of the Emures, and there in the house of the Monkies died the five and twentieth of October, when he had reigned eightene yeres, tenne moneths, and odde daies. He founded the Abbeies of Cogshall in Essex, of Furnelle in Lancashire, and Feversham in Kent, where his bodie was buried for the time, but since the suppression of that house, for the lead that inclosed his bodie, the same bodie was throwne into the next water. Hee founded an house for Nunnes at Carew, and an house of Nunnes at Higham, foure miles from Chawesend. He also founded an Hospitall by the West gate of Poike, whereunto he gave all the oates that had bene used to be gathered betwixt the river of Trent and Scotland, for feeding of the kinges houndes, which was foure and twentie sheaves of cuerie plowland by yere, he appointed the Deane and Chanons of S. Matild his wife founded the hospitall of Saint Katherine by the Tower of London, in a portion of land, which pertained to the Priory of the holy Trinity in London, but then purchased with the Will, by exchange of five poundes the yere land out of the kings manors of Wyaking. He had issue first a bastard son named William Erie of Warren, then Mathew earle of Beame, Mary, first Abbess, and then a Countesse, and Eustace that died before his father, as also Baldwin his sonne, and Matild his daughter, wife to the Erie of Millent, which two last named were buried in the Priory of the holy Trinitie in London. ## King Henry the second.

Henry the second, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet and Maud the Empress, at the age of twenty three years, beganne his raigne ouer this Realme of England, the five and twentieth date of October, in the yere of our Lozbe 1154. hee was crowned at Westminster the seventeenth date of December, by Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury: he was somewhat red of face, short of body, and the rest with fat: of spech reasonable, well learned, noble in chivalrie, and fortunate in battell, wise in counsell, one that loved peace, liberall to strangers, but hard to his familiars: unstedfast of promise, given to pleasure, and a webloke breaker: by his manhood and pollicie the crowne of England was much augmented, with the annexing of Scotland, Ireland, the Isles of Brytaine, Poytiers, Guyen, and other provinces of France.

Thomas Becket Archbishop of Canterbury, was made the kings Chancellor, and was now in such favour, that he was accounted the kings governor, for he was chiefly directed by him in all things.

He held his Christmas at Bermondsey, where having conference with his nobles, for the state of the kingdom, hee promised to banish all strangers. Whereupon William of Pyres, and all the Flemings that had flockt into England, fearing the indignation of the new king, departed the land. And the castles that had bene builded to pill the rich, and spoile the poore, were by the kings commandement, and counsell of his Chancellor throwne downe. The king visiting the cite of Poole, in that countrey received divers castles into his hands, namely amongst other he toke the Castle of Scarborough, from William earle of Albemarle.

King Henry went over into Normandie, to whom when he was at Roane, came Toriaus earle of Flanders with his wife the kings aunt, that he might reconcile unto him Geoffrey his brother, which was then come thither also for that purpose: but Geoffrey not accepting the pointes offered by the king, they departed without any agreement, Geoffrey expelling Hoel out of Brytaine, toke the cite of Paunty, by yielding of the citizens. And king Henry afterwards ward with long siege toke the Castles of Spireable, and Chinon, which Geoffrey his brother had helde, whereupon there was a peace concluded betwixt them, that the king should give to Geoffrey, euerie yere a thousand pound of English money, and two thousand pound of Angeioin: and thereupon the third Castle called Loudune was yielded to the king, and so was the dissention appeased, and king Henry obtained homage, and pledges of all Aquitaine, and Gascoigne, and prepared to returne towards England.

This yere Quene Elianor brought forth a daughter named Mauid. And the same yere died William the kings eldest sonne, and was buried at Reading.

King Henry coyned new money, which onely was currant in this Realme, An. reg. 3. and all other coines were forbidden.

Conon Earle of Richmond coming out of England into Brytaine, toke the cite of Medonens, expelling Eudo, which Conon afterward was received as Duke ouer almost all Brytaine.

King Henry having overcome his brother Geoffrey returned into England, then with an army went against the Welshmen, where he felld their wodes, fortified the castle of Rudland, and recovered many strong holdes. He reedified the castle of Wasingtoirke, &c. but he lost many of his men, for Henry of Essex that bare the kings standard, as he was assailed amongst his enemies, let fall the standard to the ground, which encouraged the Welshmen in such sort, that the king being sore distressed, had much ado to saue himselfe, and was faine to fle: of whose part, Eustace sir John, and Robert Curcis, two woorthy knights, with diuers other noble men and gentlemen were slaine. After that Owen ramped and intrenched himselfe at Bryantine, and furnished with the kings men daily. And in the meane while that the king was fortifying the Castle of Rudland, his nauy which was guided by Madoc ap Meridich prince of Powesse, anchored in Span of Anglesey, and there spoiled two Churches, and part of the Isle, but as they returned, were all slaine. In the meane time there was a prate concluded betwixt the king and the prince.

Quene Elianor brought forth a son named Richard, at Wyford in the kings pallace there, which pallace was since made a church of white friers.

On Christmas day, king Henry wore his Crowne at Worcester, where, after celebration of diuine seruice, he set his Crowne upon the Altar, and neuer wore it after.

King Henry went into France, and at Paris was ioyfully received of king Lewis, who required to haue his daughter Margaret to be married to his sonne Henry, which suite he obtained, and king Henry obtained, that as Seneschall to the French king hee might enter into Brytaine, and call afoze him such as made waite one against another, to appeale them, whereby he brought the cite of Paunty to his dominion.

An earthquake happened in many places through England: and the river of Thames was dyed dy, that at London men might walk ouer the same dryshod.

King Henry returned from Holouise, and Henry the king of England's son, not 7. yeeres olde, married Margarett the french kings daughter, that was not yet 3. yeeres olde.

In this meane time the king, although he were much troubled with wars, yet was he not unmindefull of Ireland. For directing his messengers to Rome with the letters of abuses, gotten at the counsell of Cassels, he also obtained by their saile, of Pope Adrian (an Englishman by birth) a priuiledge, both to haue the dominion of the Irish people, with his authoritie and consent, and also to instruct them in the rudiments of faith and ecclesiasticall rites, after the order of the church of England. Which priuiledge, being sent ouer into Ireland, by Nicholas of Walsingham, then Bishop of Ely, and afterward Abbot, and also by William Fitz Adelme, immediately there was a synode of Bishops assembled at Waterford, wherein it was read in publicke audience, with generall consent of all, by Iohn Bishop of Salisbury, afterward Bishop of Charters, who was sent to Rome for that purpose, and by him the foresaide Pope Adrian sent a ring of golde to the king of England in token of the inuestiture, which was incontinently laide by with the priuiledge in the arches of Winchester. Wherefore, I thought it not superfluous to set downe here the tenore of that priuiledge, but first a word of two of Pope Adrian, because I haue saide, he was an English man, his name was Nicholas Breake-speare, borne at Langley in the Countie of Hertford, sonne to Robert a younger brother of the house of Breake-speares, which Robert after the death of his wife, professed himselfe a Monk of S. Albons, leaving his son to prouide for himselfe. This young man passed into France, was thorne a Monk, and after chosen Abbot, went to Rome, was consecrated Bishop of Alba, made Cardinall, sent Legate to the Spanyards, where he reduced that nation from Paganisme to christianitie, and after returned to Rome, when Anastasius was dead, he was chosen Pope, by the name of Adrian the fourth, and now followeth the priuiledge.

Adrian Bishop, servant of the servants of God, to his dere sonne, the most excellent king of England, health and Apostolike Benediction, your highnes resolution in the lawfull, and fruitfull spredding abroad your glorious name on earth, and in obtaining the reward of eternal felicitie in heauen, while you determine determine like a Catholike Prince to enlarge the boundes and limits of the church, to declare to the vblearned and rude people, the truth of the Christian faith, and to rote out of our Loyds ground the plants of wickednesse; and towards the performance thereof, you require the counsell and fauour of the Apostolike seate: In which action, with how much the more graue counsell, and deeper consideration, you doe procede, so much the more fortunate successe therein (God assisting you) we nothing doubt you shall haue, for that alwaies they are wont to attaine to a good and happy ende, which take their beginning from the zeale of faith, and loue of true religion. For Ireland, and all other Islands, to the which Christ the Sonne of iustice hath giuen light, and which haue receiued the instructions of the Christian faith, there is no doubt but they doe appertaine and belong to the right of Saint Peter and the holy church of Rome, which also your excellencie acknowledgeth: wherefore how much the more plentifully we do seate in them the faithfull plant, and graffe the bad acceptable to God, so much the more doe we see that shall bee more straitly required of vs in our inward thoughts: You haue signified to vs (most dere son in Christ) that you will enter into the Ile of Ireland to subdue that people vnto lawes, and that there you will enterprize the plantes of vices, and that you will paie a yearly pension of one penny for euerie house there to S. Peter, and that you will preferue the rightes of the churches there, whole and inuioleat. And we following with a great fauour your godly and laudable desire, doe gratefully accept, and willingly consent that you do enter into that Island to enlarge the boundes of the Church, to restrain the course of wickednes, to correct manners, to plant vertue, and augment the Christian religion, and that you doe put in execution those things that shall appertaine to the honour of God and saluation of that land, and the people there shall receiue you honourably, and as their Lord shall reuerence you, the churches right remaining sound, and no way infringed, and alwaies reseruing to S. Peter, and the holy church of Rome, the yearly pension of euerie house there. If therefore you bring that to passe, which in your mind you haue conceived, in order to informe that nation in good manners, and couet as well by your selfe as by others to instruct such as you perceiue capable in this faith, in this word, and in this life, that the church there may be adorne, the religion of the Christian faith may be there planted, and may there rest, and that those things that pertaine to the honour of God and saluation of soules be so ordered and disposed of, that of God you may receiue the full measure of euermouring reward, and in earth obtaine a glorious name for euer.

There came into England 30. Germans, as wel men as women, who called themselves Publicans: their head and ruler named Gerardus, was some what learned, the residue verie rude. They denied matrimonie, and the sacraments of baptisme, and the Lords supper, with other articles. They being apprehended, the king caused a counsell to be called at Oxford, where the said Gerard answered for all his fellows, who being pressed with Scriptures, answered concerning their faith, as they had bin taught, and would not dispute thereof. After they could by no meanes be brought from their errors, the bishops gaue sentence against them, and the king commanded that they shoulde be marked marked with an hole pzon in the forehead, and whipped, and that no man shoulde succour them with house, come or other wise: they toke thei punishment gladly, their captaine going before them, singing, Blessed are ye when men do hate you: they were marked in the forehead, and their captaine both in the forehead and the shinne. and then the king sailed into England, but manie of his company were brownded by the waite.

Robert Fitz Stephen first of all Englishmen after the conquest entered Ire. land the first day of May, with 390. men, and there took Waterford in the behalfe of Deruntius.

King Henry caused his sonne Henry bozne at London to be crowned by the hands of Roger Archbysshop of Dorke, as he thought to the great quietnesse of himselfe and his realme, but it proued farre otherwise: the young king reuelled the fealties of the earles and barons.

Thomas archbysshop of Canterbury, by the mediation of Pope Alexander, and Leives the king of France, was restored to his see of Canterbury, and returned from exile.

In the moneth of September, Richard earle of Chepstow, surnamed Strongbow, sailed into Ireland with 1200. men of war, and by force took Waterford and Dublin, and married Eue, Deruntius daughter.

Thomas Becker Archbysshop of Canterbury, in his church at Canterbury, the 28. of December was slaine by William Tracy, baron of Bryaines and Dorseton, Reginold fitz Vise, Hugh Monilt, and Richard Briton knight.

There was sene at Saint Olythes in Caster a Dragon of a marvellous bignesse, which by mouing burned houses.

King Henry returned from beyond the seas, and landed at Portsmouth in the moneth of August.

King Henry hauing caused Richard earle of Chepstow to giue into his hands all the land which he had conquered in that realme, took ship at Penbroke, and sailed thither, where the king of Conach, Deruntius king of Dorke, Morice king of speche, the king of Wziel, Duuenald king of Mery, Duuenald king of Limerike, Machachelin, Ophelon, Machaleny, Othnerchely, Gilmehelmach, Ocadecie, Ocaruell, with other princes, and the bishops, submitting theiues and thei to the king of England and his successors, builded for him a greate pallace at Dublin, where he held his Christmas.

The church of Roswich, with the houses thereto belonging was burnt, and the Spokes were disperkled.

The king returned into England on Mondale in Easter weeke, and about the ascension tide sayled into Normandie.

At Andouer a Priest praying before the Altare, was stricken with thunder and slaine.

Likewise one Larke and his brother were burnt to death with the lightning. King Henry married the eldest daughter of Hubert Earle of Sposton, unto his son John surnamed Without-land.

He also made Mary the sister of Thomas Becker Abbess of Berking.

Henry the younger rebelling in Normandie against king Henry his father, manie Cardes and Barons fledde over to him, whereby divers strong battels were fought, as well in England as in Normandie, Poytow, Cuyen and Byspaine.

There toke part against the father, Lewes king of France, William king of Scots, Henry, Geoffrey, and John his sons, Robert Earle of Leicester, Hugh of Chester, and others.

Robert Earle of Leicester with thre thousand Flemings comming into England, arrived at Walton, and after were received by Earle Hugh into Framlingham Castle. They burnt the castle of Wagoneth, the cite of Roywich, &c. but by Richard de Lucy the kings Justice, both hee, his wife, and as manie Normans and Frenchmen as were with him were taken, but the Flemings were all slaine, or drowned. This battell was fought without the Towne of Saint Edmundsburie, nere to a place called Saint Spartins of Farnham.

William king of Scots with many Flemings entering into England, won the Castles of Appleby, Wough, and Wydehow.

King Henry the elder, returning into Englande, in short time subdued his Rebels. The cite of Leicester by his commandement was burnt, the walles and Castle razed, and the inhabitants sparkled into other cities. Robert de Stoteville, Radulph de Mandeville, Barnard Baylile, of whome Barnards Castle toke the name, and William de Vescy came to Shrewcastle, and after toke king William prisoner, and sent him to London, from whence king Henry toke him and the Earle of Leicester with him into Normandie, and there imprisoned them at Roane, where king William compounded for his ranfome, and after was delivered at Poyke for 4000. pound. The nobles of Scotland came no nearer than Pemblis in Scotland to mate with their king, therefore he toke with him many of the younger sonnes of noble men in Englande that bare him good will, and gave them landes in Scotland, which he toke from such as were Rebels to him there. The names of those Gentlemen that he toke with him, were Bayellol, Brewic, Souilly, Mowbrey, Saintclere, Hay, Giffard, Ramsey, Lanudell, Biscy, Berkeley, Wellegen, Boys, Montgomery, Valx, Colenille, Friser, Grame, Gurly, and divers other.

The last day of December, Christs Church in Canterbury was burnt, with certaine houses of Edifice in the court.

which when the king understood, he swore that he would be avenged on the Citizens: for it was then a common practise in the cite, that 7. hundred or more in a company of young and old, would make nightly invasions upon the houses of the wealthy, to the intent to robbe them, and if they found any man sleeping in the cite within the night, they would presently murder him, in so much, that when night was come, no man durst adventure to walke in the streets. When this had continued long, it fortuned that as a crew of young and wealthy Citizens assembling together in the night, assaulted a stone house of a certaine rich man, and breaking through the wall, the good man of that house having prepared himselfe with other in a corner, when he perceived one of the thieves named Andrew Buccinque to leade the way, with a burning brand in the one hand and a pottle of coales in the other, which he assayed to kindle with the brande, he selve upon him, and smote off his right hand, and then with a loud voice cried thieves, at the hearing whereof the thieves toke their flight, all saying he that had lost his hand, whome the good man in the next morning delivered to Richard de Lucy the kings Justice. This done upon warrant of his life, appeached his confederats, of whom many were taken, & manie were fled, but among the rest that were apprehended, a certaine Citizen of great countenance, credite, and wealth, surnamed John the olde, when hee could not acquite himselfe by the Watar dome, offered the king for his life 500. markes, but the king commanded that he should be hanged, which was done, and the cite became more quiet.

The kings of England both father and sonne did eate and drinke at one table, lay in one chamber, and went together to visite the Tombe of Thomas late Archbishop of Canterbury, accomplishing invokde the peace which they had promised.

The king caused to be razed and overthrowen the Castles of Huntingdon, Walton, Groby, Tutbury, Wy, and Tress, with many other, in reuenge of the harme the Lordes of them had done to him.

This yere, or rather in the yere 1173. after Rouse of Warwicke, the stone bridge ouer the river of Thamis at London, was began to be founded, in place where before had bin a bridge of timber, first buildd and long since repaired by a college of Priests, which colledge stood there now S. Maries ouries church standeth, in Southwarke. The king assisting this work of the bridge, a cardinal late Legate here, and Richard then Archbishop of Canterbury, gaue one thousand markes towards the same foundation. The course of the river for the time was turned another way about, by a trench cast for that purpose, beginning in the East about Rabyse, and ending in the West about Battersey.

This yere was compiled a booke of the orders and rules of the Chequer, now commonly called the Blace booke: the author whereof (as divers affirm) was Geraulius Tibericenis nephew to king Henry the second. In this booke is described the reason and cause of the first institution of the same court, wherby it was called Scaccarum, the names of the officers resident in the same, aswell on the higher side, called the Chequer, as on the lower called the Receipt, or treasurie, their places and duties incident to the same, their privileges and dignities, Rosamond the faire daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, Concubine to Henry the second (poisoned by M. Elianor as some thought) died at Woodstock, where H. Henry had made for her an house of a wonderful wondrous king, so that no man or woman might come to her, but if hee were instructed by the king, or such as were right secreete with him touching the matter. This house after some was named Labyrinth, or Dedalus worke, which was thought to be an house wrought like vnto a knotte in a garden, called a Maze, but it was commonlie

saide, that lastly the Duene came to her by a clewe of thredde, or silke, and so dealt with her, that she liued not long after, but when she was dead, she was buried at Godstow, in an house of Nunnes, beside Oxford with these verses vpon her tombe:

*Hic iacet in tumba, Rosa mundi, non rosa munda,

This being done, he went ouer into Normandie, at which time also Henry, duke of

Saronie,

Saronie, the kings sonne in law, was by the Emperour banished, and came into Normandie to the king, and brought with him the Dutchesse, and his two sonnes Henry and Otho, and the king receiuing them, did liberally finde them all things necessary for their maintenance. Is. Henry remaining in Normandie, made his Testament, giuing amongst other Legacies, much to houses of Religion. Also to the marriage of poore maides of England, he gaue 300. marks. King Henry the father kept his Christinas at Cane in Normandy, with his three sonnes, King Henry the younger, Richard Earle of Poictou, and Geffrey earle of Bysptaine: there was also Henry Duke of Saronie, with his wife and their children, the Archbishops of Canterbury and Bolaine, with other bishops, earles and barons in great number. Here would Is. Henry the father, that his sonne Henry the young king, should haue receiued homage of his brethren, Richard earle of Poictou, and Geffrey earle of Bysptaine, whereunto the earle of Bysptaine did not stay to graunt, but the Earle of Poictou bitterly refused to doe it, saying it was not conuenient so long as their father liued, to acknowledge any superiority to his brother: for as the fathers inheritance was due to the eldest sonne, so he had to claime the lands which belonged to his mother. This deniall much offended his brother the young king, whereupon Richard departed from the Court in great displeasure, and comming into Poictou, he began to fortifie his Castles, that he might be in a readinesse to stand at defence for his safegard, if his father or brethren shoulde come to pursue him. But not long after, king Henry the sonne, by counsell of his father followed him, being also encouraged therunto by the earles and Barons of Poictou, which for the sharpe and cruell gouernment of earle Richard hated him. And shortly after commeth their brother Geffrey with a great armie in aide of his brother the young king, in somuch that earle Richard not knowing how to thist the present danger, sent to his father for aide. Who being sorry to see such vnnaturall dealing amongst his sonnes, gathered an armie, and came forthward, and did so much, that all the three sonnes came to Angeres, and there swore to be obedient to their fathers will. Whereupon a day was appointed them to mete at Spyable. In the meane while, king Henry the sonne obtained licence of his father to goe vnto Limongs, vnder pretence that hee might there labour to reduce both his brother Geffrey, and the Barons of Guyen to quietnesse, but all was dissembling, so that when the father followed with an armie, and came to Lymongs in stead of receiuing him with honour, they shot at him, so y they pierced through his dypermost armor, &c. At length, when Is. which she had remained almost xii. yeeres.

Kochester, when hee had late xi. yeeres.

Mawde the Empress, mother to h. Henry the second deceased, shee founded the Abbey of Wyndeslay, and was buried at Reading, with this Epitaph.

*Ortu magna, viro maior, sed maxima pars,
Hic iacet Henrici filia, sponsa, parens.*

The daughter, spouse, and Parent eke, of Henry lyeth here, Great of parentage, higher by marriage, most high by childbirth deere.

King Henry kept his Christen at Danfront in Normandy, and shortly after, came to a communicatton with the king of France, at the which time hee toke a solemne oth, that he would relister the Ladie Alice, the king of Frances his sister (whome hee had yet in his custodie) unto his son Richard earle of Poyrtow in marriage.

Geffrey earle of Hytaine the kings son of Englnd. died at Paris, about the beginning of August, and was there buried. He left issue 2. daughters which hee had by Constance daughter to Conan earle of Brittain who also at the time of his death was great with child, and after brought forth a son named Arthur.

A great earthquake threw downe many buildinges, amongst the which the Cathedral Church of Lincolne was rent in peeces the 25. of April.

The Cathedral Church of Chichester, and all the whole citie was brent the 20. Chichester of October: king Henry gaue Constance, Countesse of Hyptain, mother of Arthur, to Ranulph earle of Chester to be his wife.

Here unto Wyf orde in Suffolke, certaine fishers of the sea toke in their nettes a fish having the shape of a man in all pointes, which fish was kept by Bartlemew de Glaunvile, Custos of the Castell of Wyf orde, in the same Castell, by the space of six monethes and more; for a wonder: he spake not a word.
All manner of meates he gladly did eate, but most graciously raw fish, after he had crushed out all the moisture. Whentimes he was brought to the Church, where hee shewed no tokens of adoration. At length when hee was not well loked to, he stale away to the sea, and neuer after appeared.

Saladine chiefe prince of the Saracenes won a great battell against the christians, and toke Guido king of Jerusalem with the Crosse that Christ died on, and all the christians were either slaine or taken. Where escaped among other, Theodoricus Agallas of the knights Templar, notwithstanding 230. of his brethren were beheaded, that had been taken prisoners: besides 40. that were slain.
The city of Jerusalem was taken, by composition euerie man to giue ten be-sants, every woman 5. every child 1. All the rest to the number of 14000. men and women became subiect to perpetuall bondage.

The kings of England and of France met betwixt Gisors and Tye, where they toke on them the Crosse, and diuers other with them. The king of England landing at Wynchelsea, hasted towards Portsmouth, where at Goding-ton, about eight or ten miles from Portsmouth he held a Parliament, about the voyage into the holie lande, where manie Articles concerning that voyage were concluded, and the whole Realme troubled with paying of tithes toward that voyage. The Christians were appointed to paie about thyscore mit r. thousand pounde, and the Jewes thyscore thousand, without any delay: but by means of a discorde that fell betwixt the two kings, that voyage was staied.

The Towne of Winclesley, with the Church of Saynt John there, was brent the twentieth of September.

The kings of England and of France, with Richard earle of Poyrtow, the Legate, and the archbishops of Canturbury, Roane, Ahenes, and Burges, met at Paris the ninth day of June. There Philip the French king required, that his sister which had bene kept in England two and twentie yeeres, might be restored unto earle Richard as his wife, and earle Richard desired the same, but king Henry denied this request, and so they departed dissunder, and got the m to armour. The French king, and earle Richard pursued the king of England so hard, that he was forced to yeld to all the requests, as wel of the French king, as of his sonne Richard. This was done at Gisors, and so departing came to Agat. When all matters were accorded, as is aforesaid, betwene the two kings of England and of France, the king of England required of the king of France to haue all their names deliuered him in writing, which had promi-

Richard canbr.

France, and earle Richard, which request was granted, and when the roble was presented unto him, he found his sonne John the first person that was named in the register, wherewith he was so sore troubled, and disquieted in his minde, that comming to Chiron; he felt such griefe hereof, that he cursed even the very day in which he was borne, and gave his sonnes Gods curse and his, the which he would never release, although he was admonished to do it by many Bishops, and religious persons. Whereupon being brought to such extremity as ye have heard, he was taken with a grievous sickness, which bringing him to bitter desperation of returning to health, he finally departed this life on the 6 day of July, in the yere 1189. and the 61. of his age, when he had reigned 34 yeres, 7. moneths lacking 11. daies, and was buried at Fonteneuward in a monastierie of Nunnes, which he had founded. He had also founded the Priories of Stanley, of S. Martin in Dover, and of Walsingham, he made of an olde Colledge of secular Chanons, an Abby of regular Chanons at Walsingham in Essex. He builded many Castles in England, and he beganne the stone bridge ouer the river of Thames at London. Here left in his treasure more then a hundred thousand markes.

He had issue by Elianor his wife, William that died young, Henry that was crowned king, and died before his father, Richard that reigned next after him, Geoffrey Duke of Brytaine, that died before him (but left issue Arthur and Elianor) and John that after the death of his brother Richard, took on him the kingdom, disheriting his nephewes Arthur and Elianor the true heires: daughters he had Matilde, married to the Duke of Saronie, Helene Quene of Castile, and Joane Quene of Sicilie.

This king, when he was carried forth to be buried, was first appareled in his princely robes, hauing his crowne on his head, gloves on his hands, and shoes on his feet, wrought with goide spurres on his hailes, a ring of gold on his finger, a scepter in his hand, and a sword by his side, and so was laide bencoured, hauing a pleasant countenance, which when it was told to his sonne Richard, hee came with all speed, to see him, and as soone as hee came nere him, the blood gushes out of the nose of the dead corpses in great plenty, even as if the spirit of the dead king had disdained, and abhorred the presence of him, who was thought to be the chiefe cause of his death, which thing caused the said Richard to weepe bitterly, and he caused his fathers bodie to be honourably buried at Fonteneuward as is afore said.

King Richard Cueur de Lion.

Richard the first borne at Orford, for his valiantnes surnamed Cueur de Lion, or with the lions heart, the third son of Henry the second, began his reigne the sixth day of July, in the yere of our Lord 1189. at the age of 35. yeres.

He was bigge of stature, with a merrie countenance. To his his souldiers sauourable: bountifull to his friends: to strangers a grienous enemy: hard to be pleased: desirous of waere: abhoyring idleness.

Elianor the olde Quene, mother to Duke Richard, who at the commencingment of her husband, had bene long kept in prison, was set at libertie. And then she with the Lordes of the Realme abode the kings coming at Winchester, where Geoffrey Ridel the proud Bishop of Ely fell sick, and departed this life in estate, leauing in his coffers great treasure, to wit, 3060. markes of silver, and 205. markes in gold, which was bestowed on the new kings coronation, for the bishops soule.

Duke Richard hauing receiued Adelisa, or Alice his wife, upon suspicion that she had bene dishonested whyles she was in his fathers custody, sent her home with her Dowrie, hauing concluded a marriage with Ladie Berengaria, daughter to Genus king of Navarre, he returned into England, and landed at Southampton the twelfth of August, and on the fourteenth was receiued into Winchester, with him also came his brother John, unto whom hee gaue the Earldomes of Devon, of Cornwall, Dorset, Summer set, Nottingham, Darby, and Lancaster, with the Castles of Carleborow, and Ludgerthall, with the forrest, and the appurtenances, the honours of Wallingford, Tichill, and Eye, to the value of foure thousand markes by yere. Hee also gaue him in marriage with Isabel his second wife, daughter to Robert Earle of Gloucester, the Earldome of Gloucester, although Baldwin Archbishoppe of Canterbury forbade the marriage, because they were Cousins in the third degree of consanguinitie. To Robert earle of Leicester, he restored all his lands, which had bene taken from him. He came to London, and on the thir of September, was crowned at Westminster, by the hands of Baldwin Archbishop of Canturburie.

He commanded that no Jewes nor women should be at his Coronation, for feare of enchantments which were wont to be practised: for breaking of which commandement, many Jewes were slain the same day. For the Jewes dwelling about London, and other partes of the Realme, being there assembled, meaning to honour the same Coronation with their presence, and to present to the king some honorable gifte, one of them was stricken by a Christian, who alleadged the kings commandement to keepe them backe, which some of the brauly people perceiuing, supposing it had bene the kings commandement, fell upon the Jewes with staves, bats, and stones, beate them to their houses, and after assailing their houses, set them on fire, and burnt them in their houses, or slew them at their coming out.

The Archbishoppe of Canturburie being sore offended with Earle John the kings brother, for taking to wife Isabel Countesse of Gloucester, his cousin in the thirde degree, wrote a threatening letter to the same John, commanding him not to touch the virgine, and to appeare at a peremptorie day before him to answer the matter. The 15. of December at Pimwell, in presence of the king, the Archbishop and prelates were elected, Geoffrey de Lucy to the sea of Winchester, Richard Archdeacon of Ely, the kings treasurer, to the sea of London, Hubert Walter to Salisbury, William Longhampe, the kings

Chancellor; to Ely, and Geoffrey the is. bastard brother, to the sea of Poike, is. Richard gaue, or rather solde, the Castles of Berwik and Hokerburgh to the Scottish is. for the summe of 5000 marks sterling: he also sold to Hugo de Pureau is. of Durham, his own prouince for a great piece of money, & cres- ted him carle of the same, and thyn said in game, I am a wonderous crafti- man, I haue made a new carle of an old bishop. He sold the Priory of Couen- trie, to Hugh Bishop of Chester, for iii. C. marks, which Hugh with a power of armed men, invaded the Priory, chased the Prio: away, brake the Monkes, lamed some, cast some into prison, and spoyling the other, dyone them allwaie, bzake the butches of the Church, bzent their Charters and pteiledges.

The king also fained to haue lost his signet, and made a new, and then cau- sed to be proclaimed, that who so euer would safely entoy those thinges which before time they had entrolled, should come to the new seale, whereby it came to passe, that many which could not finde him in England, went ouer sea to fine with him at his pleasure.

In this time were many robbers and out-lawes, among the which, Robert Hood, and little John, renowned theues, continued in woods, dispoyleing and robbing y gods of the rich. They killed none but such as would inuade them, or by resistance for their owne defence.

The saide Robert intertaineed an hundred tall men, and good archers, with such spoiles and thestes as he got, vpon whome foure hundred (were they ne- uer so strong,) durst not glue the onfet. He suffered no woman to be oppres- sed, violated, or otherwile molested: poze mens gods hee spared, about- dantie relieauing them with that, which by theste hee gotte from Abbeies & the houses of riche Carles: whome Maior blameth for his rapine and theft: but of all theues hee affirmeth him to bee the Prince, and the most gentle Thiefe.

King Richard betooke the guding of this lande to William Longshamp Bi- shop of Ely, Chancellor of England, and the foure and twentieth day of Fe- bruary, he toke his scrippe and staffe at Canterbury, and the 6. of March toke the Sea at Douer, and transported out.

The second of July the two kings of England and of France met at Tow- ers, and from thence set forward on their iourney towards Ierusalem.

The Towne of Hawling in Kent with the Hunnery was consumed with fire.

The Jewes in the townes of Norwiche, Saint Edmundebarie, Lincolne, Stamforde faire, and Linne, were robbed and spoyled. And at Poike to the number of 500. besides women and children, entred a tower of the castle, which the people assailing, the Jewes profered money to be in safety of their liues, but the Christians would not take it: whereupon their men of law said to them, it is better for vs to die for our lawe, then to fall into the hands of our enemies: and they all agreeing to that Counsell, cutte the throates of their wiues and children, and cast them ouer the walles on the Christians brads: the reli- due they locked vp in the Kinges lodging, and burnt both the house and thyn selues.

Geffrey Archbischoppe of Poike, returning from Rome, and now consecra- ted, arriued at Douer with his traine, whome Mathew de Clare by the com- mandment of the kinges Chancellor, entring with violence into the Church of Saint Martins, dyew from the Altar, and so caried him to prison. Baldwin Archbischoppe of Canterbury deceased at the siege of Acres, and was there buried.

William Byschop of Ely, builded the bitter wall about the Tower of Lon- don, and caused a depe ditch to be made about the same, thinking hee coulde haue caused the riuier of Chamis to go round about it, but hee be shewed great cost in balne.

King Richard subdued the Ile of Cypus, and then sayning his power with Philip the French kings in Asia conquered Acon, where there grew be- tweene the two kings a grienous displeasure: for which cause Philippe thot- lie departed thence, and comming into France, invaded the Countie of Normandie.

John brother to King Richard, toke on him the kingdome of England in his brothers abs:nce. He raised powers of men and with small adoe won the Ca- stles of Nottingham and Litchill.

Robert Earle of Leicester died in his iourney to Iherusalem.

is. Richard resoyed to the Christians the city of Joppa, and in many battels pat the Turkes to great forow.

The bones of the most famous king of Byptaine, Arthur, were founde at Glasterbarie, in a goodly olde Sepulchre, about the which stood two pillars, in which were letters written, which, by reason of the great barbarousnesse of the language, and the foulnessse, no bodie could reade: vpon the sepulture was a croffe of lead, whereon was written, Here lyeth the noble king of Byptaines Arthur.

Hugh Bishop of Lincolne, came to the Abbey of Dunnes called Godstow, betwene Wyford and Wobstock, and when he had entred the church to pray, he saw a tombe in the middle of the quire, covered with a pall of silke, & set about with lightes of waire. And dem:ning whose tombe it was, hee was answer- ed, that it was the tombe of Rosamonde, that was sometime a man to Hen- ry the second of that name, king of Engl:nd, who for the loue of her had done much good to that Church. Then quoth the Bishop, take out of this place the barlot, and bury her without the Church, least Christian Religion should grow in contempt, and to the ende that throught example of her, other women being made afraid, may beware, and keepe the mselues from vnlawfull and adou- terous company with men.

William Bishop of Ely, did commonly ride with 500. hoxses, and grieved Abbeies by meane of his lodging with them: he wished John the is. brother, who said, he wist not if his brother Richard were alive or not. To whome the Bishop answered, if King Richard be yett liuing, it were vntruth to take from him the Crowne. If he be dead, Arthur the elder brothers sonne, must enioie the same.

The Bpshoppe of Ely Legate to the Pope, Chancelour of Englande, and Governour of the Realme, was forced to take the Tower of London for his refuge, wherein Earle Iohn besieged him, at length the Bpshoppe getting lycence to depart, went to Dover, but hee was there forced to sweare that hee woulde not departe the Realme: yet being in a marvellous disquietnesse of minde, he put off his mans apparrell, and put on womans, meaning for to escape, whilst hee goethe tpye and dowlne on the floze, bearing a doublet of clothe on his arme as though hee woulde sell it, still waiting for a ship, a sort of women pulled off his kerchiefe, and thwelve him to the grounde, and after beate him, and dyelwe him along the sandes, whereupon great crye being made, the Burgesse ranne, and with much adoe, gotte him from among them, and kept him streightlie till he had obtained licence to depart the Realme.

When the Archbshop of Roane, with the consent of earle Iohn, toke upon him the rule of the law, as Vicechancelour.

A certaine Lady named Roisa, daughter to Paine Puerell, or Countesse of Dorsethe (as she might be both) having in the raigne of king Stephen, raved a stone Crosse in the kings high waie, on the North limites, by the which Hartfordshire toyneth on Cambridge shire, which Crosse was then called Crux Roise of Roisa. Some Eustachius de Marke knight, Lorde of Rocelles about this time, founded thereby a Priorie in honour of S. O. and Saint Thomas, for Chanons Regular. After which time, there were manie houses built, by meanes whereof the towne beganne to rise, and by little and little to encrease, so that in place of Crux Roise, it is called the towne of Roisa, or Ropstowne. Unto the which king Richard granted a faire, and a market, with other liberties. This Priorie was since renewed, and augmented by Radulph de Runcelifer, and other: so that at the supplie hon, the same was valued at 89. pounds, sixtene shillings. There was an hospitall of S. Iohn, and S. James, Apostles, also suppressed and valued but at 5. li. 6. s. 10. pence.

King Richard having knowledge that Philip of France invaded Normandie, and that Iohn his brother had made himselfe king of England, made peace with the Saladine for thre yeres, and with a small company returning homeward, was taken pysoner by Leopold Duke of Austria, who brought him to Henry the Emperour, and there kept him in prison a yere and five monethes. He was enured for his balsance, in that he had thewed more proofe of his prowesse, than all the other had.

Wolfangus Lazius in his booke de Romano Imperio, affirmeth that Leopold of Austria, when he had taken king Richard, for some iniurie done to the house of Austria, he compelled him to build the walls about Akenna, the chiefest cite of Austria, the which walls within our memory defended all Germany from the invasion of the Turke.

The rumour being spread that S. Richard was taken as ye have heard, forthwith with the French king and earle Iohn made a great conspiracy together, meaning to take the kingdom of England, he upon a great number of Flemings were assembled at Ghent, ready to come over, but the intelligence being taken, the treason was betrayed.

Earle Iohn
rebelled against king
Richard.

Eleanor the olde Duene caused the Sea Coastes to be watched over against flauanders, but notwithstanding Earle Iohn came secretly into England to raise the Welchmen and Scottes, but the king of Scottes would not aid him. The Welchmen in the partes about Kingstone and Wiltshire toke praires aboab.

The French king entered Normandie, founde small resistance, tooke divers townes, Gisors was deliuered to him, then he halld towards Roane, and besieged it, but through the great industry of Robert earle of Leicester, he profited little there, and so returned into France. Earle Iohn perceiving his treason was discovered, fortified his castles, and passed over into France, and joined with the French king.

King Richard sent for his mother and the archbshop of Roane to come unto him to Almain, being now in great hope to be deliuered, & in the meane time the archbshop of Canterbury was made regent of England.

Ambassadors were sent from Philip king of France, and the like from earle Iohn to the Emperour, offering great sums, upon condition that king Richard might remaine still in prison, until the feast of S. Michael next comming, or els to deliuer him into their hands. The Emperour thewed these letters to S. Richard, which brane him into great dispaire of deliuerance.

The kings friends intreating for his deliuerance, his rancome was set at 100000. pounds, to witte to the Emperour 100000. markes, to the Emperesse 30000. markes: and to the duke of Austria 10000. markes: whereupon commandement was directed from the kinges Justices, that all Bpshoppes, Prelates, Cardes, Barons, Abbots, and Priors, should bring in the 4. part of their revenues towards the kings rancome, and besides this, the Cleargy brought in the golden and silver chalices, and senced their shynes, at which was comed into money.

This imprisonment of king Richard was procured by Saracenus Bpshoppe of Bath and Glastenburie, to the intent to haue Glastenburie abbey, to be translated to the seate of this Bpshopricke, for confirmation whereof I thought good to set downe the beginning of the Certificate of Henry the thirde to the Pope in this sort.

Significauit Sanctitati nostrae Henricus Dei gratia, Rex Angliæ, quod cum Filius memorie (rege Richardo auunculo suo in carcere in Alemania detento): scilicet: quondam Bathoniensis Episcopi. per ipsum cuius carcere Dominus Rex tenebatur, Abbati-um Glasten. &c.

The king was restored to libertie, the most part of his rancome being payd, and and pledges left for the residue. In the meane time letters were intercepted of Earle Iohn which hee had sent into England touching treason, one Adam of Saint Edmond Clerk, being sent by earle Iohn, to prouide that his Castle might be fortified against King Richard, came to London, and dined with Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, where he bagged of Earle Iohns prosperitie, and familiaritie with the French king, for the which being suspected, he was after dinner apprehended by the spaiers of London, who toke from him his letters, and deliuered them to the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, who on the next morrow called a Councell of the Carles and Barons, and shewed them the letters, whereupon they all consented that Earle Iohn should bee dispossessed of all his land in England, and that his Castles should be besieged. The same day the same Archbishop and Bishops excommunicated earle Iohn and all his fauourers, which troubled the peace of the kingdome. And forthwith the Archbishop besieged the Castle of Spalborough, which belonged to Earle Iohn, and toke it. After this he besieged Potttingham Castle.

The king taking ship at Antwerp, landed at Sandwich, on the 12. of March, shortly after he besieged the castle of Potttingham, and toke it, and after that the Castle of Eikehill, and then rode to Winchester, where hee was againe solemnly crowned on the 29. of April. After this he called into his handes, all such things as hee had either giuen or solde by patentees or otherwise, by which meanes he got a great summe of money.

King Richard hearing that the king of France had besieged Mersaile, hee toke the sea together with his mother Queene Elianor, on the tenth of Maye, and transported ouer into Normandy, and arrived at Harflew with 100. ships fraught with men, horse, armour, &c. The king of France hearing hereof, plucked by his tentes, lefte the siege, and departed. King Richard here with aduising the French dominions, sent three bandes of Souldiours towarde Male Maell, and went himselfe vnto Rochis, and besieged the Castle and wanne it: about the same time Robert Earle of Leicester sitting south of Roane in hope to worke somewhat, vnadvisedly in the landes of Hugh Gourney he fell within danger of his enemies, who toke him prisoner with other of his company, King Richard wanne the strong castle of Carlebridge by surrender, hee was by force the citie of Engolisme, and other holdes: at length a truce was taken for a time.

King Richard being in Normandie kept his Christmas at Roane, whilst both the king of England and France were bent to trie their malice by dint of sword, there came messengers to eche of them from the Pope, exhorting them to peace, but they prevailed not, for as soon as the truce was ended, they got them to the field, King Richard drawing toward Meloune, a towne in the confines of Barrie, from thence he went to Bisen, and toke the Castle there, then went hee to a towne called Pouen court, this he besieged and it was yielded.

In the meane time the King of France besieged Albrmarle, whereupon King Richard came to raise the siege, & there was a sharpe fight, but the English men worarie with trauaile of their iourney, and being rashly entred into the battell, were were not able to endure the French mens violence, and so not without great losse, were constrained to retyre.

King Richard sent messengers to the Pope, complaining vpon the Duke of Austrey, for misusing of him and his, as they came by distress of weather through his Countrey: whereupon the Pope excommunicated the Duke, and enioyned him to release the couenants that hee constrained the king to make and to send home the pledges: but the Duke refused this order, contemning the Popes authoritie, who shortly after hauing broken his legges, and in extreame anguish ended his life, and was kept hurtled till his sonne had released the English pledges that lay in hostage for the money behind of King Richards ransome, and further sware to stand to the iudgement of the Church for that offence of his father.

Thus were the pledges released, and the residue of the money behind released, which thing to king Richard was both pleasant and profitable, for taking occasion thereof to amend his former life, into a better order, he put away his Concubines, and toke him to his wife, whom of long time he had not known. Moreover, the Emperour gaue to the Christian Spokes, 3000. markes of silver, parcel of king Richards ransome to make silver censers in every church of that order, but the Abbots refused the gift, being a portion of so vngodly and vngodly gaine, at which thing king Richard greatly marvelled at the first, but after commended the Abbots in their doings chiefly for shewing that they were bolde of the accustomed graueynesse, that men noted to haue bene in them.

Hugh Bishop of Lincoln gaue to the king a thousand markes for his mantel of Sables, which his predecessors were wont yearly to haue giuen them by the king.

Robert Earle of Leicester, offered to the king of France for his ransome a thousand markes sterling, and to quit claime to him and his heires for ever, the right which he had to the castle of Dalay, with the appurtenances, but for that they were still continued, there was no answer giuen.

King Richard hauing refreshed his souldiours, went to Milligio, and by assault wanne it at the first brunt, and made it leuell with the ground. After this, there was a motion made for peace betwixt the two kings, being now wearied with long wars. Whereof, when Earle Iohn was aduertised, hee beganne to doubt, lest by agreement made, he might be betrayed by the king of France, vpon couenants passing betwixt them, and therefore determined to commit his whole safety to his naturall brother: whereupon comming to King Richard hee besought him of pardon for his offences, and though hee had not dealt brotherly towards him, yet, that he would brotherly forgive him his rebellious trespass, &c. vpon whose submission, and by the interceding of Elianor his mother and other, in the ende king Richard did not onely pardon him his life, but vpon his othe, restored him to the Earledomes of Poitouaige in Normandie, and Gloucester in Engl. and, with the honor of Eye, the Castles except, and in recompence of his other earldomes, his brother gaue him yearly 8000. pounds of Anglow money.

Submission to Earle Iohn.

King Richard pardoned Hugh Nounce bishop of Couentry, and restored him to his bishopricke for the summe of 5000. marks of silver: but Robert Nounce his brother, died in the kings prison at Dover.

William Fitz Osbert a citizen of London, poxe in degre, until favoured of shawe, but yet verie eloquent, moved the common people to seke libertie and freedom, and not to be subiect to the rich and mighty, by which means he drew to him many great companies, and with all his power defended his poore mens cause against the rich. 5000 Londoners he allured to him to be at his deuotion and commandement.

The king being warned of this tumult, commanded him to cease from these attempts, but the people still followed him, as they before had done: he made to them orations, taking for his theme this sentence, Haurietis aquas in gaudio de fontibus saluatoris, which is to say, Ye shall drawe in ioy, waters out of the welles of your Sauour. And to this he added: I am (saide he) the Sauour of poore men, yee be poxe, and haue assayed long the hard hands of rich men. Fele dwale yee wthosome water forth of my welles, and that with ioie, for the time of your visitation is come. This William was commanded to appeare before the kings council to answer for himselfe in such causes as should be laid against him, where he appeared, but with such a multitude of people, that the Lordes were afraid, and remitted him with pleasant wordes for the time, appointing some priuily when he was alone to apprehend him. He took the steeple of Bowe Church in Cheape, and fortified it with munition and buicalles. The archbishop of Canterbury then being at London with other Iudices sent to him, and willed him to come forth of the church: he should haue his life saued: but he refused to come forth, wherefore the Archbishop talking with the citizens of London called together a great number of armed men least any stirre should be made.

The Saturday therefore being the Passion Sunday euen, the steeple and church of Bowe were assailed, and William with his complices taken, but not without bloodshed, for he was forced by fire & smoke to forsake the church: he was brought to the Archbishop in the Towre, where he was by the Iudges condemned, and by the hayles draine from thence to a place called the Glimes, and there hanged with nine of his fellows. Where because his fauourers came not to deliuer him, he forsoke Maries sonne (as he termed him) and called the diuell to helpe and deliuer him.

This counterfeit friend to the poxe, who named himselfe to be the saviour, perswading them against the rich, was a man of an euill life, a murderer, who slew a man with his owne hands: a fornicator, who polluted Bowes Church with his concubine: and amongst other his detestable facts, one that had falsly accused his elder brother of treason, which elder brother had in his youth bought him by in learning, and done many things for his preferment. Yet after the death of this wicked malefactor, the simple people honored him as a Martyr, in so much that they steele away the gibbet whereon he was hanged, and part away the earth, that was be-bleed with his blood, and kept the same as holy reliques to heale sick men.

King Richard granted licence vnto Philip his chaplaine late made Bishop of Durham, to coine money in his title of Durham, which liberty none of his predecessours had enjoyed of long time before. Robert earle of Leicester gaue Philip king of France two thousand markes of silver, and the quite claime of his Castle of Passay, for his liberty, and to be cleane released.

Philip king of France, besieged Albemarle, and at length won it, and raised it downe to the ground, and king Richard gaue unto him three thousand markes of silver, for the ransome of his men of armes, and other taken in that fortresse. After this the king of France won Poncourt, and earle John took the castle of Camages.

About the same time king Richard gaue vnto his nephew Ocho, the Earle dome of Poptow. His, as the countesse of Byptaine, the mother of Duke Arthur came into France, to haue spoken with king Richard, Reinulph earle of Chester, her husband meeting her at Pontowson, took her as prisoner, and shut her by within his Castle of St. James de Beuinemar, and when her son Arthur could not find means to deliuer her out of captiuitie, hee joined with the French king, and made great hauechie in the lands of his uncle king Richard. Whereupon the king gathered a mightie power, and invaded Byptaine, cruelly wasting that countrey.

This yere died William Earle of Salisbury, the sonne of Earle Patrike, whose daughter and heire, king Richard gaue in marriage together with the Cardelome of Salisbury vnto his base brother surnamed William Longespe, The Welchmen brake forth and did much hurt by spoyling of the marches. The Archbishop of Canterbury calling together an army hastened thither, besieged the castle of Pole, and took it, and chased the enemies, established peace, and returned.

Rise ap Griffeth the Welch king departed this life: after whose departure there fell discord betwene his sonnes for the succession, till Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury went to the marches of that country, and made an agreement betwixt them.

King Richard and the Earle of Flanders confedered together. The French king entering vnlawfully into Flanders, was intercepted and taken by the earle of Flanders, but giuing pledges vpon covenant to make peace, he was suffered to depart.

The eight day of September they met at Lille, where, by mediation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, they took a truce. The Archbishop of Roan returned from Rome, where he had complained on king Richard for taking from him a plot of ground, whereon he builded a strong Castle, but at the request of the archbishop of Canterbury, the king gaue him in recompence, the towne of Wepe.

The Welchmen on the marches took booties, and did much hurt, but Hubert the archbishop of Canterbury being lord chiefe Justice, lieutenant, or warden of England, found mirans to resist them, so that they being fought with, were overthowen, and 5000. of them slaine. The Archbishop hauing got this victory, returneth to London, where calling together a great number of the nobles

King Richard took of every Carucate plough land, or hide of land throught Engl and five shillings. Commissioners were appointed in every shire, with the assistance of the Sherriffes, to see the same assessed, and rated after 100. acres of land to a hide, according to the custome. The French king was intercepted by the army of king Richard, so that with much ado he escaped into Cyprus, his army was disperced, and almost an hundred knights taken, besides other common souldiours, without number. The Charters which the king had before made with his new seale were changed.

King Richard turned his army against the Barons of Poitou that rebelled against him, he set their cities and towns on fire, spoiled their country, & slew many of his aduersaries cruelly, at the last came to the dukedome of Aquitaine, and besieged the Castle of Chalne, and brought it to that, that they with in offered to yelde vppon conditions, but he would not so receiue them, but would haue them by force: whereupon a certaine young man named Bertram de Gordon, standing on the castle wall, leuelled a quarell out of a crossbow, and smote him with a benoumed dart in the left arme or shoulder: which stripe the king little regarded, but inuading the castle, wan it, and put the souldiours in prison. Of this wound aforesaid, he died the 6. of Aprill, in the yere of our Lord 1199. when hee had raigned 9. yeres, and 9. moneths, and was buried at Fontenurard at his fathers side, whom he confessed he had betrayed, his hart was buried at Poaene, in testimonie of the loue hee had euer borne vnto that citie, for the stedfast loyalty he had alwaies found in the citizens thereof, and his bowels at the foresaid Chalne.

King Iohn.

John Earle of Poitou, and Lord of Ireland, aged 34. yeres, a person of an indifferant stature, but of melancholy complexion, after the decease of king Richard, took vnto him, and retrained all the knights and souldiours which had serued his brother, he kept them in wages, and promised them large gifts. Moreover, he sent Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, William Marshall, and Geoffrey Fitz Peter chiefe Justice into England, to proclaim his peace to be kept amongst the rest of the Nobles of the Realme. These, when they came into England, caused all men to sweare to be true to Earle Iohn, and so went forward to Northampton, where they called together all those nobles, bles, whom they doubted, and promised in the name of Earle Iohn, that hee should restore vnto them, and to all men, their right: and vpon that comission they gaue to him their fidelities. Also they sent word by Eustace de Vescy, to William king of Scots, that earle Iohn at his returne into England should content him for all his right which hee claymed in England, and the restore told him in the meane season to be faithfull to the said Earle, and to keepe his peace, which hee promised, by which meanes all strife and debate in Englaunde was appeased.

Whilist these things were a doing in England, earle Iohn went to Chilton where king Richards treasure laye, which treasure, with the Castle, was deliuered to him by Robert de Turnehame. But Thomas de Furneis deliuered vnto Arthur Duke of Brittain, the citie and Castle of Angiers, for as well by him, as by all other the nobles and pères of the countries of Angiew, Spaine, and Turon, Arthur was receiued as their soueraigne Lord. Spoken, Constantia mother to the said Arthur, deliuered him to the king of France at Turon: whom he sent to Paris to be kept, and took into his hands all the Castles and Cities that appertained to the said Arthur: but Earle Iohn and Elianor his mother, came with a great army to the Citie of Paris, and won both it and the Castle, destroyed all the stone houses there, and carried the citizens away captiues. This being done, Earle Iohn entring into the countrey of Aniole held his Caster at Beaufort, and on the morrow after, he sent Quene Elianor and Marchadius vnto the Citie of Aniole, who with a warlike power spoiled it, and carried the citizens away captiues.

In which meane time earle Iohn came to Roan, and there by the ministerie of Walter Archbishop of Roan, he was girt with the sword of the dukedome of Normandy, in the Cathedra church, where the Archbishop before the high altar, did set a Crownet of golde vpon his head, artificially made with Roses of golde, &c. Duke Iohn swore vpon the holy Evangelists to defend the Church and liberties thereof, to see Justice ministered to the people, god lawes put in execution, and euill lawes suppressed.

Earle Iohn
Duke of Normandy.

Then Iohn Duke of Normandie sayled ouer into England, and arrived at Shobham on the five and twentieth daie of Maie, and came to London on the Ascension euen, where the Archbishops, Bishops, Carles, Barons, and other being present, Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury standing by in the midst of them all, said in effect as followeth:

Your discrete wisdomes doe knowe (right honorable) that by most reason none ought to succede in the kingdome, except by the vniuersall consent of the whole realme (praying for the grace of the holy ghost) he be chosen according to the excellencie of his qualities and bechaitour, by the example of the first appointed king Saul, whom our Lord appointed vnto his people, not being the son of any king, neither of the progeny of any king. Likewise, after him, he made David king, the sonne of Ithai, who was a Monte man, apt and meete for the worthy dignitie of a king, and that because he was holy and humble, so that he which both in such sort excel in prouesse all other in the kingdome ought to be chosen to gouerne the same: but if there be any of the kings lineage that both excellent, he ought to be ready to elect and chose him. This I speake touching the noble Duke Iohn, brother to our late excellent king Richard now deceased, which had none before proceeding of his bodie. Which Duke Iohn appeared plainly unto us, to be both wary and stout, whom therefore beseeching the holy ghost of his grace, we doe with one consent elect and chose, as being both of the same worthines, and also of the same blood and kindred that king Richard was of.

Roger Wend.

This archbishop indeede was a man of deepe understanding, a singular pillar of stabilitie, and of incomparable wisdom, so that no man was so bold as to make any reasoning of the matter at that time, because they knowe well enough that he did not without cause define in such sort of this thing: wherefore the Duke Iohn, and all other there present did accept of the choise, crying, Viva Rex. But afterwards, the archbishop being demaunded, why he made this election, he answered, and said, that by certaine Oracles, and by the gift of prophete, he was certified, that this Iohn should once take to himselfe the realme and crowne of England, and should bring the same into great confusion: wherefore, to the end he should not have so much occasion to bring these things to passe, he saide, that he was so to be elected to the kingdome, though the same by succession of inheritance belonged not to him, and so he set the crowne upon his head, and annointed him king at Westminster in Saint Peters church, upon the Ascension day, which was the five and twentieth day of Maie: he was sworn to love the catholike church and ordinances thereof: to keep and defend the same harinlessse from the invasion of euill disposed persons: to disanull peruerse lawes, and create good lawes, and according to the same to minister true iudgement throughout his kingdome.

King Iohn made a law, that no tunne of Rochell wine should be sold dearer then xx. shillings, of Anslow for xxiij. shillings, 7 of France xxv. shillings, and not above, unlesse the same were of such principal goodnes, that some for their use would give xxvi. shillings liii. pence for the tun, and not above in any case.

A gallon (by retale) of Rochell wine to be sold for liii. pence, the gallon of white wine not above vi. pence. It was also ordained, that in euery cite, towne and place where wine was sold to be sold, there should be xii. honest men twome to haue regard that this assise should not be broken: and if that they found any tinter that should sell any wine by small measures contrary to the same assise, his body should be attached by the shiriffe and detained in prison, till order was taken for his further punishment, and his goods seized to the kings use: and the like punishment was appointed for such as should sell by the tunne, hoghead, or other wise, contrary to the assise.

Philip king of France, and Iohn king of England met betwixt the castles of Mtaplun, and Butevant, where they agreed upon a peace, that king Iohn should quite claime unto the French king, and his heires for euer, all Vilgelwin, Cisors, and other castles. Also king Iohn gaue in marriage with his niece Blanch, daughter to Alfonso, king of Castile, unto Lewis, sonne and heire to Philip king of France, all the castles which the same Philip had taken in Normandy, that is to say, Vernon, Badep, Puery, and Bonancot, and many other cities, townes, castles, &c. besides to king Philip 30000. markes. King Philip then bestowed Arthur to king Iohn, and receiued of him homage, for Brytaine and Richmond, both kings swore to obserue this peace firme with their scale for euer.

King Iohn having made peace beyond the seas, returned into England, where he requirith an aide of his realme to pay the thirty thousand marks, and edict was made, that euery plowland should paie three shillings, which troubled the land sore, considering the escuage that went afore, which was for euery knight sixe two marks, which before time was neuer but twenty shillings. King Iohn went ouer, and hauing paid his thirty thousand marks to the king of France, he was there by the hands of Helias Archbishop of Bourdeaur, and the Bishops of Poitiers, and Scone, divorced from his wife Isabell, daughter to Robert Earle of Gloucester, because of nearnesse of blood, as touching her in the thirde degree: And then he married Isabell daughter to Americ Earle of Angouleme; which Isabell before Hugh surnamed Brune Earle of Marches had taken to wife.

This being done, King Iohn returned with his new wife, and crowned her Quene at Westminster on the eight of October. And the same day king Iohn commaunded Hugh Nevill chiefe forrester, and the other forresters to warne all the sponkes of the Cistiaur order throughout England, that from the Detanes of Saint Michael, unto the Quindem, they should remove all their boies, their swine, and other cattell whatsoeuer off the forrest ground: and if any were after found upon y forrest ground, they should be sold to the kings use. The monkes provided for themselves, and patiently bare the kings displeasure.

The archbishop of Canterbury sent to all the Abbots of that order, aduising them to mete the king at Lincoln on the xvi. of Nouember, that being together, by his helpe they might attempt to appeale the kings moode, they did as they were willed. The archbishop counselled them, the next day to mete the king without the city, and to humble themselves unto him, but they thought not this to be the best waie, lest those that robe before the king should abuse them.

The next day king Iohn talked with William king of Scots that was come to Lincoln, with Roland Lord of Galloway, and many other noblemen, to doe homage to the king.

The next day the Archbishoppe moved the king in the matter touching the Abbots, but the king willed him not to bere his spirits, for he meant that day to be let blood.

On Sunday next following, the archbishop caused the abbots to come into the kings presence at masse time: whereupon, after the king had heard masse, and comming forth of the church, the Archbishop besought him to heare their sute, and then they falling downe at the kings fete, besought him to haue pity upon them: the king commaunded one to bring the Abbots into his chamber, and he with the Archbishop, bishops, and Nobles went into the same chamber before them, where, when they had sate a while, the king rose vp, and went into an inner chamber, there to conferre with the noblemen, such as pleased him; and after comming forth, called for the archbishop and certaine other bishops, with whom he talked secretly: and after the Abbots being called, the king appointed the Archbishop to declare unto them his pleasure, which was, that although the king had shewed himselfe in wordes to be offended with them, yet he neuer meant hurt to that order, and now had put away all rancour and malice towards them: here with they fell downe on the ground, and gaue humble thanks to the king, and withall, the archbishop inferred, that the king requested them to forgive him: and the king herewith fell downe, watering his cheekes with teares, and they likewise at his fete. The Archbishop, after both partes were vp on their fete, said, that the king required, that by their intercession he might be made a brother in the chapter of the Cisterciars, and that they would procure him to be admitted: Whereupon, the king, he saide, minded to build a house of that order, that he might be had in memorie, and would be a patron and defender of their order. The Abbots being greatly reioiced, departed, praising God.

King Iohn going into Ireland toke a great piece of money there, and returning into England, was crowned together, with his Queene at Canterbury on Easter day.

King Iohn with Isabel his Queene sailed into Normandie, fell in communication with Philip king of France, where they agreed so well, that they passed together into France, where king Iohn was honourably receiued at Saint Denys, and into Paris, &c.

A nobleman of Aquitaine named Hugh Brune, rebelling against king Iohn invaded diuers parts of the prouince, because the king had married the daughter of the Earle of Angouleme, whom the said Brune had assid, and had in his custody, wherefore they passed over, and restrained the rebelles from their attempts.

The five and twentieth of June there arose a cruel tempest of thunder, lightning, ning, and haile, with a vehement raine, that destroyed coyns, castell, men, and houses, by burning them, &c.

The tenth of July, another tempest much like to the former hapned, so that the meadowes could not be mowed, and the hay that was downe, was carried away by the outrageous course of waters that overflowed the ground, great numbers of fishes through the corruption of the waters died, manie bishopps boine downe, coyns and hay carried away, and many men drowned, so that all men thought a new deluge had bene come.

King Iohn sharply warred upon the Earle of March, Hugh Brune, and the earle of Que his brother, who being not able to resist, they complained to Philip king of France, as to their soueraigne and chiefe Lord, who sent oft times to king Iohn, mouing him to cease from beryng them, but that would not serue: wherefore he was summoned by the nobles of France as duke or earle of Aquitaine and Anjou, to come unto the court of the French king, and to stand to the iudgement of his peres, all which king Iohn denied: whereupon the same court adiabged him to be deprived of all his lands, which he or his predecessors beide of the king of France, &c.

King Philip forthwith assembled an army, and invaded the castle of Buteuant in Normandy, which Richard had builded, he rased it to the ground. He toke the land of Hugh Gorney, and all the Castles thereabout. He toke the Castle of Albemarle, with the countie of Que, and all the land to Arches, none resisting him Also Arthur earle of Byptaine being made knight by the French king, whose yonger daughter he had affianced, he being but thirteene peres old, went to Hugh Brune, and Geoffrey of Lucingham, and with two hundred and fiftie knightes, besieged the Castle of Mirable, in which Queene Elianor his Aunt was inclosed: but king Iohn came with a power, and deliuered his mother from danger. He toke there his Nephew Arthur, William de Brawla, Geoffrey de Lucingham, Hugh Brune, Andrew Caueny, Saluaricus de Maulcon, and diuers others.

Great thunder and lightning, with haile as bigge as hennes egges, &c. The waters increased, and did much hurt in England: Arthur earle of Byptaine, from Falaie was brought to Roan, and put in the Tower under the custody of Robert de Veypont, where shortly after he was dispatched of his life, some say by the handes of his uncle Iohn.

The king of France invaded the castles of Normandy, toke Lille, Wandeley, with the Castle, and the vale de Ruell, in the which were Robert fiz Walter, Sayer de Quincy, and manie other. He toke the strong Castle upon Setne, builded by King Richard, which had bene valiantly kept by the constable of Chester.

Among many other that found themselves agreed with the shamefull murder of duke Arthur, sonne to Geoffrey duke of Byptaine, king Iohns elder brothers sonne, and therefore rightfull heire to the crowne and realme of England, was Iohn Courcy the valiant conqueror, and earle of Ulster in Ireland: which being brought to the kings eares, he call the said Courcy into the Tower of London. and is, John (as ye haue heard) so that the king of France berett him of all the lands that he held in the fee of the Crowne of France, and among other matters, he sent hither a mighty man, who should try that quarrel with an English champion by combat: To undertake the which, the king moued Courcy, who stoutly answered him, that in his quarrell, whose murderous vile minde, cowardlines, traiterous condicions, and tyrannicall gouernment deserued not the aduantage of losing one droppe of blood, hee would not fight one stroke, but for the honour of the realme, wherein many a good and honourable man liued, to his great griefe, he would willingly leaue his life, and cherefully accept the combat, yea with a wound. But no harme was doone, for the French man, as soone as he sawe the mightie him, and fierce countenance of Courcy, went awaie.

King John sent Ambassadors to treat a peace with the k. of France, but he, because the world went with him, would not agree in anye wise, except Arthur might be deliuered to him alive, or if he were dead, he would haue his sister in marriage with all the lands on that side the Seas.

Shortly after he toke Falaise, Caen, and so forth all the countrey to Barflet, Charburgh, and Dunfront, Roane, Bernoll, and Arches: and so prouide for many, Antio, Byptaine, Spaine, Poltowa, and Thoyaigne, were within a short time deliuered to king Philip.

King John married lane his bastard daughter to Lewlin prince of Wales, and gaue with her the Castell and Lordship of Clingsmore, in the Marches of Southwales.

The foureteenth daie of Iannarie beganne a frost, which continued till the two and twentieth daie of March, so that the ground coulde not be tilled, whereof it came to passe that in summer following, a quarter of wheate was sold for a marke of silver in many places of England, which for the more parte in the daies of king Henry the second, was sold for twelue pence: a quarter of beanes or pease for halfe a marke: a quarter of oates for foure pence, that were wont to be sold for foure pence. Also, the money was so lowe clipped, that there was no remedie, but to haue it reued.

King John gathered great armies of men to haue gone ouer the Seas, but being failed on ward of his voyage, he returned againe, and toke esnage, two markes and a halfe of currie knightes for through Englands, pretending a quarrell

Great thunders and lightninges bursting out of the cloudes were sene, so that men thought that the day of Doome had bin come, many men and townes were destroyed, beside catell, and houses that were ouerthrowne, and burned. About Spaldstone in Kent, a certaine monster was found, stricken with the lightning, which monster had an head like an asse, a belly like a man, and all other parts farre discordant from any one living thing. This dead bodie no man might brynne come nere vnto for feare.

King John toke the thirtieth part of all moueable goods, both of lay and religious through England, at which all men murmured.

The 7. day of Iannary a great wind ouerthrew many houses and trees, and a great snow destroyed manye beastes.

The monkes of Canterburie, by the aduise of the Pope, elected Stephen Langton to be their Archbisshop, and then Pope Innocent intending to obatine the fauour of king John towards this election, because hee knewe that hee did make diligent search for precious stones, sent him an eloquent Epistle, with diuers precious Jewelles, which were of king John well accepted: and Stephen Langton was consecrated at Rome. When the Pope sent letters to king John, humbley exhorting him to receiue the said Stephen Archbisshop of Canterburie, beeing the accunto canonicallie elected, the rather because hee was an Englishman borne, and a doctor of diuinitie, &c. But king John being greatly offended with the promoting of the said Stephen, sent men in armour to expell the monkes of Canterburie, to the number of thre score and foure out of the Realme, and condemned them of treason, the monkes went into Flaunders, and the ir goods, and lands of their church was confiscated. Also king John sent threatening letters to the pope, whereunto the pope made a large answer.

A. Isabel upon the first of October was deliuered of her first son at Winchester, and named him Henry.

The 23. of March, William Bishop of London, Eustachius Bishop of Ely, and Malgor Bishop of Winchester by the popes commandement executed the interdiction vpon the whole Realme, and they ceased through all England from ministering of Ecclesiasticall sacraments, sauing to them that were in perill of death, and baptisme to children. All the bodie of them that died, were buried like dogs in ditches and corners: Panie Bishops, especially they that pronounced the interdiction, fled the Realme.

The king set all the bishopps and abbates in the realme into the custody of lay men, and commanded all Ecclesiasticall reuenues to be confiscated. Also doubting lest the Pope should excommunicate him by name, or discharge the nobles of England of their allegiance towards him, he laid hold vpon them, specially

The arches and stone Bridge over the Thames at London, hauing bene three and thirtie yeres in building, since the foundation thereof was layde, to witte, in the yere of Christ 1176. and the 22. of Henrie the seconde, was this yere finished by the two worthy Merchantes of London, Serle Mercer, William Alman, and Bener Botewright. Master Fowle a learned man, last Bishop of S. Mary Oueries Church in his life time, reported, that at the first, being no bridge at London, but a ferrie, the ferrier and his wife deceasing, left the same ferrie to their daughter, a Spalden named Marie, who with the gods lesse by her parents, and the profits which came by the saide ferrie, builded a house of sisters, which is the vppermost end of S. she was buried, into the which house shee gaue the ouersight and profite of the same ferrie: but afterwarde the house of Sisters was converted into a Colledge of priests, who builded the bridge of timber, and from time to time kept the same in reparations, but considering the great charges in repairing, lastly by the great aide of the Citizens of London, and others, they builded the same of stone. King John gaue certaine vacant places in London to builde on, the profits thereof to remaine towards the charges of building and repairing of the same bridge. A Mason being master worke man of the Bridge, builded from the foundation the chappell on London bridge, of his owne proper expenses.

The king commanded all the feloes both men and women to be imprisoned and graciously punished, because he would haue all their money, some of them gaue all they had, and promised more, to the ende they might escape so manie kinds of tormentes as he did put vpon them, for euery one of them had one eye at the least pulled out: amongst whom, there was one, which being tormented many waies, would not ransom himselfe, till the king had caused euery daie one of his great teeth to be pulled out by the space of 7. daies, and then he gaue the king 10000. markes of silver, to the end they should pull out no more.

In the moneth of June, the king ledde an Armie into Irelande, expelled Hugh Lacy, and brought all Ireland vnder his subiection. He caused the lawes of England to be executed there, and money to be coined according vnto the weight of English money, and made there both halfe pence and farthings: he returned with great triumph in the moneth of September, and then raised a great tare vpon all the religions in Englande, whome hee caused to paie such a ransom, and to spoyle their Churches, that the summe came to an hundred thousande poundes, besides fourtie thousande poundes of the white monkes.

The king went into Wales against Lewlin his sonne in law, that had married his barbar daughter, with a great force, euen to S. nobden. and subued all the princes and nobles, without any gaine saying. He took eight and twenty pledges for their subiection, and returned. When he came at Northampton, there met him messengers from the Pope, Pandolph and Durand, which came to make an bullie betwixt the king and the Bishop of Canterbury with the Monks which were banished, but the king granting their returne, denied to make them any amendes for their losse which they had sustained, or to restore their goods which he had confiscated, so that the Ambassadors returned without any end concluded.

William king of Scotland being aged, was not able to quiet the inner parts of his realme, troubled with sedition, wherefore he fled unto the king of England, and committed himselfe, his kingdome, and onely sonne unto his prison, who making the young man knight, went into those parts with an army, and sending forth his men into the inner parts of that kingdome, hee took Cuthred Mac William Captaine of the sedition, and hung him on a paire of gallows, for he was of the olde ancient race of the Scottish kings, who assailed with the aide of the Irish and Scots, did exercise long enmitie against the moderne kings of Scotland, as his father Donald had done before him, sometime secretly, sometime openly: for the moderne kings of Scotland confessed themselves to be rather Frenchmen, as in stocke or linage, so also in maners, language, and apparell, and having brought the Scots unto extreme servitude, they admit onely Frenchmen into familiaritie and service.

The king gathered a great army, minging utterly to destroy all the coastes of Wales, but when he came to Potttingham, he caused eight & twenty plevages of the Welshmen to be hanged, and immediately after, while he sate at meate, there came a messenger, that brought him Letters from the King of Scots, informing him, that he should be betrayed; and likewise also came another messenger out of Wales, from the kings daughter, wife to Lewline king of Wales, certifying him of the same conspiracie, that is to say, that if he did not leave off and desist from that he had begun, his nobles would either kill him themselves, or else betray him to his enemies to be killed.

Wherefore, when the king came backe to London, he sent messengers to all the great men whome he suspected to be untrue to him, and demanded pledges of them, who daring not disobey the kings commandment, sent to him their sonnes, nephewes, and kindred to be at the kings pleasure.

Peter of Pontfract.

About this time in the province of Poysie, there was an Heremite named Peter of Pontfract, who was also called the Wisse, because hee had declared unto many divers strange things that were to come. This Heremite prophesied openly of king Iohn, and said, that upon the Ascension day next comming, there

there should be no king, nor from thenceforth, but he said the crowne should at that day be translated to another. Whereof, when the king heard tell, hee commended this Heremite to be brought unto his presence, and demanded of him, whether the king should die as that day, or no, or else, in what order the king should be depstured of his raigne. The Heremite answered, I knowe this most certainly, that at that day, thou shalt not be king: and if I be found a liar, then doe with me what ye will. And the king said it should be even so, as thou hast saide, and so committed him to William de Hartcourt to keepe, and he kept him in dreight prison, until he sawe the end.

There were at that time manie noble men in England, whose wives and daughters the king had oppressed, and other some, whome with extreme exactions hee had brought into great povertie, and other some, whose parents and friends the king had banished, and had turned the inheritance unto his own use: so that king Iohn had almost, as many enemies as hee had nobles, and great men, and the report was that they did send their writing and charter to the king of France, sealed with their seals, wherein they promised him, that if he would come and invade England, they would receive him, and crowne him with honour.

About this time, Stephen Archbishop of Canterburie, William Bishoppe of London, and the Bishop of Ely, went to Rome, and informed the Pope how many enormous debtes king Iohn with great contumacie had done against God and his holy Church: wherefore they humbly besought him to helpe and succour the church of England, which now was in great danger. Whereupon the Pope determined, that king Iohn should be deposed, and another more worthy set in his place: Toward the execution whereof, the Pope wrote his letters to king Philip of France, willing him to expulse the king of England, and he should for ever possesse the kingdome.

The tenth daie of July at night, a marvellous and terrible chance happened, for the Citie of London upon the South side of the river of Thames, with the Church of our Lady of the Chanons in Southwarke being on fire, and an exceeding great multitude of people passing the bidge, either to ertingniss and quench, or else to gaze, behold, suddenly the north part, by blowing of the South winde was also set on fire, and the people which were even now passing the bidge, perceiving the same, would have returned, but were stopped by fire, and it came to passe, that as they staied, or protracted time, the other end of the bidge also, namely the South end was fired, so that the people thronging themselves betwixt the two fires, did nothing else expect or looke for then death. Then came there to aide them many ships and vessels, into the which, the multitude so badly pressed, that the ships being crowded, they all perished: it was said, though the fire and the shipwreck, that there were destroyed about three thousand persons. William Packington writeth, that there were found in part of halfe burnt three thousand bodies, besides those that were quite burned that could not be found.

King Iohn disherited some noble men without judgement of their peeres, and he would have destroyed Ranulph Earle of Chester, for that he repossessed him him with this, that he should use the wife of his brother Geoffrey Earle of Britaine, whom Ranulph earle of Chester had married, and from whom Ranulph was disuoyced by the counsell of king Iohn, and the saide earle had married the daughter of the earle Ferrers.

King Iohn being now in extremity, and minding to impute the fault to them that would not appease his furor aforesaid, reprehended sometimes one, and sometimes another of his nobility as traitors, calling them lealous, whose bodies (as he bragged) he had defiled, and deflowered their daughters.

The Chronicle of Dunmow saith, this discord arose betwixt the king and his barons, because of Mawde called the Faire, daughter to Robert Fitz Walter, whom the king loved, but her father would not consent, and the reuenge ensued warre throughout England. The king spoiled speciallie the Castell of Baynard in London, and other holdes and houses of the barons. Robert Fitz Walter, Roger Fitz Robert, and Richard Mount Fitcher passed ouer into Fraunce, Iohn also went into Wales, and some into Scotland, and did great damage to the king. Whilste Mawde the Faire remained at Dunmow, there came a messenger vnto her from king Iohn about his suit in loue, but because she would not agree, the messenger poisoned a boiled or potched Egge against she was hungry, wherof she died, and was buried in the quier at Dunmow.

At this time also king Iohn subtiltie, to excuse himselfe withall, demanded and obtained of all religious persons, a writing, wherein they acknowledged, that they had willingly giuen the king all that he had with violence taken from them.

About this time, the king of France wasted the king of Englands landes beyonde the Seas, and the king of England likewise wasted his: but at the length a truce was taken, and an arme of the Sea being betwixt either host, there was a knight in the English host that cryed to them of the other side, willing some one of their knightes to list a course or twaine: wherupon without state, Robert Fitz Walter made himselfe readie, ferried ouer, and got on his horse without anie man to helpe him, and being readie against the face of his enemye, at the first course hee strooke the other so hard with his great speare, that horse and man fell to the ground, and when his speare was broken, he went backe againe to the king of France: by Gods toth (quoth king Iohn) he were a king in so be that had such a knight. Roberts friends hearing that, knelted downe, and saide, O king he is your knight, it is Robert Fitz Walter: and the next daie he was sent for, and was restored to the kings fauour, and by his meanes peace was concluded, and he receiued his linings, and had leaue to repaire his castles, &c. Thre the most forcible and valiant knightes of England in those daies were Robert Fitz Walter, Robert Fitz Roger, and Richard Mount Fitcher.

King Iohn caused a great armie to be gathered at Douer in the next season, and gathered together a great nauie of ships, and whilest he remained about the Sea coast with his force to withstande the French king when hee shoulde come, there arrived two brethren of the Temple at Douer, which came to the king and in friendlie manner saide vnto him: We be sent vnto thee (most mightie mightie king) in the behalfe of Pandolph, who for the commoditie of you and of your realme desireth to haue talke with you, for he hath to propound vnto you a certaine forme of peace, wherby you may be reconciled to God, and to the Church, notwithstanding that you be condemned by sentence in the court of Rome to be deposed from the title of your realme.

When the king had considered well the message of those templars, he gaue them commaundement to cause Pandolph to come ouer vnto him. And not long after, Pandolph came to the king at Douer, and said vnto him: Behold, the most mightie king of France lieth with an inuincible number of ships, and a great multitude of knights, horsemen and footmen in the haven, readie to come ouer to invade, and depose you, as a rebell vnto God, and vnto his Pope: there come with him also the Bishops that of late were banished out of England, with the clerkes and lay men, to the end, that whether ye will or no, they hauing the French king to their capitaine, they may receiue their bishopricks and goods.

The king of France also doth boast that he hath Charters almost from all the Nobles of England of their allegiance and subiection vnto him, so that thereby he doubteth not but to bring his purpose to passe. Nowe therefore at the last loke to your owne commoditie, that you may come to repentance, and make no delay to reconcile you to God, whom you haue prouoked to take vengeance vpon you. For if you make assurance, that for his sake, which humbled himselfe for you, you will humble your selfe to the iudgement of the Church, you may recover your realme: from which, for your contumacie you be absolved and condemned by the court of Rome to be deposed. Nowe therefore that your enemies doe not reioice ouer you, turne into your owne heart, and take heede that you doe not bring your selfe into such a distresse as you shall not be able to ridde your selfe out againe.

With these wordes king Iohn was moued to repentance, chiefly considering 4 things. The first, for that he had excommunicate the space of five yeres. The second, he feared the coming of Philippe king of Fraunce, which lay round about the Sea coastes with a great force, prepared to depose him. Thirdly, he feared, that if he should loine battell with his enemies, the nobles of England would either leaue him in the feld, or deliuer him to his enemies. And the fourth, which he feared most, was because Ascension day was at hand, when according to the prophetic of Peter the Hermitte, he should lose both his life, and kingly authoritie, both spirituall and temporall. For these and such like causes, king Iohn being fallen into desperation, did follooe the perswasion of Pandolph, and toke his othe vpon the Euangelists, that in the presence of Pandolph, he would stand to, and obey the iudgement of the Church, and 16. of his Barons and Barons did sweare the same, and covenanted that if he peradventure should repent him of his othe, they would compell him, so much as lay in them to performe it. Thus on the 13. of Maie, on Sunday before Ascension day, the king and his Nobles, Barons, and Barons, mette with Pandolph at Douer, where with one consent they agreed vpon a forme of peace.

at the house of the knights of the Temple, by the toson of Douer, on the 10. day of May, being the Ascension Euen, where the king, according as sentence was giuen at Rome, did resign his Crowne, with the realmes of England and Ire- land into the Popes handes: whose Alcegerent at that time was Pandulph a. foresaid, and when he had made this resignation, hee gaue the aforesaide king- domes to the Pope, and to his successors, and confirmed his gift with a Char- ter, dated the 15. of May, in the 14. yere of his raigne. When the Ascension day was past, hee commanded the foresaid Peter the Hermite to be set out of the castle of Coske, to be bounde to a horse-taile, & draine through the strates to Warham, and there both he and his son to be hanged on a gibbet.

The 17. of August, Stephen Langton Archbyschoppe of Canterburie, and all the other that were banished, arryued at Douer, and wente to Winchester to the king, who meeting them in the waie, fell flatte upon the earth before their kete, and with teares beseech'd them to take pittie on him, and of the Realme of England. The Archbyschop and Byschoppes likewise, with teares tooke him vp from the ground, and brought him vnto the doores of the Cathedral church, and with the psalme of Miserere absolved him: then the king toke an othe to call in all wicked Lawes, and to put in place the Lawes of king Edward. Di- uine seruice being ended, the king, the archbyschop, bishops and nobles, dined al at one table.

Richard Wylof of Bermondsey, builded an house (against the wall of the said house of Bermondsey) called the Almo:po: Hospital of conuerts and chyldren, in the honour of Saint Thomas.

Gilo de Brawfe the son of William de Brawfe, receiued all his Fathers inhe- ritaunce into his custodie, together with his Nephew, till the chylde came to law- full age.

Morgan Prouost of Beuerley, brother to R. John was elected byshop of Dur- ham, but hee coming to Rome to be consecrated, returned againe without it, for that he was a bassard, and R. Henry father to R. John, had begotten him of the wife of one Radulph Bloeth, yet would the Pope haue dispensed with him, if he would haue called himselfe the son of the knight, and not of the king. But hee being the aduise of one William of Lane his Clarke, answered, that for no woorthy promotion, he would deny the kings blood.

The fifteenth of October, was begun by the Londoners, the ditch without the wals of London, of 200. fote broad, causing no small hinderance thereby to the Chanons of Chylts Church nere vnto Aldgate, say that it passed through their ground.

Geffery Fitz Peter dieth, chiefe Justice of England, and the Bishhop of Win- chester in that office is placed, the nobles of England murmuring, that a stran- ger bozne, should be made ruler over them.

Pope Innocent sent his letters to Nicholas bishop of Tusculane his Legate, to release the interdiction, which had continued 6. yeres, 3. monethes, and 14. dales.

The seconde date of Julie, king John sayled towarde Bytaine, intending to besiege Flaunces, in the which warres hee had the aide of Otho the Empe- ror, our, and of the Dukes of Louaine, Brabant, and Hollande, of Reignolde Earle of Bolougne, and Ferrandis Earle of Flaunders, so that there was a greates ffielde fought, in which the French King escaped narrowly, but be- ing rescued; hee tooke the foresayde Carles, put Hugh de Bones to flighte, and droue the Emperour out of the ffielde, and then a Truce was taken be- twixt King John and the king of Fraunce for five yeres, by the Popes com- mandement, as some sayde, but as other said, this truce was agræd by means of 6000. marks, which the king of England gaue, fearing to incounter with the great multitude of Frenchmen.

King John hauing finished his warres beyond the Seas, as yee haue heard, came ouer into England, about the fourteenth of November. And the same time the Carles and Barons of the Realme, especially them of the North, came to talke with the king, hee beeing then at Saint Edmundesburie, but their intent was not only to talke with him, as well appeared: for after they had along season hanelled the matter among themselves, they brought forth the charter of king Henry the first, which they had receiued of Stephen the Archbysch, wher of we haue made mention here before. And so they came together into S. Edmonds Church, where the chiefeest of them beganne, and they all swore by the high Altar, that if the king would not graunt the foresayde Lawes and Li- berties, they would make warres against him, and withdrowe themselves out of his allegiance, untill hee did with his Seale confirme and ratifie the same. And they consented all on this, to come to the king after Christmas, and in the meane season they would prouide themselves both of armes, horses, and munition.

Fishes of vnwonted shape were taken in England, for they were armed with helmets and shields, in outward shape they resembled, and were like vnto ar- med knights, sauing that they were far greater in proportion.

Almost the whole towne of S. Edmundsbury was consumed with fire.

The king beeing lodged in the newe temple at London, there came to him, the foresaid noble men in warlike order, demanding of him to confirme the Li- berties of king Edwards Lawe and other: the king requiring respite till Es- ter, was faine to put in forreities the Archbyschop of Canterburie, the Byschop of Ely, and other, to satisfie all men in that behalfe, and then the Noble men returned. The king in the Church of Saint Paul at London, at the handes of William Byschop of London, toke on him the signe of the Crosse of the holie Land, by meane thereof to be in the better safegard: the earles of Gesser and Darby did the like. In the Easter weeke the noblemen in armes met at Stam- ford, and after at Berkeley, whither came to them from the king, the Archbys- chop of Canterburie, William Marshall withy other, to demand of them what they would haue confirmed, and the nobles deliuered to them a scedule, contey- ning the olde Lawes and customes, which except the king would graunt, they would take the castles of his lands, and so compell him.

The 17. date of Ayle being Sundate, the Barons came to London, and en- tered through Aldgate, in the seruice time, where they toke such as they knewe fauoured the king, and spoiled their goods. They take into the Houses of the

After this Robert Fitz Walter, and Geoffrey de Maundeuill Earle of Essex, and the Earle of Gloucester, chiefe leaders of the armie, applied all biligence to repaire the gates and walles of the citie, with the stones of the Jewes broken houses. The Towler of London yet held out, though there were fewe within to defende it. When it was noyed that the Barons had London, all (except the Earles of Warren, Arundell, Chester, Pembroke, Ferrers, and Salisburie, and the Barons, William Brewer with other) went to those Barons that were against the king, who called themselves the Armie of God, whereby such a feare came on the king, that he durst not peere out of Winbore Castle: at length he appointed to meete with the Barons in a medebowe betwixt Stanes and Winbore, which appointment hee obserued, and there graunted the liberties, without anye difficultie, the charter whereof is dated: Given by our hand in Kunningmede, betwixt Stanes and Winbore, the 16. of June, the 17. of our raigne, unto which, all the whole Realme was sworne.

Whiles the Barons returned home, the king being left almost alone, hee sent Pandolph the Legate with other to Rome, to the ende that by the Apostolike authoritie, he might make frustrate the purpose of the Barons. Also hee sent Walter Bishop of Winchester, and John Bishop of Norwich, with other, unto the Realmes next adioyning, to procure him souldiers, promising them lands, and large possessions: By means of Pandolph, the Pope disannulled the foresaide Charter and liberties graunted, and also excommunicated the Barons. By the other messengers were procured a great number of men of war, which landing at Dover, the king forthwith besieged Rochester, coueting to burne the Bridge, that no aide should come to the besieged: but Robert Fitz Walter defended the Bridge, and quenched the fire, neuertheless after long assault the castle was yielded.

Matthew Paris.

As a great number of strangers were on the Seas, minding to haue landed at Dover, to haue ayded the king against his Barons, though a sudden tempest they were all dyowned, so that about the coast of the Sea, was cast by such a multitude of men, women, and children, that the aire was soe infected with their putrified bodies: It was saide that of forty thousand, there escaped not one aliue. The king had promised to this people, the Countreies of Norfolk, and Suffolke.

King John deuided his army, the one halfe whereof he put vnder the leading of Sauarke de Maulion a Poitouin, Fulco a Norman, the Earle of Salisburie his bastard brother, Gerard de Sotingham a Flemming, and Walter Buc a Bamber. He himselfe went against the Northerne men. Sauarke besieged the castle of Blaby, that belonged to Geoffrey Maundeuill, the other gaue themselves to waste the Countrey about.

which he they besieged; because diuers Knights and Ladies were fledde thither with their substance: and those robbers entering the Isle, spared neither Clergy nor State, but by tormentes compelled them to tell where their treasure laye.

About the Epiphanie Sayre de Quincy Earle of Winchester, and other, returned from beyonde the seas, bringing with them one and forty ships laden with souldiers: and about the feast of the Purification of our Ladie they besieged Colchester Castle, but hearing that the Barons that were at London made haste to come and succour the Castle, they went backe to Saint Edmondeshury.

Colchester besieged.

The king with his army was long time on the Scottish Seas, and oftentimes invaded the Lands of his Barons in those coasts, burning their Castles, and spoiling their goods; in which expedition he went so farre, that it was not well knowne what was become of him, insomuch, that he was noyed to be dead, and secretly buried at Redding.

King John invaded the lands of his Barons.

Geoffrey Maundeuill died at London of a wound receiued in fasting: he was buried in the Priorye of the Trinitie at London.

The Pope excommunicated the Barons by their peculiar names, but the Chanons of S. Paul in London, and many other Ecclesiasticall persons, with the Barons that remained at London, appealed against this sentence, taking exceptions against it, as pronounced by false suggestion.

The Barons excommunicated.

The Barons sent Sayre de Quincy and other, to Philip king of France, earnestly requesting him to lend his sonne Lewis into this Realme, promising to make him king thereof, which the French king refused to doe, till the Barons had sent him foure and twenty pledges of the best men sons in the kingdome, and then hee sent them aide. Gwalo the Legate was sent from the Pope into France, to forbid Lewis to go into England, but his persuasions nothing preuailed, wherefore he excommunicated them. Also the Abbot of Abingdon, reuelled the excommunication against the Barons, the Citizens of London, and the French, which came to their aide. About Midlent the king besieged the Castle of Colchester, and after a few daies it was deliuered to him by the Frenchmen that kept it, with condition that they might depart free, with all that belonged to them, and that the Englishmen should be suffered to depart vpon reasonable ransom, notwithstanding the Englishmen he put in freight prison. After the King had taken Widingham castle, belonging to Robert de Vere Earle of Oxford, he made haste to besiege London, but the Londoners set open their gates, and were ready to meete with the king ten miles off the city: the king vnderstanding their boldnes and multitude, he withdrew himselfe, but Sauarke de Malone, being suddenly set vpon by the Londoners, losing many of his men, was sore beaten and wounded almost to death.

The Londoners also toke the 65. ships of Pirates besides innumerable other that were dyowned, that had besieged the coasts on the riuer of Thamis.

In the meane time the king hauing knowledge that Lewis meant to come into England, he sent ouer to the French king, the Bishoppe of Winchester, William Marshall the elder, and other, to try if they could perswade the French to stay his son from that iourney, but they returned without audience. The king therfore marching along the Sea coast fortified his Castles, and getting pldges of the fine Ports, gathered a great multitude of ships of Portsmouth, Linnce, Dunwich, and other haucens, brought them with men of warre, and determined to encounter the Frenchmen by Sea, when they came to arrive in England, but by tempest that arose from the South, those shippes were broust, & driven into the South parts of the sea, Lewis hauing al his power ready at Calceis, Chaunceling, and Wiltshir, the South east winde comming about, he set forward toward England, and with some difficulty, because it was a side winde, he landed at Sotmar, in the Isle of Ebanet, the 21. daie of May. From which place he directed his Capittles of title and claime, &c. as are set downe in my larger History. King John being then at Douer, because his soldiers were strangers, durst not go against Lewis, but fledde towards Gilsford, Lewis went straight to Canterbury, where he receiued both castle and citie into his subiection, and after all the other castles in Kent, Douer onely excepted: then came he to London, where he was honorably receiued of the Nobles and Citizens, who altogether sware fealty to him, and did him homage at Westminster: after this taking the castles of Rygat, Gilsford and Fernham, he passed forward to take the king, who as he heard was at Winchester, and had raised by the Standard of the Dragon, as he had meant to giue battell to Lewis, if he came to offer it. But when king John heard that Lewis approached, he laide downe his Dragon, set fire on foure parts of the citie and dedde. The Citizens quickly quenched the fire and went forth to meete Lewis, receiuing him joyfully into their Citie, and swore fealtie to him. Here came to him in manner all the Carles and Barons of the Realme: then taking the castle of Wygham, and the Tower of London, he returned into Kent, and the 22. of July he besieged the castle of Douer, and continued the same till the 14. of October: then Hubert de Brugh and Gerard de Scoting, being not able longer to abide the assaults, obtained truce, that they might send to king John for succour. Whilst this siege remained, king John went: about the land, consuming with fire and sword the possessions of the Barons.

Alexander king of Scots hauing subdued to Lewis all Northumberland, sauing Barnard castle, with the Barons of the North, came vnto Canterbury to Lewis, and did him homage, for that which he ought to hold of the king of England, and as he came towards Lewis with a great army, for feare of king Johns power, as he passed by Barnard castle, which was in the fee of Hugo de Ballioll, in the County of Northwarke folke, he with his Nobles of that countrey went round about the Castle to see whether it were weake in any place, and assaultable, and a certaine archer within the Castle shot a bart, and smote Eustach de Velay vpon the forehead, and pierced his braine, so that he died immediately. This Eustach was a noble and mighty man, and had married the daughter of Scots sister, so that the king, and the noble men were sore abashed: and when the king of Scots had done his homage, he returned home into his countrey.

About this time it chanced that the Viscount of Melin a noble man of France, which came with Lewis into England lay very sicke in the Citie of London, who when he knew that death approached, called to him certaine of the Barons of England, vnto whom he declared in effect as followeth: I am soie byschozen, for your subuersion, and desolation, whereof you know nothing: for Lewis and his friends of the Carles and Barons wish him haue noone, that if it be his chance to subdue England, and to be crowned king, he would banish out of the realme for euer, al these which now doe take his part, and persecute king John, as traitors to their king, and will rote all their kindred out of the earth, and to the ende, you shall not doubt hereof to be true, I which now lie here a dying, vnder perill of my soule, affirme this to be true, and that I was one that did sweare the same with Lewis. Now therefore from henceforth provide for your owne commoditie, and profit, and keep this secret which I haue told you, and when he had said this, he died. The Barons perceiuing what danger they were in by Lewis, who had giuen to the French men the lands and castles which pertained to the Barons, and when anie murmured against Lewis, he cast in their teeth, that they were traitors, &c. they believed what the noble man had told them. This did also much increase their heauinesse, that they were euerie day excommunicated, and deprived of all earthly honour, so that they were in great anguish both of body and soule: Wherefore many desired how to returne into the allegiance of king John.

The king marched through Norfolk and Suffolke, till he came to Linne, where the Colonellmen receiued him with great joy, and honoured him with large giftes, there he appointed Sauanik de Malion to be Captaine, who beganne to fortifie the Towne: but here (as it was saide) filling his belly so much, as he was thereto greatly giuen, he gotte a surfeit, and the retchless all fell into a flure. Afterward taking his iourney towards the North, in the water which is called Spillstreame (they saide) hee lost suddenly all the Cartes and chariots, with his treasure, and precious princely beuel, and furniture of his chappell, which he set most by, for the earth opened in the midst of the wanes on the marches, and the whirlepit of the deepe so swallowed by both men and horses, that none escaped to bring king John tidings. The king with his army going before, elapsed very narrowly, and men said, that night he lay at the Abbey of Solinshene, where he remained two daies, and there (as men supposed) he took such heauines of heart for the losse of his treasure in the waldes, that he was taken with an extream ague, and began to be verie sore sicke, the pernicious greedie eating of peaches, and drinking of new cider, increased his sickness, and kindled the heat of the ague the more strongly, notwithstanding in the very beake of the day, with great paine, he went to the castle of Slesford in Lindsey, belonging to the Bishp of Lincoln. There he was let blood (saie some) but so it happened, that about this time, to wit, on the 14. of Octob. Hubert de Burgo & Gerard de Scoting, being not able longer to abide the assaults of Lewis and his complices, obtained of him truce, that they might send to king John for succour, which messengers, when they were come to Slesford and had declared their case, that is, that except he would rescue them in the castle of Dover, the same must be delivered up to Lewis: his disease with griefe conceived thereat, increased much, so that on the next morning, he could scanty on horsebacke come to the castle of Newmarke, which castle also belonged to the said Bishp of Lincoln, in which place the sickness so increased in the space of 3. or 4. daies, that he took the counsell of his Confessor, and received the Sacrament at the hands of the Abbot of Croton, and then he made Henry his eldest sonne, the heire of his kingdome, causing all that were about him to sweare to him, and sent Letters sealed with his own seale, to all the sheriffes of England, & castle keepers, bidding them to be attendant and diligent to the said Henry. When these things were thus done, the abbot of Croton asked him if he should chance to die, where he would have his body buried: To whom the king answered and said, I commit my soule to God, and my body to S. Thomas, and after ward, to witte, in the night which followed next after the feast of S. Luke, he departed this life in the said castle of Newmarke, from whom his servants taking all that was about him fled, not leaving so much of any thing (worth the carriage) as would cover his dead carcase. At the time of king Iohns death, there came to him messengers of certaine Barons of England, to the number of 40. with letters requiring to have come againe to his peace, & allegiance, but he lying in the extremities of death could not give attendance to them, he deceased on the nineteenth of October, Anno 1216. When he had reigned 17. yeres, five moneths, lacking eight daies, at the age of 51. yeres. The Constable of the castle, caused the kings body to be holvelled by the Abbot of the Chanons at Croton, which Abbot was expert in Physicke, and also at that time, the kings Disposition, to the end it might be the more honourably carried, his bowels being powdered, were buried in the Abbey of Croton, unto the which Abbey, king Iohn had on his death-bed given tenn pound the yere of good land for ever, his body was honourably conveyed to Worcester, and there buried in the Cathedral Church, nere unto the body of Bishp Willone.

Thus have I set downe the life (though much abridged) and death of king Iohn, after the writing of Rog. Windour, Rad. Niger, Rad. Cogshall, a namelesse Chanon of Barnewell, Mathew Paris, and other, who all lived when the king reigned, and wrote for that time what they sawe, or heard credibly reported. Notwithstanding, I thinke good (as heretofore) to set downe concerning his death, as is reported by a namelesse Authour, a continuor of Geoffrey Monmouth, in the raisine of Edward the third, and since increased, printed by William Caxton, and therefore called Caxtons Chronicle. This booke (I saie) and other after-commers report, that King Iohn was poisoned by a Sponke of Swinsted abbey in Lincolnshire, for saying that if he might live halfe a yere, he would make an halfe penny loafe of bread, worth 11. shillings, &c. as ye may reade in the said common English Chronicle. But to conclude, howsoever he died, certaine it is, that he reigned with trouble enough, as by the premises may appear.

He had three sonnes, Henry and Richard, and three daughters, Isabel the Emperesse, Elianor Queene of Scots, and Jane: Geoffrey a base sonne gotten on

King Henrie the third.

HENRIE boine at Winchester, the eldest sonne of Iohn, of the age of nine yeres, began his raigne the nineteenth of October, in the yere 1216. hee was crowned at Gloucester on the 28. day of October, by Peter Bishp of Winchester, and Jocelyne Bishp of Bath, in the presence of Walo the Legate, Sylvester Bishp of Worcester, William Bishp of Coventrie, and many other Prelates, Isabell the Queene, Ranulph Earle of Chester, William Marshall Earle of Pembroke, William Earle Ferrers, William de la Bruere, Saucric de Maulion, Iohn Marshall, Philip de Albincro, with the Abbots and other in great number: being crowned by common consent, the Gouvernement of the king and kingdome was committed to the Legate, to the Bishp of Winchester, and to William Marshall Earle of Pembroke. These things being knowne abroad, those that were of the contrary part, took great indignation thereat: and because there should be no hope left to the new king to prevale against them, they took a solemne oath, and swore they would never holde any lande of any heire of king Iohn; but the Legate maintaining the kings part, admonished, prayed, and commanded them that were disobedient to the king, to doe the like as he did, he calling a council at Wyndesore, caused the bishops and prelates to incline to his part: Notwithstanding, Lewis did what he could to the contrary, spoyling their goods, and possessions, yet could he not get one of the Prelates to doe him homage, or feaultie. William Marshall Earle of Pembroke perswaded the Countesse, Caille herpers, and other to doe their services to the young king Henry, promising them great gifts, and large possessions, whereby they turned king Henry much more faithfully then they did King Iohn his father, for they thought the iniquity of the father ought not to be imputed unto the son. This did also greatly incourage them, when they understood that every Sunday Lewis and his complices were excommunicated: Lewis and the Barons being not able to winne Dover Castle, determining therefore to subdue the smaller castles first, they remooved their siege, and came to London where on the first of November, the Tower of London was delivered to them. From thence Lewis with the Barons went and besieged the Castle of Warwicke, from the twelfth of November, till the first of December, on which day the castle was yielded: about the same time his men had won the Isle of Gyl, all, except a fortrell within the same, when in the kings people were inclosed. The citie of Lincoln also being won againe by his partakers, & the castle besieged, Lewis went to Bathamsted, and besieged the castle there. In time of which siege, there went out of the castle certain knights and soldiers, who with violence entered upon the Barons, took their Chariots with their carriages, and the standard of William de Mandeuill, and returned into their castle therewithall: but in the end, after long siege, by the kings commandement, they yielded the castle to Lewis on the 20. of December.

On the next morning Lewis came to Saint Albons, and demanded of the Abbot to doe unto him homage, which the Abbot refused; but Lewis swearing he would set the Abbey on fire, the Abbot after manie threats, by the perswasion of Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, fined himselte and the whole towne for 80. markes of silver. Which being done, Lewis returned to London; And a truce was taken till the Octaves of the Epiphanie, The feast of Christmas being past, the truce yet continuing, Lewis called his favourers unto a Councell at Cambridge, and the Governours of the king called the like councell at Wyford. All theie laboured to haue compounded upon a peace, or at the least to haue prolonged the truce, but when truce could not be prolonged, Lewis besieged the Castle of Herebingham, and at one selfe same time, the saide Castle, and also the Castle of Wyford were both rendered, and so likewise were the Castles of Norwich and Colchester, for to haue the truce continued till a moneth after Easter: And by this meanes all the East partes of England fell to Lewis.

In this meane space, to wit, on the 20. day of January, the knights and soldiers of the Castle of Mount-fortell in Leicestershire went out to robbe, which when the knights and soldiers of Nottingham understood, they met & fought with them, took some of their knights, fourtene of their soldiers, & drove the rest of them, and returned.

The 22. of Januarie, Falcarius de Brent, a wicked robber, having gathered a number of ruffians out of the Castles of Wyford, Northampton, Bedford, and Windsor, came to the abbey of S. Albons in the evening, spoiled the town, took men, women and children, and bound them verie sore, and slew some, so that the Abbot to save the abbey and towne from burning, was faine to giue to Falcarius one hundred pound of silver.

About this time, the ambassadours of Lewis, which were at Rome about his busines there, did giue him to understand, that except he went out of England, the sentence of excommunication, which Wale the Legate had pronounced against him, should be confirmed by the Pope, upon Maundie Thursday: for this cause therefore truce was taken betwene Lewis and king Henry until one moneth after Easter, all thinges to remaine in state as they then were.

Philip king of France called his sonne Lewis by speciall commandement, to returne into France, unto a councell at Lions, to be holden about Wholent, which thing the English men took heavily, but hee retaining an othe on the Evangelists to returne before the truce should be expired, they were some what pacified. He being passed over, straight way William Earle of Salisburie, William Earle of Arundell, William Earle of Warren, and many other, revolted to the kings side. Also William Marshall reclaimed William his eldest

sonne unto the kings allegiance: and thus became the part of Lewis weakned very much, and the kings power was greatly increased: And being divided into diuers places, they besieged many castles at one time, recovering the castles of Sarlebozow, Fernham, Winchester, Cicester, and other which they demolished.

In the feast of Easter, by procurement of William Marshall the elder, Ranulph Earle of Chester, William Earle of Albemarle, William Earle Ferrers, Robert de Veteriponte, Brienus de insula, William de Entelope, Philip de Merc, Robert de Gangy, Falcarius de Brent, with his Castle keeper and manie other were gathered together, to besiege the Castle of Mount-fortell in Leicestershire, the chiefe keeper of which Castle was named Henric de Braybrooke, who sent to Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, then at London with the French men, and requiring him to come to their aide: whereupon the saide Earle of Winchester, to whom the Castle belonged, went to Lewis, then lately returned out of France, requiring him to sende some aide to remove the siege, and so a power was sent out of London 600. knights, and 20000. armed soldiers, they had for capitaines, Earle Patricius, the marshal of France, Sayer de Quincy, Robert fitz Walter, and other, who marching toward, spoiled S. Albons, the church at Kaddborne, Dunstable, and so forth, toward the north; to raise the siege before Mount-fortell; but Ranulph Earle of Chester, and other left off their siege, and went to the Castle of Nottingham. The Barons somewhat finding the siege to be removed, they march toward Lincoln, where Gilbert de Gaunt and other had laide siege: they assaulted the Castle sharply, but W. Marshall the elder sent thither a great power, such as would be in this place too long to write, and therefore I referre the same to my larger booke. But to be short, these with much difficultie brake the gates of the Citie of Lincoln, and entering the towne, they boldly smote upon their enemies, and fought there a cruel battell, wherein the kings part too much relied the barons, that they slewe and took the most part of them: which being done, the kings company fell upon the earle of Perch, & smote him through the baines, so that he fel downe dead. Thus when the greatest part of the French men were slaine, the residue took them to flight, the Barons on the kings side following them that fledde, took manie in the chase, amongst the which was taken Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, Henry de Bohune Earle of Hereford, Gilbert de Gaunt whom Lewis had lately made Earle of Lincoln, Robert fitz Walter, Richard de Mountfichet, William de Mowbray, William de Bellocampo, William Manduice, Almaricus de Hacary, Roger de Crafe, William de Cahule, William de Rose, Robert de Resperit, Radulph Chanduice, and many more. The kings soldiers spoiled the citie to the bare walls. This battell was fought on the 19. date of Maie.

On the next morning there came news to the king, that the castle of Mount-fortell was taken: whereupon the shiriffe of Nottinghamshire was commanded to lay the same flat with the ground.

Lewis though this misfortune that fell to him at Lincoln, fell in despair of any good end to come to his purpose, and therefore sent messengers to his father, father, and to Blanch his wife, who forthwith dispatched to him a power: But the coasts by Will. Marshalls commandement were kept. And now upon St. Bartholomews day the Apostle the navy of Frenchmen were committed to the wicked man Eustach the mynne or monke, to be conduited to the aid of Lewes then being at London. These being entred into the sea, had a faire winde, which draue them vpon the English coast: where when they were sailed a great waite on their bolage, Hubert de Burgo, and they of the ports, clypping them to be twentie shippes, and a great number of smaller vesselles, and galleies wel armed, they durst not ioine battaile with them on the sea, hating themselves not pass fortye galleies and shippes, but hauing the aid of the kings Souldours, felt stoutlie vpon them on the backe part, made great slaughter of them. The Englishmen also had Gallies with pyon boikes, which gologed the shippes of their enemies, whereby they were drownded in a moment, there was a cruell fight betwene them, but the Frenchmen in shorte space were vicerlie vanquished: Eustachle Moyne was slaine by Richard a bastard sonne of king John.

These thinges beeing thus doone, William earle Marshall besieged the City of London round about, as wel by water as by land, so to cause them with in to yeelde: wherupon Lewes beeing in so greate a strait, gaue vnderstanding to the Legate, and to earle Marshall, that he woude bee ruled by their Councell in all thinges vpon condition, that sauing his honour, and auoiding slaughter of his men he might haue peace conuenient: wherupon both parties met, & talked together, next vnto the towne of Stanes, hard by the riuer of Thamis, th. First Lewis & the ercommunicate persons of his side, did sweare by the holy Evangelists, they should stand to the order and iudgment of the church, and should be faithful, &c. Salisbury, William Marshall Earle of Pembroke, Gouernour of the kings person and Realme, and David Earle of Huntingdon, brother to William king of Scots, William Marshall was honourably buried at London in the newe Temple, vpon the 15. of April, concerning whome a certaine Versifier made these verses:

Anglia: Mercurium Normannia: Gallia Martem.*

He was a noisome tamer of the Irish men, & honor vnto the English men, he has bene a merchant vnto the Normans, for he had purchased many things in it: vnto the Frenchmen he was a warrior, and an invincible knight. He left after him five sonnes, and five daughters, which daughters were thus married. Mawd to Hugh Bigot, Ioane to Warren de Mounthensey, Isabell to Gilbert de Clare, Sibill to William Earle of Dorby, and Eue to Will. de Bruse, betwixt which five, all his great inheritance was after diuided, for all his sonnes died without issue, and were euerie one after other Earles of Pembroke. After the death of William Marshall, the king remained in custodie of the Bishop of Winchester.

About the same time, Lewis sonne to Philippe king of France, at the instigation of his father, went with a great army to the City of Tholouse, there to assaile the Heretikes called Albigenes, but he prevailed nothing at all against them.

In the siege of that city, Simon Mountfort earle and captaine of Lewis army was slaine, and at another castle not far off, was slaine the brother of the said Simon, for the death of which two noble warriors, great lamentation was made, and Lewis returned againe into France without any victorie.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Warleborough.

About midlent Pandolph the Legate called a councell at London, the archbishops, bishops, Abbots, and other being present, the Abbot of Welles was consecrated Bishp of Ely. Vnto the which Councell Robert sometime Abbot of Thomey brought the Popes letters, which commanded his Legate Pandolph and Steph. Archb. of Cantebury, that they should see the King to be newly crowned, because his first coronation, by reason of the troubles, was not so solemnly done as was decent: wherupon order was taken, and on Whitsunday he was crowned at Westminster by Stephen Langton archbishop of Cantebury.

Ralphe Earle of Chester returned from Damata in the siege whereof hee had set forth himselfe and his people, with most large expences, whereby hee wanted praise and honour before God and men: But Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, with Robert Fitz Walter and other arriving at Damata, after the same was wonne, died there.

This yere on Whitsun Euen, was the new worke of our Ladies chappel at Westminster, begun, King Henry being the sodner, who laid the first stone.

Proclamation was made, that all strangers should auoide the realme, except such as came with merchandise, and to make sale of them vnder the kings licence.

little Britain came out of the holy land into England, and builded the castles of Charley, Besfone, and the Abbey of Delacresse.

William of St. Maries Church, bishop of London, did of his owne free will resigne his bishoppe, the moow after the consecration of St. Paul, Eustach de Fawconbridge then treasurer of the Erchequer, was elected bishop of London, whose election was confirmed by Pandolph the legate. And the same Pandolph ceased from executing the office of legate, and returned to Rome.

The frier preachers, thirtene in number were sent into Englande, and having to their priors Gilbert de Fraxineto in companie of Peter de Roch Bish. of Winchester came to Canterburie, and there presenting themselves before the Archbishop Stephen, he commended the said priors to preach before him, and liked him so well, that he ever after loved their order. On Saint Laurence daie they came to London, and so to Orforde on the daie of the Assumption, in whose house they builded an Oratorie, and also those scholes which since were called St. Edwards scholes, in whose parish they took a place and there for a time remained, and after that removed to the place without the wals, which the king assigned them.

King Henry subdued the Welshmen which rebelled.

The noblemen granted to the king two marches of Alacer of everie hie of land.

Isabel the kings mother, without making her sonne or his Counsell priue to her purpose, went over into Fraunce, and there married with the earle of Barcy Hugh Bronne, unto whome she had bene betrothed before her first marriage with king John.

King Henry gave his sister Jane to Alexander B. of Scots, who married her at Poike: and Hubert de Burgh earle of Kent, and chiefe Justice of England, married the king of Scots sister Margaret. William de Albeneto earle of Arundell, died coming from the holy land, who was conveyed into Englande, and buried at Wilmonham, a priore of his foundation.

A Provinciall councill was holden at Orforde, by Stephen Langton Archbishop of Canterburie, and his Suffragane bishops and others, in the conventual Church of Winc. sixtene daies after Easter, where were degraded a priest and a Deacon, the priest for homicide, the Deacon for sacrilege and theft committed. Another Deacon offending more deeply, denied the profession of Christian religion, and for the love he bare to a Jewish woman, caused himselfe to be circumcised, following the Jewish rites and customs: hee was degraded, and being left as a laie person and Apostate, was condemned and committed to the fire, by the servants of Falcatus, wherein he miserably ended his life. There was also a young man and two women brought before them, the young man would not come in anie Church, nor be partaker of the Sacraments, but had suffred himselfe to be crucified, in whome the scars of all the wounds were to be seene, in his hands, head, side, and face, and he refused to be called Jesus of these women and other. One of the women being old, was accused for bewitching the young man unto such madness, and also altering her owne name) procured herselfe to be called Mary the mother of Christ: They being consist of these

On Saint James daie, the citizens of London kept games of defence and jousting, nere unto the Hospitall of Maulde, where they gotte the mairerie of the men of the Suburbes. The Bayliffe of Westmister desiring to be revenged, proclaimed a game to be at Westmister upon Lammas day, whereunto the citizens of London repaired, & when they had played a while, the Bailie with the men of the Suburbes barnessed themselves and fell to fighting, that the citizens being foullie wounded, were forced to runne into the Citie, where they rang the common Bell, and assembled the Citizens in great number, and when the matter was declared, everie man wished to reuenge the fact. The mayo of the citie being a wise man and a quiet, willed them first to move the Abbot of Westmister of the matter, and if hee would promise to see & mendes made, it were sufficient: But a certaine Citizen named Constantine Fitz Arnulph, willed that all Houses of the Abbot and Bayliffe should be pulled downe, which worde being once spoken, the common people issued out of the Citie without anie order, and fought a cruell battaile for Constantine the first pulled downe manie houses, and oftentimes with a loud voice cryed, in praise of the said Constantine, the ioy of the mountaine, the ioy of the mountaine, God helpe, and the lord Lodowick.

A few daies after this tumult, the Abbot of Westmister came to London to Philippe Dawbney, one of the kings counsell, to complaine of the injuries done to him, which the Londoners perceiving, besette the house about, and took by violence twelve of the Abbots Horses alwaie, cruellie beating of his men, &c. But whilles the foresaid Dawbney, laboured to pacifie the uprore, the Abbot gotte out at a backe doore of the house, and so by a boate on the Thames hardlie escaped, the citizens throwing stones after him in great abundance. These things being thus done, Hubert de Burgo, Justiciar of England, with a great army of men came to the tower of London, and sent for the Bishop and Abbermen, of whome hee enquired for the principall Authours of this faction. Then Constantine, who was constant in the sedition, was more constant in his answer, affirming that he had done it, and that he had don much lesse then he ought to have done: The Justiciar took him and two other with him, and in that morning early sent them to Falcatus by water, with a great number of armed men, who brought Constantine to the gallowes, and when hee sawe the rope about his necke, he offered for his life 15000. marcas, but that would not save him: he was hanged with Constantine his nephew, and Galfide, that proclaimed his proclamation on the 16. of August.

Then the Justiciar entering the Citie with a great army, caused to be apprehended as many as he could learne to be culpable, whose feet and hands he caused to be cut off, which crueltie caused many to flee the Citie.

The king took of the Citizens Arrie pledges, which he sent to blunders Calmes: he deposed the mayo, appointing a Gardien or keeper over the citie, and caused a great gibbet to be made, & after heauy threatnings, the citizens were reconciled.

On holte Wednesday was great thunder and lightning throughout all England, and such great floods of water followed, with great windes and tempest, which continued till Candlemas, that the yere following wheat was sold for twelve shillings the quarter.

On St. Andrewes day a great thunder overthrew Churches, Castelles, and houses, so that scantille ante bodie escaped free from harine by this tempest. A knight and his wife and 8. men of his household, with the fall of his house were slaine, in Pilardune a village in Northwiltshire.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Oxford, and after returned to London, In a counceill holden at London the Archbyschop of Canturburie and othre the nobilitie and Barons of the Realme, required the king to confirme the liberties, for the which the waite was moved against his father, and that himselfe at the departing of Lewes out of Englands, swore to observe: whereupon forthwith the king sent his Letters to all the Sherriffes of the Realme, commanding them to inquire by the oathes of the lawfull men in euerie Countie, what liberties were in Englands in the time of king Henry his Grandfather, and to send the inquisition so made to London 15. daies after Easter.

As the Bishop of Ely was giving orders, at Barnwell in the first weeke of Lent, there rose such a tempest of raine and thunder, that all in the church were ready to fall to the grounde, and such flashes of lightning entred the Church, that ech man thought it had bene set on fire, and such a filthy stench arose withall, that manie of the companie fell sicke thereof, and hardelie escaped death. At the wise whilste the Bishop of London was at Chelmsford giving orders, a greates tempest of winde and raine annoied such as came thither at that time: whereof it may be gathered (saith mine author) how highlie God is displeased with such as come to receiue orders, to the end they may liue incontinently, and at ease, of the stipends appointed to Churchmen, and the offerings of the faithfull, giuing themselves to banquetting and vncleanesse, and so with vnclean and filthy bodies (but more vnclean soules) presume to minister vnto God the author of all puritie and cleanness.

John de Brennes king of Ierusalem, and chiefe master of the Hospitall there, came into England, and required aid to win Ierusalem, but hauing rich gifts giuen him, he returned with small comfort.

Leolyn prince of Wales founded the castle of Mountgomery, and there with certayne Englishmen, Hugh Lacy and his retinue, in despite of the king, attempted to constrain William Marshall earle of Denbyshe, and othre, to yeld to them: but the whole countrie rose in armes, and ouercame them.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Southampton, with the Archbyschop, and a great number of knights, but the earle of Chester with othre conspirators against the king, kept their feast at Leicester, thenceforn the king and his iudicials, for the custodies of lands and castles, which the king required of them. The archbyschop of Canturbury and his suffragane bishops, excommunicated all the disturbers of the king and Realme.

The

The earle of Chester and his complices, percelating that the king had a greater number of men of armes then they, and also fearing the excommunication, came to the king at Southampton, yelding their Castles and honours which appertained to the crowne. Then the king laid siege about the castle of Bedford, that Falcarius had long kept by strength, which siege hee continued by the space of eight weekes, and tooke the Castle on the fiftenth of August, on which date he caused to be hanged to the number of eightie two men of armes and othre souldiers, Falcarius de brent, who was fledde into Wales, hearing that the Castle was taken, and his men slaine, under the conduct of the Byschop of Couentre, came to Bedford and fell at the kings feet, requiring mercy. The king deliuered him to Eustace bpschop of London, and the castle was made an heape of stones. There was granted to the king throughout England two shillings for euerie carncate of land.

The friers minors first arrived at Douer nine in number, five of them remained at Canturburie, & vnto there build the first count of friers minors that euer was in England: the othre foure came to London, and lodged at the preaching friers the space of fiftene daies, and then hired an house in Cornhill, of John Trauers one of the Sherriffes, they builded there little celles wherein they inhabited. The deuotion of the Cittizens towards them, and also the multitude of the friers so increased, that they were by the Cittizens remoued to a place in Saint Nicholas Shambles, which John Iwyn Cittizen and Mercer of London appropriated vnto the communalite of the Citty, to the vse of the saide friers, and became himselfe a lay brother.

William Ioynar builded their quier, Henry Wales sometime Pastor of London, the bodie of the church, Walter Potter Alderman, the Chapterhouse: Gregorie Roklie the Doctar; Bartholomew of the castle made the Refectory.

The fiftenth part of all mens goods moueable within the Realme, as well of the Cleargie as of the Laitie, was granted to the king to ayde him in his right beyond the Seas, and the king granted to the barons and people, the liberties which they long time had sued for: hee caused charters to be made, and sent into euerie countrie twaine, one of the common liberties, and the othre of the forest.

Richard the kings brother, and his uncle William Longa spey earle of Salisbury and many othre, were sent into Gascoigne, who subdued the same, and recovered possiters.

This yere died Hugh Bygot earle of Castangles, or Canbydgeshire, &c. al whose lands and honours the king appointed to the colodoy of Hubert de Burgh the Justiciar.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester, from whence hee removed to Sparlebozow, where he was taken with a greivous sickness, and lay there manie daies like to die.

In the meane season, while the king at Sparlebozow recovered his sickness, there came to him William de Longa spata, barbarde sonne to king Henry the second, that by gift of king Richard had married Ela the daughter and heire of the earle of Salisbury, who after long and dangerous traualles on the Seas, had

This yere Richard de Marisco bishop of Durham like an olde persecuter of religious persons, for the maintenance of his most filthy quarrell he picked against them, came with a great rolot of men of Lawe towards London, and lodged in the Abbey of Peterborough, after he had dauntly refreshed himselfe with costly meates, he went to bed in health, but was found dead in the next morning, he was buried at Durham, when he had late Bish. nine yeres. Also Benedict bishop of Rochester, and Pandolph bishop of Exeter deceased: into the which Pandolph succeeded Tade Blundeuile, cleark of the kings Exchequer, through helpe of Hubert de Burgo the Iusticiar.

The same yere also deceased William Brewer Lord de la Hiche, Loyde of Crumster in Devonshire, and was buried at Dunkewell an Abbey which he had founded. He had bene a worthy capitaine in the holy land vnder king Richard.

King Henry kept his Christmase at Reading, and in the holy daies died William Carle of Essex, for whom many soze lamented, because he was a litle young man.

The king blaming the citizens of London, because they had giuen to Lewis the French king (now deceased) at his departure out of England 5000. marks, he compelled them to pay the like summe to him, beside the fiftenth parte of their mouables: and of the burgesses of Southampton he toke 1200. marks.

In a council at Oxford the king proclaimed, that so far as he was not of lawfull age, he would rule himselfe at his pleasure, and forsooth made of the charters of the liberties & franchises to be frustrate, alledging, that they were granted while he was vnder ward of other, and had not power of his owne body: so it followed, that who so would enioy the liberties afore granted, must reuue their charters of the kings newe seale, with such a price as the Iusticiar awarded them.

Shortly after the Barons declared unto the king, that except he would reuue the charter of liberties of the forest, which lately he had cancelled at Oxford, they would compell him by the sword.

King Henry kept his Christmase at Poike, and from thence went straight to London, but by the way, finding fault with the measures of coyne, wine, and oyle, he brake some of them, and caused other to be bent, commanding greater measures to be made, and the waight of bread to be made heavier, and the transgressors to be grieuouly amerced.

Stephen Langton Archbishop of Canterbury deceased at his manor of Slimdon in Suffex, and was buried at Canterbury.

This yere during all the summer were great thunders and lightnings, which burned many houses in sundrie places, and slew both men and beastes: and in the harvest following, fell great raines which did great hindrance to the tinning of the coyne.

Eustace Bishop of London deceased, in whose place succeeded Roger Niger, a learned man, and of much worthines, a chapan of the church of Saint Paule.

Also Geoffrey de Burgo bishop of Ely deceased, he gaue 200. acres of moze in the marsh of Wisbich to the augmentation of the Bishop of Ely. In whose place succeeded Hugh Norwold Abbot of S. Edmundsbury.

King Henry kept his Christmase at Oxford, the nobles of the realme being there present, where there came vnto him the Archbishop of Burdeaur being sent from the nobles of Gascoigne, Aquitaine, and Poytlow, vnto whom he returned honorably; there came also other solemne embassadors out of Foyrmandie of the like arrand, that was to sollicite the king on the behalfe of the noble men of those partes, that he would boughse to come thither in proper person, promising him that they would all come to him with hoise, barneise, and all other furniture, and that all the people of those Countreies should stedfastly abide by him, by whose helpe he might get againe all his inheritance. The king taking no other counsell then onely Hubert de Burgo his Iusticiar, gaue them answer, that he would defer that matter till he saw a better time, and so sent away the embassadors.

Robert de Bingham was made bishoppe of Salisburie, who did slowly (by the helpe of God, the king, and good people) prosecute the building of the new church, which his predecessor Richard Poore lately translated to Durham, had begunne.

King Henry dubbed knight, John the sonne of Hubert de Burgo Iusticiar of England, Richard Wetherster, alias Richard the Great, Deane of Paules, was made and consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury.

This yere the Vniuersitie of Paris endured great afflictions and injuries at the citizens and lay mens hands, whereupon the k. wrote his letters to the masters and scholars that if they would come into England and there continue their study, he would appoint them cities and towens with priuiledges and liberties for their abode, as should be to their contentations, 16. of July.

so great a power of horsemen and footmen, as never any of his predecessors at any time had the like, where there came unto him out of Ireland, Scotland, and Gallogay, that the number was marvellous, thinking to have transported over such a power as were able to have won againe into his dominion all those lands that his father had lost: but when they came to take shipping, they wanted carriage for halfe the army: whereof when the king understood, he imputed all the fault to Hubert de Burgo Justiciar, and openly called him old traitor, casting him in the sea, that hee had taken five thousande markes of the quene of France, to hinder his purpose, in his rage, drawing out his sword, would have slaine the Justice, had not the Earle of Chester and other runne betwene, and boydded him away till the kings wrath was appeased.

At that time in the same haven arrived the Earle of Wyrtaine, who by other was bound to conduct the king into his land: but the said Earle and other persuaded the king to deferre that matter till Easter following, and the Justiciar was made friends with the king.

King Henry kept his Christmas at York with the king of Scots, whom he had bidden to that feast, the Archbishop of that Citie being present, with the Carles and Barons, and a great family. This feast was royally kept three daies: and on the fourth, when the Sermon was ended, the king of Scots returned homeward with divers rich gifts, and king Henry basked towards London.

Upon the day of Saint Pauls conversion, when Roger Niger bishop of London was at Masse in the cathedrall church of S. Paul, a great multitude of people being there, suddenly the weather waxed darke, that one could scarcely see another in y<sup>e</sup> church, and suddenly an horrible thunderclap lighted on the church, that the same was shaken as though it should have fallen, and out of a darke cloude came such lightning, that all the church seemed to be on fire, and such a stincke that all men thought they should have died. Thousandes of men and women ranne out of the church, and being astonished, fell upon the ground boie of all understanding, none of all the multitude carried in the church, save the bishop and one deacon, which stode still at the high Altar awaiting the will of God. And when the ayre was cleansed, the multitude came into the church againe, and the bishop made an end of his masse.

King Henry with a great army sailed into Wyrtaine, where, after hee had ranged the country, and made many spoiles, besieged the City of Chaunte, and did nothing but spend great summes of treasure, the earles and Barons also, seeing that Hubert the Justiciar would not suffer them to do any thing against the enemies, they made baguets & feasts as they were wont to do in England, and tended nothing but eating & drinking: but the poorer sort of men, to maintaine themselves, sold all that they had, and begged themselves for ever.

King Henry set all things in order for the keeping of the countrey of Wyrtaine, and so toke shipping, and on the 25. of October landed at Portsmouth, having spent and wasted an infinite summe of money, & given over unto death an innumerable number of noble men, or at the least brought them low with sickness and extreme poverty. King Henry kept his Christmas at Lambeth, where Hubert the Justiciar pouched all things for the feast, which being ended, the king called the prelates and nobles of the realme to a counsell at Westminster, where hee demanded of them a great subsidy, which would not be granted.

Richard the kings brother married Isabel Countesse of Gloucester, late wife to Gilbert Earle of Gloucester lately deceased, and sister to William Marshall earle of Pembroke: and the marriage being scantily finished, the said William died, and was buried in the new Temple at London by his father. His brother Richard succeeded him in the Earldome.

The 3. of May, the king sent his letters to the townefolkes of Oxford, and Cambridge, rebuking them for their over high renting of their houses upon the scholars of the Universities: commanding them therefore to temper themselves in their said rents, and that the same be rated according to the ancient custome of the said Universities by two masters, and two burgeses. Likewise the king hearing that the Universities were pestered with many that failed themselves to be scholars, the which were none indeede, he commanded the shiriffes of Cambridge shire, and Oxford shire to make proclamation that no cleark should abide in any of the said Universities, except he liued under the discipline and tuition of some master of a scholl, upon paine of imprisonment of all such as should so remaine in any of the said townes above 15. daies after the proclamation.

Leolin prince of Wales spoiled the lands of the Barons that were on the borders of Wales, wherefore the king gathered a great power at Oxford, and went against the Welshmen, and builded the castle of Mauid, which before had bene destroyed.

The Jewes builded a Synagoge at London very curiously, but the Christians obtained of the king that it should be dedicated to our blessed Lady, and was since by the same king Henry, granted to the brethren of Saint Anthony of Akenna, and so called Saint Anthonies Hospitall in London, and since annexed to Windso: Colledge, by Edward the fourth, about Ann. 1485. Shortly after which time, the same church of S. Anthony was new builded by John Tate mayor of London.

King Henry being informed of the hard dealing of the townefolkes of Cambridge against the scholars, in rating their house rents, directed his writte to the Mayor and Bailiffes, remembryng unto them the multitude of scholars resorting to their towne for cause of studie, as well from divers partes beyond the seas, as at home, whereof themselves ought not to be a little topsall, considering also that himselfe and his whole realme received thereby great honour and commoditie: And therefore in the ende commaunded them to measure themselves more temperatly in rating their saide houses, to be rated by two masters, and two burgeses, according to the ancient custome of the Universities, bechaung themselves in such wise, as no further clamour came to him for that businesse.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester with great ioy and solace, looking for the returne of certain messengers, whom hee had sent into Pouence to contract a marriage with Elianor the daughter of Raymond Earle of Provence: he was married at Canterburie by Edmond Archbishop of Canter-burie, and crowned at Westminster the twentieth daie of January. To this coronation resorted so great a number of all Estates, that the Citie of London was scarce able to receiue them. The citie was adorned with silkes, and in the night with lampes, cressets, and other lights, without number, besides manie pageants, and strange deuises which were shewed. The citizens robe to meet the king and queene, being clothed in long garments, embroidered about with Golde and like of dyuers colours: their hoeses finelie trapped in accorde to the number of 360. euery man bearing golden or silver cups in their

Odo cardinall, by the commouement of king Henry came into England as Legate from the pope, the nobles of the realme not knowing thereof till his landing: wherefore manie conceiued great indignation against the king, and said he peruertheth all things, he breaketh promise, law and faith, in all points, and hath married a stranger without our consent, he knowledg of his friends, and naturall subiects: now he giueth a thing, and by and by reuoketh it againe:
and now he secretelie hee hath called in the Legate: it was saide, that Edmund Archbishop of Canterburie did blame the king, especially for calling in the Le-gate, whereby he knew that great preiudice of his dignitie would ensue, to the great detriment of the whole Realme, but the king not regarding the Archb-

Spanie strange and great fishes came ashore, whereof eleven were Seabuls, and one of huge bignesse passed by the river of Euphrates, through the Bridge at London banbury, till he came as far as the kings house at Spottlake, where he was killed.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster, and many noble men with him, where, when the solemne service was done in the church, the king dining in the great hall of Westminster palace, did there place the Legate in the most honourable place of the table, to wit, in the midst (which the noblemen took in euill parte) the king sate himselfe on his right hand, and the Archbishop of Yorke on the left (for the Archbishop of Canterbury Edmund was dead) and then all the prelates and nobles according to their degrees, so the king would haue it, and did himselfe set the guests.

King Henry dining in Westminster hall, placed his guests there.

The fourth day after Christmas the Legate was by the Pope called home to the court of Rome: whereupon taking his leave of all the prelates, he took his journey towards the sea, whome the king with great pompe and an innumerable companie of the nobles, with trumpets sounding before them brought to

to the Sea; so that on the morrow after the twelfth daie, the Legate (after the king with great sorrowe for his departure, had embraced him) took shipping, at Dover, at whose departure no man was soze but the king, and such as the Legate had intreated.

About the same time Peter of Savoy, uncle to the Quene of England, to whome the king had giuen the earldome of Richmond, came into England.

Gilbert Marshall Earle of Pembroke, dyed without the Towne of Hertford, being busied in turnement, and was buried at London in the new Temple. Walter his brother hardlie obtaigned the earldome, because hee procured that turnement, contrarie to the kinges will and pleasure. This Walter dying without issue, his heritage was diuided betwixt the sonnes of his Que sisters.

The walles and bulwarkes that were newlie builded about the Tower of London (in the building whereof, the king had bestowed more then twelue thousand markes) were againe unrecoverable thowne downe, as it were, with an earthquake, for which chaunce the citizens of London nothing soze, were much amazed, for they were threatened, that the saide walles and bulwarkes were builded in despyght of them, to the end, that if any of them would presume to contend for the libertie of the city, they might the re be imprisoned, and to the end, that many might be laid in diuers prisons, many lodgings were made there, that no one should speake with another.

The same yere Gilbert Bassett, through the stumbling of his horse, fell in a certain wood, as he went a hunting in the haruest time, and brake all his bones and sinewes, whereof in a few daies after he died, and shortly after his only son being but a child, died, whereby his inheritance came to Fulco Bassett deane of Yorke, brother to the said Gilbert.

Also about the same time John Byfeth chiefe forester of England, departed this life.

The Templars in London, at this time in great glory, entertained the nobilitie, foraine Embassadors, and the pynce himselfe verie often, in such, that Mathew Paris crieth out on them for their pride, who being at the first so poore, as that they had but one horse to serue two of them (in token whereof they gaue in their scales two men upon one horsebacke) yet sodainlie they waxed so insolent, that they disdained other orders, and toyed themselves with noble men.

Rainulph de Noua villa Bishop of Chichester, and Chancellor of England decreased on the first of February in his noble pallace at London, which he had builded from the ground, not farre from the Jewe Temple, and the house of Conuerts.

Griffin the eldest sonne of Leoline Prince of Northwales, which was kept prisoner in the Tower of London, devised subtilly howe to escape: therefore one night having deceived the watch, made of the hangings, chetes, towelles, &c. a long line, and put himselfe downe from the top of the Tower: but as hee was sliding a good pace, with the twelght of his body, being a very big man and a fat, the rope brake, and he fell on his necke, whose miserable carcase in the morning being found by the Tower wall, was a pittifull sight to the beholders, for his head and necke were dyven into his breast betwene the shoulders: the king hearing hereof, punished the watchmen, and caused Griffins sonne that was imprisoned with his father to be moze strenghtly kept.

The king took of the Citizens of London 1500. markes, for that they had receiued into their citie againe Walter Bokerell, who had bene banished twenty yeres, notwithstanding the citizens had proved that before that time the said Walter and his brother Andrew by their suite to the king, had gotten him to be reconciled and restored to the kings favour. Robert Grosset Bishop of Lincolne, with other prelates, complained unto the king of waste made of the church goods, by allant Bishops and Clearkes of his lorde, whereupon they were shortly bidden.

On the xvi. day of January Quene Eleanor brought forth an other sonne, named Edmond.

Isabel Bulbecke Countesse of Arford deceased, and was buried in the preaching Friers church at Arford, because she was the foundresse there. Alfo Baldwin de Riparis Earle of Devonshire deceased in his monage.

The Popes Warldrobe in the citie of Lions was burned, with all that was therein: and manie men did say that the detestable charter of the tribute of England, which king Iohn did make, was burnt in that fire.

King Henry being at London, made Richard de Clare sonne to Gilbert de Clare, (so called, because he was borne at Clare in Suffolke, who was already Earle of Glocester) knight, and to the number of fortye. The same Richard de Clare took to wife the sister of the Earle of March, by whom he had issue Gilbert de Clare.

The king enlarged the church of S. Peters in Westminster, pulling downe the olde walls and steeple, and caused them to be made moze comely.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester, and dined with the bishop on S. Stephens day.

Upon S. Valentines euen there was a great earthquake in many places of England, especially at London, about the banks of the Thames.

There arrived here in England the three halfe brethren to the king, to witte, Guy de Lusignan, William de Valence, and Arhelmar a cleark, with their sister Alice: this was the issue of Isabel sometime Quene of England, Countesse of March, which she had by Hugh Brune Earle of March. These bring newe earle of Arraby in Placania, which the Frenchmen had taken, the king went out to meete them, promising them great gifts and possessions, which he after performed more largely then he promised.

The Lady Iane daughter of Gwarin de Monchency was married to William de Valencia the kings brother on the mothers side, for the said Lady was bette to Gwaren, and was a rich marriage. And Alice daughter to the Earle of March the kings sister on the mothers side was married to John earle Waren.

King Henry made William de Valence knight, and gave him the Castle of Hertford, and the honoz therunto belonging with great treasure.

The copie was so sore clipped, that it was thought good to change the same, and to make it bolder: Whereupon stamps were grauen, of a newe incision of cutte, and being sent to the Abbey of Wury in Suffolke, to Canterbury, Winton, and other places, forbidding to vse any other stamps then was used in the exchange or mintage at London, all the olde stamps were called in.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester. Beatrice the widow of Richmond sometime Earle of Bouance, came into England, with Thomas of Saunoy sometime earle of Flawers, to get some reliefe of the king.

A parliament was called at London, wherein a subsidy was demanded, but denied, as before: it had bene diners times.

Walter Mancleake sometime bishop of Carlisle, Robert Bacon, and Richard Fische, all preaching friers did this yere, which were the best learned in Diuinitie, and other sciences at that time in England.

The parliament beganne againe at London, wherein the king declared that he would not at the appointment of the nobles admit a Treasurer, Chancellor, or Justiciar, whereunto the nobles answered, neither would they impoverish themselves to enrich strangers their enemies, and so the parliament brake off. Wherethrough the king for want of money was faine to sell his plate and jewels, greatly to his losse: and when the king demanded who had bought it, and being answered, it was solde at London, he saide, I knowe that if Danians treasure were to be solde, the cite of London would loppe it up, and by it those russicall Londoners (quoth the king) abound in wealth, and call themselves Barons.

The towne of Newcastle vpon Tyne, for the most part, with the bidge was burned with an vnquencheable fire.

Fourte daies before Christmas was a great earthquake in England, so that the tops of houses were shaken and thowne downe, walles did cleaue, and the heads of chimnies and towers were shaken, but the bodie and foundations stode not.

King Henry kept his Christmas at London, in which solemnitie, Richard earle of Cornwall, went to Wallingford, where with great number he celebrated that feast. And Richard earle of Gloucester, not farre from Gloucester, with no small gloze kept the like feast. But the king (the feast of circumsion being nere) demanded of the citizens of London newe gifts, &c.

The king desiring how to erad money from the citizens of London, made a mart at Westminster to last fiftene daies, and commanded that all trade of Merchandise should cease in the Citie those fiftene daies, which the Citizens were faine to redeme with two thousand pounds. Besides this, the king tooke vitnals and wine, where any could be found and paid nothing for it.

Two Merchants of Zabab complained to the king at Winchester, that they had bene robbed by men of that countrey, who had taken from them to the value of two hundred markes, which theues they had taken in the Court, whereupon such as were suspected, were taken to be tried, but the countrey purged them by othe, because they were for the most part all infected and giuen to theuerie: the merchants therefore continuing their suite, saide, that if they could not haue iustice, they would stae so much of English merchants goods in Zabab. Then the king caused twelue men of Winchester to be chosen, who also did quitte them that were accused, which thing when the king did see, he caused those twelue to be imprisoned, and sware, that in thate space they should be hanged as accessaries and pertured, and caused other twelue to be

The friers Augustines began to inhabite at Woodhouse in Wales.

Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury in his visitation came to the Priorie of Saint Bartholomew in Smithfelde, where being received with procession in most solemn wise, hee saide he passed not upon the honour, but came to visite them: unto whome the Chanons answered, that they having a learned bishop, ought not in contempt of him to be visited by any other, which answer so much disliked the Archbishoppe, that hee forthwith fell on the Subprio, and smote him on the face with his fist, saying, In dede, indeede, doeth it become you English traitors so to answer mee: Thus raging with offes not to be recited, hee rent in pieces the rich coape of the Subprio, trode it under foete, and thrust him against a pillar of the Chancell, that hee had almost killed him, but the Chanons seeing, that their Subprio was almost dead, they raine and plucked off the archbishop with such a violence, that they overthrew him backward, whereby they might see that he was armed and prepared to fight.

The archbishops men seeing their master downe (being all strangers, and their masters countreymen boine in Prouance) fell upon the Chanons, beat them, tare them, and trode them under their foete: at length the Chanons getting away as well as they could, ranne bloudy and myzie, rent and torne, to the bishop of London, to complaine, who bade them goe to the king at Westminster, and tell him thereof: whereupon foure of them went thither, the rest were not able they were so fore hurt: but when they came at Westminster, the king would neither heare nor see them, so they returned without redresse.

In the meane season the whole cite was in an byzore, and ready to haue rung the common bell, and to haue helued the Archbishop into smal pieces, but he was secretly got away to Lambeth.

The friers of the order of preachers through chaffeindome, and from Jerusalem, were by a common conuocation assembled together at their house in Holborne by London, to intreat of their estate, to the number of foure hundred, having meat and drinke found them of almes, because they had no possessions of their owne. The first day the king came to their chapter, found them meate and drinke, and dined with them. An other day the quene found them meate and drinke, and afterwards the Bishop of London, then the Abbot of Westminster, the Abbot of S. Albons, the Abbot of Waltham, and so of other.

The king taking inestimable summes of money of all the rich men in his realme, took of one Aaron a Jew boine in Poyke 14000. markes for himselfe, and 10000. markes for the Quene, and before hee had taken of the same Jew so much as amounted altogether to 30000. markes of silver, and 200. markes of gold to the Quene.

was 8. ounces.

In October the sea flowing twise without ebbe, made so horrible a noise, that it was heard a great way into the land. Besides this, in a darke night, the sea seemed to be on a light fire, and the waues to fight one with another, so that the mariners were not able to saue their shippes: and to omit to speake of other, in one haue called Hureburne, besides small vessels, three noble and famous shippes were swallowed up of the waues. And at Wichelesca, besides celages for salt, and fishermen's houses, bridges and milles, about 300. houses in that towne, with certaine churches, through the violent rising of the sea, were drowned.

The Abbey of Wailes was dedicated, which was founded by Richard earle of Cornewall, the building whereof had cost him 10000. markes: at this dedication was kept a solemn feast, at the which was present, the king, the Quene, and almost all the nobilitie of England spirituall and temporall.

On S. Dunstons daie, a marvellous tempest of thunder and lightning to the terrour of many, beate downe to dust the chimney of the chamber, wherein the Quene and her children then were, the whole house was fore shaken in the castle of Winclesor, where also in the parke, oakes were rent aunder, and turned upwards, mils with their millers, sheepe folds with their shepherdes, and plow men were beaten downe and destroyed.

Scots had 60. knights, & a great number of other gentlemen, and did homage to the king of England: this assembly was no small charge to the Archbishop, in feasting them, and their traines, for it was reported that he spent at the first course of one dinner 60. fat oxen.

The Cathedral Church of Ely was dedicated, which the Bishop of that see, named Hugh de Norwood had now builded of his owne proper costs, together with the palace there, the king and the prelates of the realme, both spirituall and temporall, being present, who were all feasted in plentifull manner. This Hugh Norwood builded the Bishops palace in Ely, and redified diuers manors belonging to that house in other places. He builded the new work of the church of Ely, towarde the East, even from the foundation, called the Presbytery, which was finished in the space of seuentene yeres, with the expences of 3350. pounds 18. s. 8. pence. He also builded the new Tower of timber nere to the Galliean. King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester.

The king took foure Willings of cuerie knights six, to make his eldest sonne knight. He purchased the tenthes of all spirituall livinges at the Popes hands for five yeres, as it had bene in aid of the holie land, but inderce it was to make his sonne Edmond king of Naples and Sicill. The Liberties of London were seized by the means of Richard earle of Cornewall, who charged the Priests that hee looked not to the Bakers for their sies of bread, so that the cite was forced to please the earle with 600. markes, and were rejoyced. The king imprisoned the Shirriffes of London in the Tower a moneth and more, and after deposed them of their office, because of the escape of John Offrom, a Clarke counsell, that was bunder their ward in Newgate, for the death of a pilot that was the kings allie.

A great flood happened in Holland, Lindsey, and Holdernes, countries of Englands, the tenth of October, which came unto Alnigham, where through a great portion of lande, with houses and people were drowned. Robert Grosset Bishop of Lincoln, in Greke, Latine, and other languages, old by an Epistle reproue Pope Innocent, affirming, that the preaching friers, and minoists friers were infected with heresie. This Robert Grosset deceased at his manor of Rugdenham, he was an Englishman born in Suffolke, whose learning (in Hebrew, Greke, Latine and other languages) joined with vertue, and good life, won to him perpetual commendation, he was a manifest blamer of the Popes king, a reprouer of Prelates, a correcter of Priests, a director of Priests, an Instructer of Clerks, a Sustainer of Schollers, a Preacher to the people, a persecuter of unchast liuers, a diligent searcher of the Scriptures, a Ballot to such straungers as sought preferment in the Realme by the Popes piousness. In house-keeping liberal, in corporall refection plentiful, and in ministering spirituall food, deuoute and godlie affected: in his bishops office diligent, reuerend, and neuer wearied, he gaue his booke to the friers minoists in Oxford.

After king Henry had continued certaine dales at Boloigne, hee took the Seas and returned into England, landed at Dover in Christmas weeke. His tourney into Gascoigne was right costlie, and to little purpose, for the kings charges amounted to the sum of seauen and twentie hundred thousand pound, besides lawes and rents which he vnadvisedlie gaue to those, which little deserued. In two tourneies that king Henry made, the one into Bostowe, which countrey he left, the other into Gascoigne, which he hardly kept, he spent more treasures (saith mine Author) then a wise Couerour would haue giuen for the most.

The 5. of June the king by his writ commanded the Shiriffe of Cambridgeshire to see a due obseruation of all such ordinances and provisions, as he before had granted to the vniuersitie of Cambridge, by his letters patents, for the assise of bread and ale, for house rents, for imprisonment of Clerks, and deliuey of them againe at the Chancellors commandement.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester: king Henry made Magnus king of Man knight, and bestowed on him great gifts.

Alexander king of Scottes with Margaret his wife, came into Englande about the beginning of August, who found the king of England at his manor of Woodstocke, where the king of Scotts sported himselfe for a season, and had the lands of the earldom of Huntingdon restored unto him, and here he did homage to k. Henry. On the feast day of the decollation of S. Ioh. the two kings and queens came to London, where they were honorably received and conducted to Westminster. Iohn Mansell the kings Chaplain brought the two kings and other states to dine with him, whereunto they granted, where they were entertained with marvellous cheer, there were 700. messes served up, but the multitude of guests was such, that underneath the same sufficed, nor house could receive them, so that tents were set up abroad, the like dinner had not bene made by any chaplaine before.

King Henry came into the Exchequer, and there set downe order for the appearance of sheriffes, and bringing in of their accounts, there was fine marks set on every sheriffs head for a fine, because they had not discontinued every person that might dispend 15. pound law by yeere, to receive the order of knighthood, as was to the same sheriffs commanded.

This yeere the new worke of Pauls, to wit, the crosse ples were begun to be newe builded. k. Henry kept his Christmas at London, and on Childermas day came messengers unto Richard earle of Cornewall, who declared unto him that he was elected king of Almaine.

Hugh Bigot chiefe Justice of England, and Roger Thurkelby kept their Courtes in the Gildhall of London, and punished the Baker's upon the Tomberell, and did manie other things against the lawes of the cite. Richard earle of Cornewall went over into Almaine, and was there crowned king of Almaine at Aquisgrame.

The 6. daie of July fell such abundance of raine, that many houses, byldges, and trees were borne downe. The king caused the wals of the cite of London, which were for decayed, and destitute of bulwarkes, to be repaired in moys semelie wise then afore they had bene.

Great scarcitie of Beaves and hoxes in England, whereof they were wont to have many thousands out of Wales yearly, and all the Marches were made as it were a desert.

King Henry kept his Christmas at London with great solemnity. For so much as the king had oftentimes promised the restitution of certaine ancient ancient lawes which he never performed, the Lords murmuring against him, held a Parliament at Wyndesore, which was after called the madde Parliament, because manie things were there enacted, which turned to the death of manie pables. In confirmation of these acts were chosen twelve Peeres, which had authoritie to correct the breakers of them, the king his brethren, the nobles men and Barons, taking their oathe to see the same observed. Hostilite after, they banished William of Valence, Galfrede, Guidon, and Ailmer the elect of Winchester, all four brethren to the king on the mother side, and other strangers.

Great dearth followed the wet yeere passed. A quarter of wheate was solde for sixtene shillings, and 20. shillings, but the worst was, there coulde bee none found for money, where-through many poore people were constrained to cate horse flesh, and barkes of trees, but many starved for want of fode: 20000. in London as it was said.

A Jew at Cokenhester fell into a pynde upon the Saturday, and woulde not for reuerence of his Sabbath bee plucked out, wherefore Richard of Clare earle of Gloucester, kept him there till Monday, at which time hee was founde dead. The said Richard Clare earle of Gloucester died, and also his brother William, by poison as was thought.

King Henry kept his Christmas at London, with great solemnity. Richard Gray Constable of Dover, and Lord Warden of the ports was this yeere removed by the Lord chiefe Justice Hugh Bigot, who took into his owne hands the custodie of the said castle and ports.

This yeere a great mortalitie of pestilence reigned, whereof died many thousands of christian people, amongst whome deceased Fulco Basset bishop of London, and was buried in Pauls church at London.

In a parliament at Westminster, the ordinaunces made at Wyndesore with certaine other articles annexed, were read, and ratified by a curse pronounced against the breaker of these statutes, or anye of them. In the same Parliament was granted to the king a taske, called Scutage, to wit, 40. shillings of euerie knights fee throughout England, the which extended to a great sum of money: for as diuers writers affirmed, there were in England in the possession of spiritual and temporall persons more then 40000. knights fees, some saie 60000. knights fees. Iohn Rouse saith, that in the 15. yeere of William Conquerour, there were found in England 60211. knights fees, &c. k. Henry had now taken Scutage since his coronation eleven times.

The king commanded a generall assemble at Pauls Crosse in London, where he in proper person commanded the Mayor that the next daie following, he shoulde cause to bee sworn before the Aldermen, euerie drifpling of twelue yeeres of age or upwards, to be true to the king and his betres kings of England, and that the gates of the city should be kept with harnessed men.

King Henry of England kept his feast of Christmas at Paris in France. The two Romanes striving for Prebends in Pauls church at London, the one killed the other there.

Londoners getting them to the bridge in great numbers, under the which the must passe, cried out on her, bling many vile reprochfull words, theise durte and scowes at her, that she was constrained to returne again to the towne. The citizens fortified the citie with yron chaines, & stone overthwart their streets, munited the citie, and did marvellous things.

There was a peace concluded betwixt the king and the barons, with these conditions, that Henry, sonne to the king of Almaine, that toke the Barons part, and was in prison, shoulde bee deliuered, that all the kinges Castles through Englande shoulde bee put into the Barons handes, that the promotions of Epschoe shoulde bee kept, and that all Straungers within a certaine time shoulde depart the lande, those except, whose abode the faithfull persons of the Realme with one assent shoulde accept: lastlie, that the Englishmen bozne, and such as were faithfull men to the kingdome, shoulde order and rule the businesse of the Lande under the king. But this notwithstanding, certaine knights of the kinges part fortified the Castle of Windsoze with victuals and armour. Edward the kinges sonne came to Wiltshire, where discorde betwixt his knights and the Townesmen, so that the Townesmen were minded to haue besieged the Castle: which when Edwarde understood, hee sent for Walter Bpshophe of Winchester that tooke the Barons part, that in his companie hee might goe to the Court of his father, promising to perswade his father to peace. Hereupon going forth with the Bpshophe, till hee came to Windsoze, hee entred the Castle, to the great misliking of the Bpshophe: but Edwarde shortly returned, and went to meete Simon earle of Leicester, who with his adherentes were comming to besiege Windsoze Castell. Edwarde the kinges sonne met with the saide Simon about Kingstone, and offered meanes of peace: but Simon trusting to Bpshophe Walters counsell, deteyned Edward with him, and woulde not suffer him to departe till the Castell was yielded, they that were within, hauing libertie to depart whither they woulde: and the Straungers that minded to passe the Seas, had safe conduits graunted them. Lewin prince of Wales confederate with earle Simon, in the meane time wasted the Countrey of Chester, and the marches of the same, and overthrew to the grounde the Castles of Duffard and Cannocke. After this, a Parliament was holden at London, in the which, many that had helpe with the earle, went to the kinges part, as Henry of Almaine, Sonne to Richard king of Romanes, and other. The kinges partie beeing increased, hee went to Douer, and endeuored to haue gotten that castle out of the earles handes, but hee traualled in vaine.

King Henry kept his Christmas at London with the R. the king of Almain and many other great estates.

Lewes king of France, through procuring of Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury (who in politike Sermons at Paris, as well at the friers preachers, as minors, declared the dolings betwixt the king of England, and the earle of Leicester) take vpon him to make a peace betwixt them: whereupon the king of England, with his sonne Edward, and diuers other of the English nobilitie, came to Paris about the 22. of Januarie, but the earle of Leicester, fearing the

the French kinges displeasure for: his mothers sake, or some other cause not knowne, staid at home in England and proceeded in his businesse: wherefore Roger Mortimer beganne to despoile the possessions which the earle of Leicester held, against whom the prince of Wales went, and besieged the castle of Radnoze, and brought it to yeld.

Edward the kings son, after his returne from Paris, about Lent, toke his journey toward the March, and passing by Wyke, the Burgeses shut vp the gates against him, whereby he was forced to lie at the kings hall without the towne till the next morowe and then departed. The schollers of Wyke being shut within the towne, brake vp the gate that leadeth toward Braumton, for which deede the Palor sent some of them to prison: and not long after, while the schollers were at dinner, the Palor and Commons with banners displayed, thought to haue spoiled the Clerkes ere they had bene aware, but being espied, the schollers ran together, and with bowes and other weapons slew and wounded the Burgeses and Commons, brake by manie houses, spoiling the goods, and set the houses of the Portresses (William Spicer and Gessrey Henckley) on fire, on the Southside of the towne. Edward the kings sonne toke the Castle of Baie and Huntingdon, belonging to the earle of Hereford, and the Castle of Hereon being also rendered to him, he deliuered to Roger mortimer to keepe, with the territories adiacent. Robert Ferrers earle of Warbie (who toke parte with earle Simon) besieged Worcester, and entring by the olde Castell, spoiled the Citizens of their goods, and compelled the Jewes to be christened. The towne of Gloucester, that before was taken by the Barons, was now assailed by Edward the kings sonne, who entred the castle by great force, and in the next morning by meanes of the Bpshophe of Worcester, and Reignolde Abbot of Gloucester, a truce was taken betwixt the Barons in the towne, and the kings sonne in the Castle: but shortly after the Barons fled, and the Burgeses submitting themselves, were some of them hanged, the residue cast in prison, greivously ransomed, and the towne destroyed, from whence the kinges sonne departed, spoiling and wasting the countrey (contrarie to his othe made to the Barons) till he came to Wyke, where he lodged in the house of the frier preachers, and ioined his power with the king his father, who was lately come thither to make his offering to Saint Frideswide, (not fearing the superstitious opinion, that if any king entred that towne, the virgin there woulde be auenged on him.) The king hauing now with him his brother Richard king of Almaine, his sonne Edward, William de Valence his brother on the mothers side, and John Cumyn of Scotlande, with a multitude of Scottisshmen, John de Bailliol Lord of Galloway, Robert le Bruse Lord of Anandale, Roger de Clifford, Philip de Marmion, John de Vallibus, Roger de Laborne, Henry Percy, Philip Basset, Roger de Mortimer, with an armie went and besieged Northampton, and the fourth of Aprill breaking the wal, toke the towne, and in it 70. knights bearing banners, Simon Mountfort the ponger, William de Ferrers, Peter de Mountfort, Baldwyne Wake, Adam de Newmarch, Roger Bartrand, Simon Fitz Simon, Berengario de Wateruile, Hugh Gubion, Thomas Maunfell, Roger Bonteuleyn, Nicol. Wake, Robert de Newcanton, Philip de Derby, Grimbold de Paunfuent: of whome Simon the ponger was sent to Winchester, the residue to other places to be safely kept. Other knights of meaner degree were taken, to the number of fourtie, and not a few Esquires: from thence the king went towards Spittingham, wasting with fire and sword the manors places of the Barons, and there hee gathered his Lordes and great men.

Carle Simon went to London, and from thence to Rochester, which John Carle Warren defended, the bridge and first gate whereof when he had won, being informed that the king was coming towards London, he left the siege and went backe to mete him: but the king turning his waie from London toke the castle of Harington or Harington, which was the Earle of Gloucesters, and then going to Rochester, chased away some that remained at the siege, but slew many mo: from thence he went to Donbridge, the castle whereof he toke, and the Countesse of Gloucester with him it: leaving a garrison there, he went to Winchester, where he received them of the 5. ports to his peace, and passing further to Lewis, was received into the priory, and his son into the castle, where whyles he remained, the barons wrote to him letters, as ye may read in Mathew Paris, and Nicholas Trivet: but they taking no effect, the Barons in armes approached towards Lewis, invading the kings people that were gone forth for rage, whereof the king being warned, he goeth forth to mete them with his armie divided into three lordes: The first was led by Edw. the kings sonne, having with him William de Valence Earle of Pembroke, and John de Waren earle of Surrey and Suffex. The second was guided by Richard B. of Almaine with his sonne Henry. The third the B. himselfe had in governing. The Barons army was divided into 4. wards. The first ledde Henry de Mountfort with the earle of Hereford. The second ledde Gilbert de Clare with John Fitz John, and William de Mountchance. The third in which the Londoners were, Nicholas Segraue. The fourth earle Simon himselfe led with Tho. de Pelueston. Edward the kings sonne with his battell broke on his enemies that hee made them to give backe, of whom many were slayned.

The Londoners were put to flight, whom whyles the kings sonne pursued for the space of foure miles, he made great slaughter, but being separate from the rest of the army, he weakened his part sore.

In the meane time many of the kings battell were slaine, & the king of Almaine taken in a windmill by Sir John de Bevis, so was Robert le Brui and Joh. Commyne, which had brought the Scots. King Henry also having his horse slaine under him, yielded to the earle of Gloucester, who sent him prisoner to the priory. Edward returning, he received with sharp battell, and the earle Waren, William de Valence, Guy de Lusignan, the kings halfe brothers, Hugh Bigot with men of armes to the number of 400. habergeons got then the castle of Wemsey, and when many were slaine on either side, the Lord Edward riding about the towne, found his father in the priory.

In

In the meane time an assault being given to the Castle, which was valiantly defended, the Barons withdrew to the river: whereupon the Lord Edward being greatly incouraged, and having gathered his people about him, would have made a new battell, so that the Barons sued for peace, which by the meanes of the friers preachers and priors, was brought to passe, that on the Friday following, the Lordes, Edward and Henry, for their fathers, of England and Almaine kinges, delivered themselves to Earle Simon, upon hope of quietnesse and peace that might be concluded. On the Saturday the king licenced them that were about him to depart to their houses, and to go unto them that were in Donbridge Castle, that they should not molest the Barons, as they returned homewards: but they notwithstanding being in armes, when they heard that the Londoners which were fled from the battell were received into Croydon, they halted thither, & slaying many of them got great spoiles. From thence they went to Bisholp, where they remained till Edward the kinges son was delivered. There was slaine in the battell at Lewes, (which was fought on the 12. of May) about 4500. men. About that time a great part of the citizens in London was bent by treason.

Carle Simon ledde the king and his sonne Edward about with him till hee had got all the strong Castles of the land into his hands, and then put Richard king of Almaine in the Tower of London, and Edward the kings sonne in Dover Castle.

In the meane time, Roger Mortimer, James Audely, Roger Leyborne, Roger Clifford, Haymo Lestrangle, Hugh de Turberuile, with many other, rose against Simon, who to restrain their boldnesse, associating to him the Prince of Wales, entered the Castle of Hereford, and caused Edward the kings sonne to be brought thither from Dover: after this he wanne the Castle of Hereford, which belonged to the Earle of Hereford, and toke the Castle of London, and after wasting the lands of Roger Mortimer, goeth towards Mountgomerie, and there taking pledges of peace of the said nobles, hee turneth to the South parts, to mete the power, which was saide to come out of France to the kings ayde.

Pope Urban sent a Legate and Cardinall, the bishop of Sabine into England, but they might not enter the Realme, the five portes prohibiting them: whereupon they called certaine English bishops first to Amience, and after to Bologne, to whom he committed the sentence of excommunication to be pronounced against the citie of London, the five portes, and all those that troubled the king of Englands peace: but the Bishops dissembled the matter.

This yere about the 20. of June a notable blazing starre appeared, such a one as had not bene sene in that age, which rising from the East with great brightnesse into the midst of the Hemisphere betwix his streame, it continued till after Michaelmas.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Woodstocke, and Simon Earle of Leicester kept his Christmas at Kenilworth.

Between Simon of Leicester, and Gilbert of Glocester strife arose, for that Simon not only kept the king and other as prisoners, but also toke to himselfe the revenues of the kingdome, &c. which should have bene equally divided amongst them, so that Gilbert of Glocester departing, joined to him in league the noble knights of the marches, whose earle Simon had commanded to abide the realme, but Ioh. de Waren Carle of Surrey and Sussex, and William de Valence earle of Pembroke, had brought a great power by sea in the West parts of Wales, & arriving at Pembroke, earle Simon leading the king with him, went to Hereford, where he gathered a great power, to oppresse the said knights: but while the prelates laboured for peace, Edward the 3. sonne being in the castle of Hereford is permitted to exercise himselfe on horsebacke in a meadow without the city by his keepers, where after he had wearied divers hofes, and mounting on a fresh appointed for that purpose, he rode quite aboute, and passing the rafter of Wye, with two knights and foure Esquires, was followed hard by his keepers: but when they were advised of the standards of Rog. Mortimer and Roger Clifford coming to his rescue, they returned, and he escaped to Wigmore. And this chanced in the Whithson week. Lord Edward being thus escaped, gathered an army, confederately and submitted to him the Countreies of Hereford, Worcester, Salop, and Chester, with the townes, cities and castles, he also winneth by force the citie of Gloucester, which Carle Simon had lately fortified, the townesmen fled to the castle, who 15. daies after yielded it, and departed. The earle of Leicester won the Castle of Spennorth, and laide it flat with the ground, and entering into the land of the earle of Glocester called Glamorgan, meeting with the prince of Wales coming to his aide, they destroyed all with fire and sword.

Edward the kinges sonne hearing that manie of Carle Simons partakers were come to the Castle of Kenilworth, taking with him the Carle of Glocester, he departed from Worcester, and came upon them at a foade, where hee toke the Carle of Oxford, Sir William Mounchaiffe, Sir Adam Newmarch, Sir Walter de Solenke and other; and Simon the sonne of Carle Simon hardly escaped in the Castle. The earle of Leicester having the king with him, returned out of South Wales, and on Lammass day came to Lemsley a place of the Bishop of Worcester, and there tarried the next day, Edward the kinges sonne returned from Kenilworth to Worcester, whose returne being knowne, Carle Simon departing from Lemsley, by unhappy chance staid in the town of Cuslham, for on the morrow being the 2. of August, Edward the 3. sonne departed from Worcester, passing the river nere to the towne called Cluac, closed by the passage betwixt Carle Simon and Simon his sonne, who was at Kenilworth. In the next morning L. Edward approached nere to Cuslham on the one side, & Gilbert earle of Glocester on the other side, and Roger Mortimer on the two other sides whereby Carle Simon was so enclosed, that he must either fight or yelde: on Friday therefore the first day of August, their armies encountered each other in a large feld without the towne, where the Carles part Lordes taken at Cuslham, Sir Vmfray de Boune, Sir John Saint John, Sir Simons son, Sir Guy, Sir Baudwyn Wake, Sir John Velly, Sir Henry Hastings, Sir Nicol. Segraue, Sir Perce and Sir Robert, Mounforts sons, and many other, Simon de Mountfort the sonne coming to late to mate his father at Cuslham, turned backe againe to Kenilworth Castle, and the first of September he released the king of Almaine, his mothers brother, Sir Reimond Fitz Pierce, and many other.

A parliament was holden at Winton. where all the statutes made at Oxford were disannulled, and all the goods of them that were against the king seized. London was in great danger to have bene destroyed by the king, for displeased hee had conceived against the Citizens, but the Citizens wholly submitted both liues and goods unto him. Eight persons carrying the same submission toward Winton, met Sir Roger Leyborn knight at Colbyrke, who turned them backe againe, and after they had discoursed the whole matter with him, he tolled them to deliver to him their submission, and he wolde move the king in it, which thing they did. After five daies this knight returned to the Citie, and said the king had received their writings, willing them first to take away all the chains that were in the streets of the Citie, & put the postes out of the ground that the same were fixed in, and bring both chains and postes to the Tower of London: then the Mayor with fortye Citizens should the next day following attend upon the king at Winton, to confirme their writing, and they should go and come safe: in witness whereof he delivered them in the kings letter and seale, for the space of foure daies. The next day the Citizens being at Winton, attended at the gate untill the king came from hunting, at which time he wolde not once looke on them. After the king was entered, they would have followed, but they were forbidden: shortly after they were called into the Castle, where they were locked vp in a Tower with kindly entertainment: the next daie the king came unto prince Edward the Mayor and foure Aldermen, the rest were committed to severall prisons.

ozels to auoyde them: then hee made Custos of the Citie, Sir Otho Cornstable of the Tower, who chose Bayliffes to be accountable to him, John Adrian, and Walter Haruy. After this the king toke pledges of the best mens finnes of the citie, the which were put in the Tower of London, and there kept at the costs of their parentes. By great labour and suite made, all the foresaie persons which were in Wyndosor castle, eight onelic except, were deliuered, and the king agreed with the citizens for 20000. marks to be paid, for the leaping of which fine, were taxed as well seruants as householders, and manie refused the liberties of the city to be quit of the charge.

The castle of Dover was yielded to Edward the kings son, into the which hee put Guy de Mountfort to be kept.

The Countesse of Leicester, wife to Simon Mountfort, yielded the castle of Wemsey to king Henry her brother, who forthwith banished her the Realme of England for ever. About Alhalowntide the Quene of England returned from beyond the seas, with her came the Legate, named Othobone, who shortly after his coming, in council holden at Roathamton, accursed all the bishops and priests that had appoynted earle Simon against the king, especially hee cursed by name, Walter of Worcester, Henry of London, and Stephen of Winchester, and the Bishop of Lincolne. Worcester shortly after deceased, the other three went to Rome, and were absolved. The Legate also published the popes Bull, for the tenthes of Churches to be paid to the king for the next pære. Sir Simon the younger fled from Kenilworth castle to the dysherited knights, who then were in the Isle of Orholme, where he remained not long, for through menagers with faile promises, and hostages giuen by Edw. the kings son, hee forsooke them went to London to the king and his nobility, but being priuily knowen of their guile, he made an escape and got ouer into France.

The keeper of Guy Mountfort about Easter being bylded, let him go, and went with him into France: this Guy went into Tuscanie, and serued earle Rufus, in whose warre waring famous, hee obtained to haue his daughter in marriage.

Robert Ferrers Earle of Darbie, Henry Hastings, Baudwyne Wake, John Danuile, and other with their power beeing in the Towne of Getherfeld in Derbyshire, there came against them John earle Waren, Sir Henry of Almain, Sir Waren of Basingborn, and many other knights, who on Wednesday euen met without the towne on hunting, Sir Baudwyne Wake, Sir Henry Hastings, Sir Gregorie Caldwell, Sir John Clinton, Sir Roger Maundcuil, Sir Ric. Caldwell, and to the number of 22. knights al under one speare, al which they chased and put to flight: whereof when Sir John Danuile being in the towne had vnderstanding, hee with a small companie rode out, pierced through the hostes, wounding many and escaped. Earle Waren entering the towne siew in a man, and toke the earle Ferrers, who was sicke of the goutte, and had that date bene letten blood: him they sent to the Towne of London, from whence but lately he had bene deliuered. the Castle of all things necessary. King Henry hastning thither, began his siege the morow after Epiphonmer day, which siege continued till Christmas after, for they told in the Castle, not fearing his force which was great, sette open their gates, and neuer closed them date nor night, come who so woulde they came to their cost, so that manie a man was slaine on both sides, and manie were taken and ransomed. At length the Legate, the Archbyschoppe, and thoo other Byschoppes, came to make accord betwene the king and the dysherited, and also them of the Castle: but the dysherites, nor they of the Castle woulde graunt to the kings will, wherefore the Legate accursed them, and all that were of their accord: but they of the Castle, not regarding the Legate nor his cursing, in mockage thereof, clothed a priest their surgeon, Philippe Porpeis, in a coape of white, and setting him on the castle wall, as a white Legate against the red, made him to accurse the king, the Legate, and all their partakers. Whiles this busines lasted at Kenilworth, the dysherites toke the Isle of Ely, and strengthened it in such wise, that they held it long: they robbed Norfolk, Suffolke, and Cambridgeshire, they spoiled the city of Norwich, and ransomed the rich men at their pleasure. At Bartholmeuwide the 21. held a Parliament at Billingsworth, wherein by his Barons were chosen six persons, which being thwoyne, chose to them other six, these six to make an accord betwene the king and the dysherites: the first 6. were, Walter Gifford bishop of Bath, Nicolas of Ely, bish. of Worcester, and Walter bishop of Exeter, Roger de Sumcrey, Robert Walrood, and Aline de la Souch barons: these 6. chose to them Gilbert earle of Gloucester, Humfrey earle of Hereford, the bishop of S. Davids, Sir John Balliol, Sir Philip Basset, and Sir Waren de Basingborn, if these six could not agree, the Legate, and Henry son to Richard king of Almain should be Iampers, these met and agreed at the last.

By the kings commandement the bishops, Abbots, Byschops, earles, barons, and knights of the realme were assembled at Roathamton on the Tuesday next before Alhalowntide, there to vnderstand and confirme by statute what the forenamed twelve states had decreed for the state of the kingdom, which was for the barons, that none should be dysherited, but the Mountforts and the Ferrers, the other should redeme their lands with money, at the hands of them who had the same in possession of the gift, so that none paid above 7. pæres value, nor vnder 3. pæres value, which was the least, & this shalbe assessed according to the quantity of their trespassse. The siege of Kenilworth yet continuing, they within the castle began to be sore troubled with the sir, and also were without hope of succour to come to them, whereupon on S. Tho. day before Christmas they yielded the castle to the king with condition to depart with life and lims, without losse of goods, or imprisonment, and not to be dysherited.

Such of the dysherited persons, as liked not the ordinance of Kenilworth, whose capitaine was John Cuil, after they had taken the city of Lincoln, & spoiled the Jewes, they fled again to the Isle of Ely, whose comming abroade when the king with a grea army had stopped, Edw. the kings son with byzoges made of hurdes & bozds, in place convenient, as the inhabitants thereabout had instructed struck him, hee entered upon the Isle, some of them within yielded them to him, the other being dispersed by flight. Whiles these things were a doing a new trouble began, for the earle of Gloucester taking part with the dissenters, came with an army gathered in Wales, unto London, the 7. of April: therein he builded bulwarks, cast ditches and trenches in divers places.

The king gathered an army at Walslop, and the 5. of May, he with an 109. ensignes came towards London, he pitched his tents at Stratford, and tarried there the space of one month, where many entreated to make peace.

The 6. of June the earle of Gloucester, in peaceable maner rendred the Citie unto the king againe, and then many that were dissented were reconciled, at the instance of the Legate and the said earle. Four that bare the cognisance of the earle of Darby were put in sacks and cast in the Thames. Thomas Fitz Theobald and Agnes his wife, sister of Thomas Becker Archb. of Cantuarburie gave to the maister and brethren of the hospitall, called Saint Thomas of Acres beyond the seas, all the land with the appurtenances that sometime was Gilbert Beckers, father to Thomas Becker, in which land the said Thomas Becker was borne, to make there a Church.

About Michaclmas the king came to Shrewsbury, to passe into Wales, there to vanquish the prince of Wales Lewline, who had aided Simon earle of Leicester, but he sending to the k. granted him 32. M. li. sterling to have his peace, and by the Legates meanes there was restored to the prince, the land of foure Cantredes, which by law of armes the king had taken from him.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster. On hobone the Legate calling a counsell at London, ordained many things in reformation of the English Church. In which Counsell, he absolved Simon de Moundfort earle of Leicester, and other which had bene excommunicate by reason of the troubles passed.

Variance fell betwene the fellowship of Goldsmithes and Taylors of London, causing great ruffling in the Citie, and many men to be slaine, for which riot thirtene of the Captaines were hanged.

The king held a Parliament at Parleborow, in the which were made the statutes of Parleborow.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster.

The river of Thames was so hard frozen, from Saint Andrews tyde, to Candlemas, that men and beasts passed onfoote from Lambeth to Westminster, the merchandize was carried from Sandwich, and other haunces to London by land.

Edmond the kings sonne married Aurlina, the daughter of William de Albemarle Earle of Holdernes, she was heire both to her father and mother, by reason whereof, he was to haue with her the Countie of Denonshire, and the Lordship of the Isle of Wight, but he deceased before both the father and mother, and left all.

A discord was rased betwene Edward the kings sonne, and Gilbert de Clare Earle of Gloucester, because of the overmuch familiaritie, which the said Edward was saide to haue with the wife of the saide Earle. And shortly after, the Earle of Gloucester took one at Cardiffe, that went about to haue poisoned him.

The thirtieth of October, king Henry did translate with great solemnity, the body of king Edward the Confessor, that before late in the Reue of the quire, where the monks did sing at Westminster, into a newe Chappell at the backe of the high Altar, which he had prepared for him of a marvellous workmanship, bestowing on him a new tombe, of thine of golde, on the day of his translation.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester. The prior of Walsingham was the kings treasurer, Nicholas Leucanor keeper of his Wardrope, and Roger de Winton was Marshall.

The Nobles of England, by the kings commandment, assembled at London to treat of diuers matters, amongst the which one was, that all men should before the Justices shewe by what right they held their lands, which matter did much molest the people, untill John Warren Earle of Surrey appeared, who being asked by what right he held his lands, he drew suddenly out his sword, and saide, by this I holde my Crads fathers lands, and with this I will keepe them. Upon multiplying of words, the Earle made an assault upon Allen de la Zouch, Lord chiefe Justice of Ireland, before the other Justices of the bench, and cruelly wounded him, whereof he died. And shortly after the same John Earle of Surrey, by the oath of 25. knights at Winchester, affirmed, that he did not commit that fact upon any pretended malice, neither in contempt of the king, and so for the summe of 1200. marks was reconciled.

Edward the kings sonne with his brother Edmond and many other nobles sayling into Asia against the infidels, by his policy and manly aces so demeaned himselfe, that oftentimes he put the Turkes to great dishonour, for despite whereof they suborned a Saracene to wound him with a venemous dart, whereof he was long sicke. Henry son to Richard king of Almaine as he went through Luscane, at Witterbe was slaine by Guy de Mountfort.

The temple of Boto in Cheape fell downe and slew manye people, men and women, that then were in the Church, or dwelled nere there about.

The 28. of January Richard king of Almaine and Earle of Cornwell, brother to king Henry deceased in the castle of Barkhamsted, and was buried at Bailes an Abby of his foundation. His sonne Edward succeeded in the inheritance of his Carlehome.

Divers bournes suddenly brake out of the holloine places of the sarth, and overflowed a great part of Canterbury citie, the dreame whereof was so swift and violent, that it bare downe buildings and houses, and drowned manye people.

Philip Basset Baron deceased.

In June began a great ryot in the citie of Norwich, through the which the monastirie of the Trinitie was burned, whereupon the king rode downe, and making enquiry for the chiefe doers thereof, caused xxx. of them to be condemned, hanged and beheaded.

that resisted, and after spoiling all the Countrey, he with his brother the prince laid siege to the castle of Ruthland. The king hearing this, halted thither with a great army to raise the siege, and in his toying he celebrated the feast of Easter at the Wile in the Diocese of Salisbury, from thence he went to Ambzeshery, there to visite his mother, who remained in that Spousterie. Which being done, he halted after his army into Wales, whose coming being heard of, the Prince retired with his army. But in the meane time Ryce the sonne of Malgon, and Griffyth ap Meridithap Owen, with other noblemen of Southwales, took the castle of Aberiswith, the castle of Flint, of Ruthland, and diuers other, spoiling the kings people that inhabited the rebaboules. Whereupon John Peckham Archbyschop of Canturburie, after hee had visited his whole prouince, considering the great warres betwene the king and Lewline, he traualled for the appeasing thereof, first to the king being at Ruthland, then to the prince being at Snododon: which his whole traualle therein, with the griefe, and causes of those wars, he particularly set downe word by word in the said archbyschops records: all which I receiued at the hands of Doctor Yale, when he was Deane of the Archies, as I haue set downe in my larger Chronicle.

After the death of Leoline Prince of Wales, his brother David taking his flight, the rest of the Welchmen, as well nobles as other, yielded themselves vnto the king, and then the king subdued all Wales euen to the sea coasts toward Ireland, and all the castles were yielded vnto him. Then he established there the lawes of England, and did place Iudices of Peace and other Spinifiers. Also he placed the Erchequer for Wales at Chester. In the meane time, David being destitute of helpe, wandering in vncertaine places, at length he returned to his owne confusion: for hee was taken with one of his sons, Packington saith 2. of his sons and 7. daughters, at St. Mores, all which were brought before the king by whose commandement he was committed to the castle of Chester. And afterwards in a parliament at Shrewsbury the said David was concluded of treason, and was iudged to be hanged and quartered, which was done accordingly. Then the king builded two strong castles, the one at Conway, (after he had remoued the Abbey at Aberconway to an other place:) the other castell he builded at Cairnarvon. He gaue diuers castles to Englishmen. He diuided Wales into shires and hundredes: and so the king passed through all Wales, and annexed it to the crowne of England.

common people of the country to accept him for their prince, unless he would remaine himselfe in that country among them, neither could he bying them to pay obedience to any Prince, except he were of their own nation. For the Welchmen hauing experience of the government of the English officers, and knowing that the king would rule the countrey by his deputies, could not abide to haue any Englishman to be their ruler: wherefore oftentimes, vpon the kings motion they answered, that they were contented to take for their Prince any man, whom he would name, so that he were a Welchman, and other answer could be neuer get of them by any meanes. Whereupon, hauing secretly sent for the Q. being then great with childe, caused her to remaine at Carnarvon: and when she was nigh her time of deliuerance, the king being at Rotherhithe, sent for all the Barons and best men of Wales, to come to him to consult concerning the weale publike of their countrey; and when they were come, he deferred the consultation, untill hee were certified that the Quene were deliuered of a sonne: Then sending certaine Lordes to the christening, hee called the Welchmen together, declaring vnto them, that whereas they were oftentimes suiters vnto him to appoint them a Prince; he now hauing occasion to depart out of the countrey would name them a prince, if they would allow and obey him whom he should name. To the which they answered, that they would so do, if he would appoint one of their nation. Whereunto the king replied, that he would name one that was borne in Wales, and could speake neuer a word of English, whose life and conseruation no man was able to defect. And when they all had granted, that such a one they would obey, he named his owne son Edward borne in Carnarvon Castle a fewe daies before. King Edward kept his Christmas at Westminster with great solemnity. King Edward held a parliament at Westminster, wherein the transgressions of divers Justices were tried out, and punished accordingly: some lost their goods, and then were banished: some, as wel of the bench, as of the assises, were sent to the Tower, which with great summes of money obtained liberty. Sir Thomas Weyland had all his goods, both moveable and immoveable confiscated and was banished, Sir Ralph Hengham, chiefe Justice of the higher bench, offered seven thousand markes, Sir John Louet Justice of the lower bench three thousand markes, Sir William Bromton Justice, five thousand markes.

Of their clearkes for their redemption: of Robert Littleburie 2000. markes: of Roger Leicester 1000. markes: of Sir Salomon Rochester, chiefe Justice of Assises 4000. markes: of Sir Richard Boyland 4000. markes: of Sir Thomas Soudentone 2000. markes: of Sir Walter de Hopton 2000. markes: of Robert Preston 1000. markes: of Sir William Saham Justice 3000. markes: of a certaine cleark of the court called Adam de Stratton 32000. markes of olde money and new, beside ietwels without number, and pretious vessels of siluer, which were found in his house, and a kings crowne, which men said was King Johns. Whereupon, the king constrained the Justices to sweare, that from thenceforth they should take no pension, fee, or giste of any man, except onely a breakfast, or such like present.

Hee banished all the Jewes out of England, giving them to beare their charges, till they were out of his realme, the number of Jewes then expelled, was 1560. persons, whose houses being sold, the king made a mighty wadd of money.

The Scotkes by their Charter delivered to king Edward the kingdome of Scotland, with the castles, rights and customes the fourth day of June, that upon due discussing the matter, it might bee knowne who was lawfull heire therunto.

The cleargie granted to the king, a tenth of all their goods for one yere: the king also toke a fifteenth of the temporalitie throughout England.

The last day of April Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester & Hereford, toke to wife, Joane of Acres daughter to King Edward, at Westminster.

The same yere John duke of Brabant toke to wife Margaret daughter to King Edward of England.

King Edward toke his journey toward Scotland, there to decide of the right heire of Scotland, as superiour Lord of that land. But as hee approached to the confines of Scotland, the Quene his wife, being taken with a grievous sickness, departed this life at Herdby a towne nere unto Lincoln, on the eight and twentieth of November, whereupon he returned to conuoy the corps toward London, which he did with great sorrow, for he bewailed the losse of her all the daies of his life: she was in her life time a vertuous Lady, modest, pitifull, a lover of the English nation, & as it were a pillar of defence to the whole realme: her bowels were buried at Lincoln, and a tombe erected there, with hermes of Castile thereupon, in our Lady chappell: her body was brought to Westminster, and there buried on the seventeenth day of December. In curie towne and place in which the bodie of the Q. was staid in the bringing up to London.

At Westminster, the king caused a stately Crosse to be created, every one of them being garnished with the Image of the same Q. also with his armes and hers. The crosses erected were at Charing by Westminster, in Westchape of London, at Waltham in Essex, at Saint Albons in Hertfordshire, at Dunstable, at Long Stratford, and Southampton, without the towne South, at Woborne, Grantham, &c. the keeping of the sea, he set forth 3. seuerall fleets, appointing the Admirals to them of Dartmouth and those parts, John de Botecart: to them of Poxtesmouth, William de Leborne: to the Westermen and of Ireland, an Irish knight.

There was granted to the king for an aid in these wars, the one halfe of all the goods of the cleargie, a fift part of the Citizens, and a tenth of the Commons goods: the Abbot of Saint Augulines at Canterburie was charged and paid 566. pounds 7. shillings, and 10. pence, and also was charged with 6. horses and all their furniture, towarbes the keeping of the sea coasts. There was in all leased of the cleargie at that time, to the sum of thre score hundred thousand pounds, according to the account, and as it was valued in Salcoigne, to wit, 8. s. silver to the pound.

The kings army passing from Poxtesmouth, arrived at S. Mathews in Britaine, they entered the mouth of the river Giron towards Burdeaur, they took two goodly walled towncs, Burgo and Blespa, and passing before Burdeaur, they came to Lions, where the towne being delivered to them, they bring their horses to land.

In the meane space the Welshmen making them Captaines, Madoc, and Malgon, they burnt the castell of Carnarvon, slaying a great number of Englishmen. King Edward entering Wales, called backe his brother Edmund earle of Leicester, and Henry Lacy earle of Lincoln into Wales, who were ready to have passed into Gascoigne. The Welshmen with great strength came against them, and expelled the earles.

King Edward took into his hands all the Pzies aliens throughout England, with all their laites and goods any waie arising, committing the same to officers under him, allowing to every monke eightene pence the weeke, and all the querplus of their revenues was appointed towarde the charges of the kings warres, reserving also to his treasury, the pensions or annuities due to the principall houses. Also in the same parliament, he obtained againe of the cleargie and religious persons a loane of money, to the value of halfe the goods and lands, according to the former exaction of the tenths, which loane amounted to 100000. poundes, whereof the Abbot of Wury paid 655. poundes cleunt pence farthing.

King Edward in his expedition into Wales kept his Christmas at Aberconway. The 19. of January, together with the night and day following, by the rage of winde with vehement showers and stormes, such as the like had not bene seene in one hundred yeres before, all the winter seedes were consumed, as well in Yolland as in Scotland. At which time the water of Thames overflooded the banks, and a great bycatch was made at Radnorsh besides London, and all the grounds about Bermondsey, Lambeth, & Bathil was overflooded.

The last of February there sodainlie arose such a fire in the castle of Windesore, that many officers of the same house were the wayth consumed, and many goodly images made to beautifie the building, were defaced and destroyed.

The king passing the water of Conoway, and so forth into Wales with an army against the Welshmen, builded the castell of Brunmarth, in the Ile of Anglesey. The Welshmen were consumed by famine, their woods were felled, felled, and many castles fortified, their captain was taken and brought to London, and so for that time the wars ceased.

The Frenchmen arrived at Dover, spoiled the towne, and burnt a great part thereof, amongst other they slew Thomas of Dover, a monke of great holines.

The king caused all the monasteries in England to be searched, and the money in them to be brought up to London. He also seized into his hands all their laie fees, because they refused to paie to him such a far as he demanded. Moreover, he caused the wool and leather to be staied in Englande, and there followed great dearth of corne and wine.

There rose a great discord at Arford, betwene the clearks and lay men, and all because of two barlets of divers countries, which fell out about a small matter, for upon that occasion, some took one part, and some another, and so all were divided into parties, in somuch, that learned and letw by stocke meale ran to the fight, and when the schoolers or clearkes were gone out of their hostles, the laity perceiving either none, or else verie few to be remaining at home, entered the clearks lodgings, and carried away a great deale and many kinds of stuffe, to the great and irrecoverable damage of the schoolers. In this skirmish was slaine Sir Fulke of Beppymouth, parson of Wyckedhorne, and manie other on either side. The king hearing thereof, sent Justiciars to restore the peace, and to condemne the murderers, which when they came, forced the Townesmen to pay the schoolers 200. poundes for damages don unto them.

King Edward helde his Christmasse at Carlisle, with a great multitude of English people, and in the moneth of January next following, he called a great Parliament to be holden at Carlisle vpon the Daues of S. Willary, to treat of matters concerning the state of Scotland, whereunto were summoned many lords both of the spirituality and temporality, who either appeared in person or els by proxy. My selfe haue seene and read an ancient register of good authority, containing the names of 87. Earles and barons, 20. Bishops, 61. Abbats, and eight priors, besides many Deanes, Archdeacons and other inferior

In this parliament many complaints were made of the oppression of churches and Monasteries, by the Popes Chaplaine named William Testa Archdeacon of Araine in the Church of Conentrie. The same Clarke was forbidden to use any more such extortions, and divers Statutes were ordained touching religious persons which had their principall houses in other realmes.

There came to this Parliament, sent from the Pope, a Cardinall called Petrus Hispanus, to treat of a marriage betwixt Edward Prince of Wales, and the French kings daughter.

And amongst many other soites made there, Henry Lacy Earle of Lincoln complained, that whereas in times past, the course of water running at London under Holbozne bridge, and Fleet bylode into the Thamis, had bene of such large breadth and depth, that ten or twelve ships at once with merchandises were wont to come to the foresaide bridge of Fleet, and some of them to Holbozne bylode: now the same course (by filth of the Tanners and such other) was sore decayed. Also by raping by of wharffes, but especially by turning of the water, which they of the newe Temple made to their milles with out Baynards Castle, and divers other perturbations, the saide shippes now could not enter as they were wont, and as they ought, therefore he desired, that the Spalor of London with the Sheriffes, and certaine discrete Aldermen might be appointed to see the course of the saide water, and that by oth of honest men all the foresaide hindrances might be removed, and to be made as it was wont of old time, &c. Which was answered and recorded, that Roger le Brabazon, the constable of the tower, with the spalor and Sheriffes are assigned, that taking with them other honest and discret men, they make diligent search and inquirie, how the saide river was in olde time, and that they leave nothing that maie hurt or stoppe it: and to keepe it in the same state that it was wont to be.

King Edward remaining all the winter and summer at Carlisle, disposed manie things of Scotland at his pleasure: but in the meane time Robert le Bruce going about the Countrey, did manie that would not please him, and he sent with part of his army two of his brethren, Thomas that was a knight, and Alexander a pylest, Deane of Glaseo, into another part of the Countrey, that they might allure the people unto them by gentle persuasions, which (by committing of Englishmen upon them) were taken, ledde to the Justices, condemned, hanged and headed at Carlisle.

Joane of Acres Countesse of Gloucester deceased.

King Edward sent messengers into England, commanding all that ought him service to be ready at Carlisle, within three weekes after the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist: but himselfe being vexed with the bloudie fluxe, hee sent unto his sonne that hee shoulde come with speede to heare his last wordes. Whome, among other things hee did counsell to be mercifull, just, and constant in all his wordes and deedes: hee commanded him not to be too hasty to take upon him the Crowne of England, untill he had revenged the injuries done by the Scottes, but rather to staie in those partes; and to cause his fathers bones (being closed in a chest) to be bozne about with him, till he had gone thowoe all Scotland and overcome his aduersaries. He also commanded him to honour his mother, and love his two brethren, Thomas earle of Sparthall, and Edmund Earle of Kent. Moreover he charged him on his curse, that he should not presume to call home Pierce of Ganeffon, by common decree banished without common fauour: he declared to him also, that he had taken on him the crosse, for the service in the holy land, to the which he had determined to haue gone in person, but troubled with the newe and diuers at-temptes of Robert le Bruce, he was hindered of his purpose, and was constrained, omitting that businesse, to turne the warre into Scotland. 3000. pound of silver (saide he) I haue prepared for the charges of an hundred knights to go honorably thither with their retinnes: because it is not my happe to performe in proper person, what I had intended, let them yet take my heart, and carrie thither, which if they doe, I trust in my God that all things shall prosper with them. I therefore (saith he) doe straightly command the in paine of my curse, that am thy father, that the saide money be not otherwise spent.

The king also called vnto him Henry Lacy earle of Lincoln, Guy Earle of Warwike, Aymer de Valence Earle of Pembroke, and Robert Clifford Baron, desiring them to be good to his son, and that they should not suffer Pierce of Ganeffon to come again into England, to set his sonne in riot, and the seventh of July he departed this life at Wygh upon the sands, in the yere 1307. When he had reigned 34. yeres, 7. monethes, and odde daies, and was 68. yeres of age. He was buried at Westminster.

He had issue by his first wife Elianor, daughter to the king of Spaine, five sonnes, to wit, Henry, Iohn, and Alfonso that died without issue, Edward that succeeded him in the kingdome, and Henry that died without issue, and tenne daughters, to wit, Elianor Countesse of Warre, Joane of Acres Countesse of Glocest. Julian that died young, Margaret Countesse of Sabant, Alice that died young, Elizabeth Countesse of Hereford, Elizabeth Countesse of Holland, Mary that was a Nunne at Ambesbury, Beatrice that died young, Blanch that died young: he had issue by Margaret daughter to Philip king of France his second wife, two sons, to wit, Thomas of Woodstock, and Edmond of Woodstocke Earle of Kent, and one daughter, named Elianor that died young.

He ordained Walter Reignald to be his Chancelour, and caused Walter Langton Byschoppe of Chester, Treasuror of Englande, to bring the king his fathers bodie from Carlisle to Waltham crosse, and then to be arrested by Sir John Felton Constable of the Tower, and sent to Wallingford, there to be shut up in prison, and his goods confiscate, because in his fathers life time he had reproved him of his insolent life, &c. He also called out of exile Pierce of Ganeson a stranger borne, which latelie in his fathers daies, had for certain causes bene banished this land. He gave to the saide Pierce the earldome of Cornemall, the Isle of Man, and the Lordship of Wallingford, other wise assigned to Duene Isabel.

A parliament was holden at Southampton, wherein it was ordained, that his fathers colne, which was counted base, should not be refused upon paine of life and Lim, and that a fifthenth of the cleargie, and twentieth part of the goods of the Lattie should be given to the king.

The 27. of October king Edward the first was buried at Westminster, at the head of Henry the thirde his father, into the which Church hee had giuen lands to the value of 100 pound by year, fiftentie pound thereof yearly to be distributed to the poore. Anthony Becke patriarche of Jerusalem and Byschop of Durham doing the exequies.

After the Epiphany of our Lord, all the Templars in England were apprehended and committed to prison in divers places.

The king went over into France, and married Isabel the daughter of Philip the faire king of France, at Boloigne the 22. of January. There were present at that marriage Philip king of France, his son king of Navarre, the king of Almaine, and the king of Sicilie, with manie other. And on the 24. daie of February, king Edward with his Quene were crowned at Westminster, by Henrie Byschop of Winchester, being admitted so to do by Robert Archbishop of Cantuarbie. The king offered first a pound of golde made like a king holding a ring in his hand, and after he offered a marke of gold (which is 8. ounces) made like a pilgrime putting forth his hand to receive the ring. Sir John Blackwell knight, was thrust to death at his Coronation.

The king gave unto Pierce of Ganeson all such gifts and Jewels as had bin given to him, with the crownes of his father, his ancestors treasurie, and manie other things, affirming that if he could, he should succeed him in the kingdome, calling him Brother, not granting aught without his consent. The Lords therefore enaying him, told the king, that the father of this Pierce was a traitour to the king of France, and was for the same executed, and that his mother was burned for a witch, and that the said Pierce was banished for consorting to his mothers traitor, and that hee had now bene with the king himselfe. They brought the king to heare therefore their petitions, which should be both for his owne honor, and for the wealth of his people.

First, that hee would confirme and use such ancient Lawes and customs,

as are contained in the Charters of the kings his Predecessors: and for that they would graunt him the twentieth part of their goods, as bee his true subiects.

Secondlie, that he would take nothing of a free man, but at the price of the owner, the same to be paid for to the uttermost.

Thirdlie, that whatsoever was alienated from the crowne, since his fathers death, might be restored thereunto againe.

Fourthlie, that hee would observe the oathe hee made before his father, as of the revoking of Peter Gaveston, the prosecuting of the Scottish warre, and that all that was amisse should be amended, least his enemies rejoice at it, &c.

That Justice and Judgement might be done in the Lande, as well to the Rich, as to the Poore, according to the ancient and olde approved Lawes and Customs of Englande, and that no man should be restrained by the Kinges Witte from prosecuting his Right, or to defende himselfe by Lawe.

When the king taking counsell of Pierce, Hugh Spencer the Treasurer, the Chancelour and others, hee appoynted to answer the Barons at the parliament on Hockday. The barons being departed out of London, the city gates were shutt up and chained, greate watch kept, and Hugh Spencer made Constable of London. The k. with Peter of Gaveston went toward Wallingford Castle with a great companie of souldiers, as well strangers as English, and Hugh Spencer tarried still at London. The Parliament on Hockday was kept, the king and Barons being there when the preachers that the same Pierce should be banished the land to depart on the morrowe after Epiphomys date, neuer to returne againe. The king gave him two and thirtie Townes, and so manie castles in Gascoigne, and great summes of money out of his earldome of Cornemall during his life: The king accompanied him to Wyke, sent him into Ireland, assigning him the whole government and revenues of that countrey.

The king sent for Pierce of Gaueffon out of Ireland: he landed at Carnarvon, on the euen of S. The barons the refoze declared to the king, that except he would compell the said Pierce from his company, they would rise against him as against a perjured Prince: whereupon by the aduise of Pierce of Gaueffon, the king sent for aide into Gascoigne, to the earle of Foy, and the Count of Henop, and they came with three hundred horsemen through Fraunce, but Philippe the French king imprisoned the chiefe, and slewe and hanged the other. Also, the king of Engl had word from Robert Bruce of Scotland, and from Robert Fitz Thomas of Ireland, that they would not take part with the king against his Barons, whereupon the king bring togeth, fortified Windosor castle, and began to build towres and other strange things.

The Abbot of Saint Denis in France, being sent Legate from the Pope, to demand the Legacie that king Edwards father gaue to the holie Lande, did earnestlie request king Edwards to remoue from him Peter Gaueffon, with whose conuersation all the world was as it were infected. When the king appointed a Parliament at Southampton, determining from thence to passe into Scotland: the Barons came to this parliament well furnished, but the king sent them word he would not come there, yet at the last he came to Stone Strاتفord, whither he was sent to him by the Barons, the earles of Warwike and Clare, who requested him to come for his owne profite, and the commonalty of the Realme: at length he went in the habite of a squire, and the Barons met him without armor, and in the end they lovingly embraced and were made friends, and the voyage to Scotland was returned till another time. After Michaelmas, the Parliament was holden at London, unto the which Parliament came Lewes the French kings brother, with the Bishoppes of Woytore, from the king of France, to intercede betwixt the king and his lordes; and there were diuers good ordinaunces made. And once againe, though force against the kings mind, he caused Pierce to abjure, with condition added by the barons, that if he were found again in any land subiect to the kings dominion, he should be taken as a common enemy, and condemned. This being done, he passed into Flanders, and from thence to other countries, seeking rest, which hee could not find.

Windsor.

The seconde daie of September at night, an horrible Tempest of thunder happened, so that hedges and trees lost their greenesse, and the Church of Spidleton in Dorsetshire, with the Steeple, Belles, and ornaments, and all other monuments monuments of that place, were consumed with the lightning, the monks being at Pattins.

Henry Knyght earle of Lincolne, Constable of Chester, and Custos of Englannde, died at London, in his house called Lincolnes Inne, in Holborne: hee was buried in the new Church (whereof he was founder) of S. Pauls Church, betwixt our Ladies Chappel, and S. Dunstons Chappel, there a faire monument of stone was raised for him, with his picture in armour crosse legged, as a Templar beloned for the defence of the holie land, and Citie of Ierusalem.

A Provinciall Councell was holden at London against the Templars in England, upon heresie & other articles, whereof they were accused, who denied the fact, saving one or two of them: notwithstanding all this confesse, that they coulde not purge themselves, and therefore were condemned to perpetuall penance in severall monasteries, where they behaued themselves vertie well.

At Paris in France 54. of the Templars were bent, by the iudgement of Philip the French king.

Pierce of Gaueffon conceiuing an affiance in the fauour of king Edward, and of the young earle of Gloucester, whose sister he had married, taking with him many strangers, returned into England, and a little before Christmas came to the kings presence, whom the king, forgetting all oathes and promised pades, received as a beauenlie gift.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Wyke, where Pierce of Gaueffon was present with his Dutchlandish men, the king reioicing, and being in a greatesolitude because he had receiued him in safetie, all the court and Queene being sorrowfull, because they sawe the king not vertie founde. The mightie men of the land therefore sought howe they might set an ende to the trouble at hande, for they feared to raise warre, and durst not disquiet the king, yet the perill being leied, they founde that so long as Pierce liued, there coulde be no peace in the kingdome, nor the king to abound in treasure, nor the Queene to enioy the kinges true love. Thus after they had long considered the perilles past, present, and to come, they determined rather to trie all extremities, then to be despised and set at naught by a stranger, they chose a captain then for their business to come, Thomas of Lancaster, noble in lineage, ballaunt in armes, excellent in fame for his maners and iustice, he was son to Edmund earle of Lancaster, and therefore by inheritance earle of Lancaster, Leicester and Ferrers. In proces of time he married the only daughter of the earle of Lincoln, to wit, Henrie Lacyes daughter, whereupon after the earles decease, of a great man, he was made a greater, for he was earle of Lincoln, and of Salisburie, besides the liberties of Pickering, and the honoz of Cokermore, and other great lands in Wales, and the earldome of Artoys in France.

Anthony Beke Patriarch of Ierusalem, and Bishop of Durham, deceased at Eltham on the 28. of March, after he had late Bishop 28. yeres and was buried at Durham. Hee encausled the ancient Spanno place belonging to the Bishops of Durham at Aukland, he made there the great hall, wherein hee did set pillars of blache marble, speckled with white, and the great chamber with other buildinges there, hee also made the exchaung goble Chappell at Aukland.

land of well squared stone, and founded there a Colledge with a Deane and prebends, and a quadrant in the south-west side of the Castle for Spinifiers of his Colledge: he builded or repayed castl Barnard, Gainsforth and Cunctliff; hee also builded Somerton Castle in Worcheshire, which Castle hee gave to the king, and the manor of Clifton in Kent, which hee gave to the Duene. The king shortly after gave the castle of Somerton to Henry Beaumont. The castle of Alnwick which William de Velez had given unto him by the said Bishop, trusting in him, that he would preserve it to the use of the bishops young husband, and deliver it to him when he came to mans estate, he took money therefore, and sold it to Henry Piercy, he had the use of man during his life by the kings graunt, Kellow was elect Bishop of Durham.

King Edward with Peter Gaucelion his companion, went to Porke, where the king was lodged in the palace of the Archbishop, and Peter in the Castle: they caused the Citie to be fortified, and the walles to be repayed, and sent to Robert Bailliol of Scotland for aide against his Lordes; but Robert came answer, he would not forgo Scotland, neither would he disquiet any man: the like answer was made by the Welchmen. The earles assembled at Bedford, Gilbert the younger Earle of Gloucester being one of them was made Custos of England, they came to London, and obtained the Deas to be kept, that strangers should enter to aide the king.

After Easter Bartram nephew to Pierce Gaucelion was taken in Cornwall with great treasure which he had conveyed out of the kings Treasure: his ship being tossed with tempest on the Sea, was driven where it was taken, and the treasure was brought to London in Cartes.

About this time king Edward for his recreation toke the Sea, leaving Peter of Gaucelion at Porke, whereupon the Barons brought their power, and entered the city of Porke, but Peter fled to Scarborough; then the Barons beseged Scarborough, where they toke him, and committed him to the custody of Aymer de Valence earle of Pembrroke, who brought him to the manor of Waddington which is betwixt Oxford and Warwicke, and there left him to be kept safe: but the next day in the morning Guy earle of Warwicke with a company of armed men, toke him from thence, and brought him to Warwicke castle: after deliberation taken, the earles of Lancaster, of Warwicke, and of Hereford, caused in their presence in a place then called Black Lowe, since Gaucelion beate, the 19. of June his head to be stricken off: his body by the frier preachers was conveyed to Oxford, and there kept more then two yerres, till the king caused the same to be translated to his manor of Langley, and there in the friers church (which he had builded) to be buried.

Quene Isabel was delivered of her first sonne, named Edward at Winton, the 12. day of November.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Winton.

Robert de Brose got againe almost all Scotland, the Castles with him into the English Garrisons being cast out) he toke againe into his power. This was the reason by consent of the Prelates, and certaine Nobles, Hugh Spencer the sonne was appointed the Kings Chamberlaine in place of Peter of Gaucelion, whom they the rather preferred, because they knew the king hated him: never the less, not long after, by his great diligence, he brought him self into the kings favour. The father of this Hugh being old, was yet living, a knight of great vertue, in counsell wise, in armes valiant, whose confusion and shameful end he wanne unto himselfe by natural loue though dishonourable towards his sonne, who was in bodie verie comely, in spirit proud, and in action most wicked, whose comeliness and ambition, by the disserving of himselfe and strangers, wrought the death of the Nobles, the fall of the king, with the utter destruction of himselfe and his father.

King Edward gathering a great power, marched towards Scotland, to besiege the siege of Strueling Castle, and lodged himselfe and his people there about in the helde on the euen of S. John Baptist: never afore that time was there the like preparation, pride and cost in the time of warre, as affirmeth Robert Paston, a Carmelite frier, being present, and taken of the Scots, which he sorrowfully bewailed in his Heroycall Verse while he was prisoner. The first night (saith hee) ye might haue seene the Englishmen bathing themselves in wine, and casting their gorges: there was crying, shouting, laughing, and drinking, with other sporting farre above measure. On the other side, ye might haue seene the Scottes quiet still, and close, fasting the euen of Saint John Baptist, labouring in loue of the libertie of their Countrey. On the morning, the Scottes having gotten the most convenient place in the helde by the dikes, made ditches in the grounde that were deep, and the like in breadth, from the right wing of the army, unto the left, covering the same with twigs as hurdles, and againe over with the Turfe and grass, which was not of strength to beare horsemen. The army of the Scottes being divided into certaine troupes, stood not farre off from this dike, which was betwixt them and the Englishmen. On the other side, the army of the Englishmen coming out of the West, the sunne rising, casting his beams on their golden Targets, bright helmets, and other armour, gave such a resplendence, as was both wonderful and terrible to behold. In the first warde were the light horsemen, and heauie couriers. In the second were the Archers, and other footmen, who were appointed for the chase of the aduersaries. In the third was the king with his Bishopps, and other Religions, amongst whom was Hugh Spencer. The horsemen of the first front making upon their enemies, sounded with their force late into the ditch, and lay the same, adding the crueltie of the Scots, who coming upon them, did the same, and toke a great many rich men for ransome. There was also Gilbert de Clare Earle of Gloucester, (whome the Scottes would gladly haue kept for ransome, if they had knowen him, but he had forgotten to put on his coat of armes) with him was also Sir Edmond Manly, Sir Robert Clifford, Sir

There was taken Humfrey de Bohun earle of Herefordshe, John Segraue, John Claueringham, William Latimer, Sir Roger Northbrooke, bearer of the kinges shield or Seale: but Sir Ralf Mounthermer that had married Iane of Acres Countesse of Gloucester, the kinges sister, being taken, founde such favour, that his ransom was pardoned, and he returning into England, brought back with him the kinges shield or Seale; but Sir Edmond Marly the kinges steward showed himselfe in Banockburne.

Almost three hundred men of armes were slaine in that place, our Archers killing manie of them, who seeing the Scottes cruellie bent upon our Hosts men fallen in the ditch, shotte their Arrowes with a high compasse, that they might fall betwixt the armour of their Enemies, which was all in bayne: and then they shotte righte sooth, they slawe fewe of the Scottes, by reason of their armed breasts, but manie of the Englishmen, by reason of their naked backs.

The king with the Wythoppes, and Hugh Spencer betooke themselves to flight; in which danger of flying, the king turned to G. D. D. that hee would build unto the pope Carmelite friers an house, in the which hee would place 24. Wythoppes, to be Students in Divinitie, which he afterward performed in Oxford.

Robert de Bruse caused his prisoners to be cruellie intreated, and honorable kept, he sent the bodies of the earle of Gloucester, and of the Baron Clifford, to the king of England, remaining then at Berwikke, to be buried at his pleasure, demanding no rewarde for; restoring of them. The earle of Glocest. was buried at Tewkesbury, his inheritance was divided betwene 3. sisters of the said Earle; the first whereof Hugh Spencer had to wife, the second Hugh Audley (whome Pierce de Gaueston before had married) the third Roger de Tamary (whome before John de Brugh sonne and heire, to the heire of Viskin in Ireland had married) and so the inheritance of that noble Carle dome was divided into three baronies.

Chron. Tint.

Ralf Baldocke bishop of London deceased, who in his life time gave 2000. marks of silver, toward the building of the newe worke of the Chappell on the South side of our Ladies Chappell in the East end of the church of S. Paul in London, and left much by his Testament to the same worke. And this is to be noted, that in digging the foundation of this worke, was found more then 100. heads of oxen & hene, which thing confirmed greatly the opinion of those which have reported, that of old time it had been called the Temple of Jupiter, and that there was the sacrifice of beasts.

The king calling to him the Archbishop of Canterbury, 4. other Bishops and manie Abbots and ecclesiastical persons, he caused the bodie of Pierce de Gaueston to be translated, and honorably buried at Langlep, but yet there were not manie of the nobles at his buriall.

The morow after Candlemas day there assembled a parliament at London, to treat of the state of the kingdome, and how to bring downe the prices of victuals, that were now grown to be so deere, that the common people were not able to live. It was the refore ordained, and the kings writs were published for prices of victuals, that no Dr. should or come, sed, bee sold for more then foure and twentie shillings: no grasse fed Dr. for more then fiftene shillings: a fat Calf at twelve shillings: another Calf at tenne shillings: a fat Suttton corne fedde, or whose wool is well grown, at twentie pence: another fat Suttton thorne, at fourtene pence: a fat Hogge of two yeres old, at thre shillings foure pence: a fat Cose, at two pence halfe pence, in the citie at thre pence: a fatte Capon at two pence, in the Citie two pence halfe pence: a fatte Yenne at one pence, and in the Citie thre halfe pence: two Chickens a peny, in the citie thre halfe pence: foure Pigeons for one pence, in the citie thre pence for a peny: foure and twentie egges a pennie, in the citie twentie egges a peny, &c.

Notwithstanding the statutes of the last Parliament, the kings writtes, & all things were sold dearer then before, no flesh conde be had, Capons and Cose would not be found, Eggs were hard to come by, Shape died of the rot, Swine were out of the way: a quarter of wheat, beanes, and pease, were sold for 20. shillings, a quarter of spalte for a Marke, a quarter of salt for 35 shillings, &c.

John Poydras, a Tanners sonne of Exeter, in diuers places of England, named himselfe the sonne of Edward the first, and sayde, that by a false purse hee was stolen out of his Cradle, and Edward that now was king, put in his place; but shortly after he was convicted of his untrue, and confessed that hee did it by the motion of a familiar spirit which hee had in his house in likeness of a Catte, whome he had served thre yeres, for the which service hee was hanged betwixt Southampton and Wallingworth, in a place called the Copid thorne.

The king in a parliament at London, gave the rodde and office of Marshall unto Thomas Wytherton earle of Norfolk his brother. He also renoked the possessions before made for selling of Victualles, and permitted all men to make the beste of that they had; neuertheless the dearth encreased through the abundance of raine that fell in Haruest, so that a Quarter of wheat, or of Salte, was sold before Whitsommer for thirte shillings, and after 40. shillings.

There followed this famine, a grievous mortalitie of people, so that the quick might vnder burie the dead.

Robert Fitz Paine deceased, and was buried at Shireborne. Also Guido de bello campo earle of Warwick deceased.

The beastes and cattell also by the corrupt grasse whereof they fedde, died, whereby it came to passe, that the eating of flesh was suspected of all men, for fish of Beasts not corrupted was hard to find. There arrived in England by the kings request Gauscelinus and Lucas de Plisco, two Cardinales, to make peace betwixt the Realme of England and Scotland, and to reconcile unto the king Thomas earle of Lancaster. They brought Bullis from the Pope to excommunicate the Scottes, except they returned unto peace with the king of England. These Cardinales went into the North parts, to enball Lodowike Beomond, to whom the Pope (at the kings instance) had given the Bishopricke of Durham: and when they came nere unto the Towne of Berlington, certayne Robbers breaking out of a baloy, Gilbert Middleton and Walter Selby being their Captaynes, sodaynelle sette upon the familie of the Cardinales and of Lodowike on Wilselsheden Pass, robbed them of their treasure, and carried Lodowike Bishop of Durham to spoweth, where they constrained him to paie a great ransom: they brought Henry Beaumont to the castle of Winford, and there kept him till he had paid a great great ransom: but the Cardinales came to Durham, where they tarried a few daies for answers of the Scots, and so under the kings conduct they returned to Pothe, and left their businesse which they came for to done. Gilbert Middleton after many damages done to the priory of Tynmouth and other, was taken in his owne Castle of Spittford, by William Felton, Thomas Henson, and Robert Horncliffe, carried to London, and there in the presence of the Cardinales executed and hanged.

The 14. daie of February, the king by his charter granted to the scholars of the University of Cambridge, that whensoever the Spalor of the towne shal take his accustomed othe, he shall be sworn in presence of the Chancellor of the University to uphold and maintaine the liberties and priuiledges of the University, and the same shall not maliciously or treacherously impugn, and for lacke thereof, the othe to be of no force, but to be againe ministered to that effect.

The Cardinales under certayne conditions, made peace betwixt the king and Thomas earle of Lancaster, which conditions shortly after were unlikly broken.

Sir Gosseline Deuail and his brother Robert, with two hundred in the habit of Friars did many notable robberies, they spoiled the bishop of Durhams pallaces, leauing nothing in them but bare walls, for the which they were after hanged at Pothe.

Ed. Edward kept his Christmas at Beverley with many prelates, lords, and barons, at which time he provided himselfe of a great army, that he might bring down the pride of the Scots, if by any means it were for him profitable, and to deliver England from their eruptions.

About Epiphany the towne of Berwick was betrayed to the Scots, through the treason of Peter Spalding, and other Englishmen, where the king of Scots came to be hanged for being traitors to their countrey. The castles held out, till for want of victuals they within were constrained to deliver it into the Scottishens hands, who was also at the same time, the castles of Warbetel, Elark, and Epiford, so that they possessed the more part of all Northumberland, even to Newcastle upon Tyne, having certain castles that were defended against them.

In May they went further into the land, burning all before them, till they came to Ripon, which towne they spoiled, and carrying thither dales, they received 1000 marks of those that were got into the church, because they should not put the towne to the fire, as they had done the townes of Spothallerton, and Woughbridge, &c.

In their returning backe, they bent Barnsburgh, and Whipton in Craven, and al other afoye them, carrying into Scotland a marvellous multitude of catell, besides prisoners men and women.

The Scottishmen gathered together, to the number of 10000 men, to fight the Scots at the Towne of Pitton, tenne miles by Rosburgh from York, where they lost 3000. men, and were overcome by the Scots. Which when the king heard tel of, he left the siege of Berwick, and hastied to meet the Scots, but they returned another waie.

The Pope ordained, that Parsons should have but one benefice a peece: where upon patrons straight presented new parsons to the residue.

A great mercuriall of kine happened, which were so mortally infected, that dogs and ravens eating of the carrion of the kine, were poisoned, and did such death, so that no man durst eat anie beefe.

The king being at York, the Scots entered England, came to York, and bent the suburbs of the city, and took Sir John de Wypain earle of Richmond prisoner, with many other.

Many heretikes and certain women of England, and of other parts of the world, gathered themselves together, and would go take the holie land, to kill the enemies of Christ, as they said: but because they could not passe over the great sea, they slew many Jewes in the parts of Sholousse and Calcoigne, where many of them were taken and put to death.

King Edward kept his feast of Christmas at Winchester.

This year the Pope granted to the king of England, the tenth of all ecclesiastical goods for one year, as before he had done the like.

In the moneth of June King Edward went into France, and came to Amiens, where he met with the king of France, and received of him the countie of Ponthieu.

The 15. of October the clarks of the Exchequer went to York with the holie called Writtes day, and other Records, and provided that laded 21 cartes, but within the space of halfe a year in the halendis of Spain they his returned againe to London.

The same year the kings Justices sat in the Tower of London, whereupon John Gisors late mayor of London and many others fled the city, for things they had presumptuously done, and live to the miseries galleys.

This year the Jewes were distressed through all Christendome, for that they had couenanted with the Sarazens to poison the Christians in all places, which in divers parts they brought to passe, putting poison into wellles, fountains, pits, and other places; upon the which divers of them in psonance, and in other parts of France were bent, and the Jewes were detained in prison for consenting hereto to them, there died in Almaine for this cause (after some Authors) above 12000. Jewes.

The earle of Hereford bought of Sir Wil. Bruce knight, a portion of land in the marches of Wales called Gowers.

Roger Mortimer the Uncle, and Roger the stepbrother, not knowing of the said bargaine, had also bought the said ground of the said William Bruce, who the 2. of Mowbray, who had married the daughter and heire of the said William, clamed it by inheritance of his wife. Last of all, Hugh Spencer the younger had bought that land, and put them all out, whereupon the most nobles were sore moved, and Humfrey earle of Hereford complained to Thomas earle of Lancaster, which two earles allied almost all the other earles and barons to take their part. Thomas earle of Lancaster being their captain, they came to Sherborne, and from thence with banners displayed, to Saint Albons: from thence they sent to the king being at London, requiring him to liberty the two Hugh Spencers, which were condemned by the communitie in many articles: which when the king would not grant, the barons came to London, where at length the king granted their petition, so that Hugh Spencer the elder was banished, but the younger Hugh fell to supplying on the sea, taking out of two Prisons about 5000. goods to the value of 20000. pounds.

About the feast of St. Michael, Isabel the queene came from Canterbury to the castle of Leeds in Kent, purposing to have lodged there that night, but she could not be permitted to enter.

The king being thus being offended, as being done in contempt of him, calling to him the Commons of Essex and London, he seized the castle, which belonged to Bartholomew de Badlesmere, who having left his wife and children

In the meane time they in Lewes Castle besparring of their safegarde, the noble men with their army came to Kingston in the Vigill of Saint Simon and Jude, demanding (by the Bishops of Canterburie and London, and the Earle of Penbroke, who were sent betwene them) that the king woulde give over his siege, promising, that they after the next Parliament woulde deliver the Castle into the kings handes, and become obedient unto him: but the king would not graunt the noble mens petition, who being returned into other partes, the king with much labour obtained the Castle, and hanging fire of the chiefe of those whom he found therein, he sent the wife and children of Badellsmere to the Tower of London.

King Edward held his Christmasse at Cirencester, and after Christmasse leaving Gloucester and Worcester, he with his army went to Shrewsbury and Wigmore. Both the Mortimers meeting the king, treacherly and peaceably submitted themselves unto him: but the king sent them both to the tower of London.

Mawrice Berkeley, and Hugh Audley in like sort submitting themselves, he sent to Wallingford Castle.

Humfrey Earle of Hereford, Gilbert Talbot, Raufe Damary, and their adherents, fled into the north to the earle of Lancaster.

About the latter end of February the king gathered an hoste & went against the rebels, and at Burton upon Trent put them to flight. The king pursuing them the 16 of March, the hostes met againe at Borsbrydge, where Humfrey de Bohune (by a certaine Welchman, who stode under the bridge) being thrust into the fundament with a spear, died. There were taken in the field Thomas earle of Lancaster, with the lordes, knights, and other to the number of 65, the rest saving themselves by flight.

These, by the subgiment of Andrew Harkely earle of Carlisle, were condemned.

On the two and twentieth of March Thomas of Lancaster was beheaded: Waren de Lile, William Tochet, Thomas Manduit, Henry Bradebourne, William Fitz Will, the younger, and William Cheyney, Barons hanged & quartered at Pontefract: Jo. Mowbray, Roger Clifford, Goceline Deinuile, barone & quartered at Poike: Bartholomew Badellsmere at Canterbury: Henry de Mountfort, Henry Willington at Wyllow: Joh. The third weeke after Easter, a parliament was gathered at Poike, where Hugh Spencer the father was made earle of Wiltshire, unto whom the king gave the castle and hono<sup>r</sup> of Dunnington, which was parcel of the earldome of Lincoln.

About the feast of St. James, the king with a great army entred Scotland, but the Scots having destroyed all above, were retired beyond the Scottish sea. So that the king being oppressed by famine, returned into England, whom the Scottes followed, and in a place of the forrest of Blackmarke they sette on the king, so that he hardely escaped.

There was taken, the Earle of Richmond, and the Lorde of Silicico, the French kings Embassadors, and manie other: whereupon the Scottes spoiling all the Countrey, and burning even to Poike, they burned Ripon, and slew manie priests of the colledge there: but in Beverley they hurt not a man, for the Burgesses and Chanons did redeem the same with 400. pounds of sterling monie. And so the Scots by reason of winter made returne, beeing laden with spoiles.

This yere the R. made sir Andrew Herkeley Earle of Carlisle, and gave him lands in the sparches of Scotland.

This yere the Staple of the Monastery at Ely fell downe in the night, but hurt no person: which Staple was afterwarde twentie yeres and more in building, ere it were fully finished, and cost in the time of Allaine the sacril of that church, 2406. pounds 16. shillings and eleven pence: which Staple is builded by Architecture 8. square, of timber upon 8. Pillars of stone, and called the Ranshoirne. This is accompted one of the four famous thinges that commendeth the Ile and Church: the other thre beeing the Chappell of our Ladie, the Mill, and the Vineyard. Alicia Lady of the Ile, third wife to Robert Fitz Walker deceased, and was buried nigh to her parents in the church of the friars preachers of Cambridge.

About the feast of the Purification of our Ladie, Andrew de Herkeley late made Earle of Carlisle, under colour of peace, sayned that hee woulde marrie Robert Bruse his sister. Whereupon the king re putting him a Traytour, caused him to be taken by his trustie friend sir Anthony de Lucie, who sent him in pions straight to London, where he was lodged before sir Anthony de Lucy in this manner. He was ledde to the barre as an earle worthily apparelled, with his sword girt about him, hooded, booted, and spurred, &c. Unto whom sir Anthony spake in this manner: Sir Andrew (quoth hee) the king, for thy ballant service hath done thee great honour, and made thee earle of Carlisle, since which time, thou, as a traitour to thy Lorde the king, leddest his people that should have help him at the battell of Belgisland, abate by the countrie of Copland, and through the earldome of Lancaster, by which meanes our Lorde the king was discomfited here of the Scots, through thy treason and falloweshe, where as if thou haddest come betimes, he had had the victorie: and this treason thou committedst, for the great summe of Wolbe and Silver that thou receivedst of James Dowglaſſe, a Scot, the kings enemy. Our Lord the king will therefore, that the order of knightthod, by the which thou receivest all thine honour and worship upon thy badge, bee brought to nought, and thy state undone, that other knights of lower degree, may after thee beware, and take example hereafter truly to serve.

Then commanded hee to helpe his Spurres from his heeles, then to breake his sword over his head which the king had given him, to keepe and defend his land therewith, when he made him Earle. After this, hee let unclose him of his furred Tabard, and of his hose, of his coate of armes, and also of his Girdle: and when this was done, Sir Anthonie saide unto him, Andrewe (quoth hee) now art thou no knight but a knave, and for thy treason, the king will that thou shalt bee hanged and drawne, and thine head smitten off from thy bodie: thy bowelles taken out of thy bodie and buried before thee, and thy bodie quartered; and thy head being smitten off, afterward to be set upon London bridge, and thy foure quarters shall be sent unto foure good towne of England, that all other maie beware by thee. And as Anthony Lucy had saide, so was it done in all thinges, on the last daie of October.

In the month of Aprill the spallor and communkite of Cambridge, rose in great multitude against the scholars: In which tumult divers scholars were smayned, and some slaine, and the Charters of their priviledges torne and shrowne into the myre in miserable sort: whereupon the king sent thither after Henry Spigurnell, spall. Robert de Malberthorpe and others, with communkite to punish the offence.

The second day of August the two Mortimers were adjudged to bee drawn and hanged at Westminster, for divers robberies and murders which the king laide against them, but no execution of that judgement was done, by reason of a writ that the king sent to Sir Richard de Swardstone then Constable of the Tower, to stay the judgement, and the king granted them their lives, to be in perpetuall prison.

The 30. day of May Aymer de Valence Earle of Denbroke Hugh Spencer the younger, Robert Baldocke Archdeacon of Middlesex, Sir William Here knight, William de Arzewine Chanon of Poike, Galfide de Scroope, were for King Edward of England sent unto Newcastle upon Tyne, where they met with William Bishoppe of Saint Andrewes, Thomas Randolph Earle of Mount, John de Metch, Robert de Lowther, the father, knights, and maister Walter de Tromant Clarke for the king of Scottes, there to talke of a final peace: but when that would not be, they fell to a truce, which they agreed upon for thirtene payres, which was proclaimed about the eleventh of June, dated at Boorpe nere unto Poike.

This yere Philip king of France died, and his brother Charles succeeded him.

About the beginning of August, E. Edward being at Pickering, there came

Embassadours

Embassadours from the new French king, the Lord Benuille and Sir Andrew de Florenia, to cite the king to come to do homage for Guyen, Aquitaine, and other lands which he held of him: and though Hugh Spencer the son Lord Chamberlaine, and Robert Baldocke Lord Chancellor, had procured the said Embassadours, not to declare their message unto the king, yet when they should depart, they did it, admonishing him to come.

And the said Sir Andrew de Florenia being a Notarie, made a publicke instrument of the said citation and admonition.

Reginald de Asshe bishop of Elyngester, deceased, and John de Stratford succeeded in that bishopricke.

The French king made a proceſſe against the E. of England. And Charles de Valois uncle to king Charles of France a most deadly enemy to Englishmen, did seize on the dukedome of Anglow, and the County of Poytow to the use of his nephew the king.

At the length going forward to the towne of Wyall, he found it well defended by Edmond of Woodstock earle of Kent, betwixt whom a final truce being taken, to continue until such time as it could be determined betwene both the kings as concerning peace, and the towne being peesed up, both the armies departed home.

The next Lent in a parliament holden at London, Adam Tarleton bishop of Hereford was accused of treason, but by the Archbishops of Canterbury, Poike, and Dublin, and their suffragan bishops, he was taken from the bar and had away: notwithstanding inquisition being made by lawful men of that Country, they found that he had ayded the Mortimers with horse and armour against the king, whereupon all his temporalities were seized into the kings hands.

In this Parliament the king granted a petition of the Prelate, that all the bodies of the noble men that were hanged on galowes, should be taken down, and buried in ecclesiasticall sepulture.

The king also asked a subsidy of the cleargie and people, for the redeming of John Bypaine earle of Archemond.

Adam Tarleton Bishoppe of Hereford, being deprived of all his temporal goods, did hate the Spencers deadly, so did Henry Burwash of Lincaine, whose temporalities by the space of two yeres had bene detained in the kings hands) of whom and of other were made these verses:

Hen Blanford,
Parliament
at London.

Hen Blanford,

In this parliament, the landes, lordships, and possessions of the Templars were given to the hospitallers of Saint Iohn of Jerusalem, through the whole realme, to be by them possessed for ever, for the defence of Christendome against the Infidels.

Wolmer of
eth out of the Tower.

Whan Lammas day Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, by making a solemn banquet to sir Stephen Segraue constable of the Tower of London, and the other officers, and giving to his keepers a sleepe drinke, escaped out of the Tower, breaking through the wall, and coming into the kitchen nere adjoyning to the kings lodgings, and getting out of the toppes thereof, came unto a warde of the Tower, and so with the cordes knitt ladder: wise, prepared afore hand by a friend of his, got to another warde, and so with great feare got to the Thamis, and with his helper and two mo of his counsell passed the river, and avoiding the high waies came to the Sea, and there finding a shippe at Worcester, he passed over into France to the king there, where he lived long, looking when he might be reconciled to the king of England: his uncle Roger being still kept in flight prison, the space almost of five yeres very uncourteously, at length he died, and was buried at Wythowe: for the escape of the yonger Mortimer, the king being fore offended, put sir Stephen Segraue out of his constableness of the tower. About the feass of St. Martin, were the Burgeses of London and of other townes attached by a Clearke, named Thomas Neubigging, who purchased a commission of the king, and by force thereof accused many, obediating against them, that they had conference with sir Roger Mortimer, maintaining and sustaining him, on the other side the Sea, and that they ayded and comforted him to escape out of the Tower, of which inditeiments the good people did purge themselves, by all the course of law, before the kings Justices, whereby that Clearke was compted a wicked man, and imprisoned as a false traytor. The king sent Embassadors to the French king, the Bishops of Winchester and of Worcester, with Iohn of Bytaine Earle of Richmond, to take order for the duke dome of Byptain, who after long debates toke a certaine forme of peace with the king.

The Quene sent into France.

King Edward kept his feast of Christmasse at Nottingham very nobly and royally, after that the truce had bene confirmed at Poyke, betwixt the Englishmen and the Scots, by the graue and wise persons of both the realmes.

King Edward sent the Quene his wife into her brother the French king, to establish the peace, who went over with a small company. By her mediast on a peace was fully finished, to wit, that the king of England should give unto his eldest sonne Edward, the duke dome of Aquitaine, and the earle dome of Pontue, and that the French king should receive homage of him: whereupon Edward the kings sonne went over with a competent household about the feast of St. Mathew, and did homage under certaine protestations, to his uncle the French king.

Quene, and his wife.

Whiles the quene with her suite remained in France longer then the kings pleasure was, and would not come againe without Roger Mortimer and other peables that were fledde out of Englands: and especiallie for the hatred she bare to the two Hugh Spencers, the king in displeasure banished them both, and all all other that took their partes: whereupon many fledde over the Seas to the Quene, amongst the which was one, a subtil knight, sir Robert Wakefare, who laying the Constable of Corfe Castle, brake from thence, where hee had long laine prisoner.

Sir Oliver Ingham knight, whom the yong duke Edward had made keeper of Aquitaine, gathered a great army, and invaded the Prince of Antioch (which the French king contrary to covenants, did withholde) and brought it whole into the dominion of England.

Forerover, the kings nauy toke 100. shippes of the Roymans, and brought them into England, for which cause great hatred grew betwixt the two kings and their realmes.

The quene percelating that the nobles of France were corrupted with gifts sent out of Englands, so that she could trust none of them, secretly conveyed her selfe and her son to the earle of Heynald, desiring aide of him: who received and intreated her very honourably so long as she remained there.

King Edward kept his Christmasse at St. Edmundsbury fore aftaid of the Quenes returne & of those exiled persons that were with her, lest they should with a power of Aliens put him downe from his kingly dignitie, wherefore he ordered his Castles as well in Wales as in England, to bee furnished with biqualles, munitions and men: he also let keepe his rivers and coastes of the Sea, whereof the men of the Cinque portes toke the charge to defend. He also commanded, that in euerie Citie, borough, towne corporate, hundred, and wapentake of England musters should be made, and their men to be exercised in armes, both on horsebacke and on foote, so that they might at all times bee ready when any hue and crie should be made, to pursue the Aliens if any came into England. And to this purpose, he ordained Bikenings or Beacons to be set up, that the same being fierced might be sene farre off, and thereby the people to be raised.

Isabel the Quene made a marriage betwixt her eldest sonne Edward, and Philip the daughter to William earle of Heynald, and then with her sonne Edward, Edmund of Woodstocke earle of Kent, the kings brother, Roger Mortimer, and many other noble men that fled out of England, and Iohn brother to William Earle of Heynald being captain, with spendary knights, out of Almaine and Heynald, he toke the seas with all her power, which were to the number of two thousand seven hundred fiftie and seven men well armed, and arrived at Wrewell, or Wrewell haven besides Hartwich in Essex, about Michaelmasse, whither immediately the Earle Marshall, the Earle of Leicester, the Bishops of Lincoln, Hereford, and Duelin, and Ely came, and being led to the Quene, made a great army: the other Bishops specially of Canterbury, ayded her with money. When she had refreshed her army at Saint Edmundsbury, she went forwards pursuing her enemies, whose goods she applied to her owne use.

The king requested aide of the citizens of London, who made him answer they would with due obedience, honour the king and Quene, and their sonne, who was lawfull heire to the realme, and that they would synthe their gates against gainst all foraine T raytours of the Realme: but they woulde not goe out of their citie to fight, except they might (according to their Liberties) retorne home againe the same daie before Sun set: which when the king heard, he fortified the Tower of London, and left there his younger sonne Iohn of Eltham: hee caused also to bee proclaimed that euerie man should resist them that were attainted, and to invade them to the bittermost of their powers (the Quene with her sonne Edward, and the earle of Kent his brother onelie excepted) and whoeuer could bring the head of Roger Mortimer, should haue 1000. pounds.

On the other side it was proclaimed in the Quenes behalfe, that all men should haue good peace, except the Disturbers of the Realme, to witte, the Spencers, the father and the sonne, Robert Baldocke Bishop of Norwich, the kings Chancellor, and their fauourers: and whoeuer did bring to the Quene the head of Hugh Spencer, should haue 1000. pounds. The citizens of London without respect of any, beheaded such as they tooke to be the Quenes enemies, among the which they beheaded one of their own citizens named Iohn Marshal because he was familiar with Hugh Spencer the younger.

They tooke also maister Walter Stapleton Bishoppe of Excester, and on the sixteenth daie of October beheaded him, and two of his seruants, a squire and a yeoman named William Askwall, and Iohn of Waddington at the Standarde in Cheape, because (as the saying was) hee had gathered a great army to iustifie and the Quene: they did also wrest the keyes of the Tower of London out of the Constables hands, and deliuered all the prisoners.

The king, Hugh Spencer the younger, and Robert Baldocke, determined to flee into the Ile of Lundy, which is in the mouth of the riuer Severne, two miles in length euerie waie, abounding with pasture grounds, and oates, very pleasant, it bringeth forth Conies verie plentifull, it hath Pigeons and other fowles, which Alexander Necham calleth Cantines des Wildes, hauing great needes. Altho it ministreth to the inhabitants fresh springing waters flowing out of fountains, although it be an euerie side enuironed with the salt Sea: it hath onelie one entrance into it, in the which two men together can scarce goe in a front; on all the other partes, there is an high hanging ouer of a great rocke, which letteth the passage to this Island as we haue saide: it aboundeth altogether with birdalles, and is verie full of wines, oile, honey, corne, braggot, salt-fish, flesh, and sea or earth coales.

The king being delirious to saile thither, a contrarie winde did altogether withstand him, whereupon hee scarce anoiding the cruell tempests of the seas, arrived at Glamorgan, and went to the Abbey of Metch, where, trusting too much to the promises of the Welshmen, he did pituile lacke.

The Quene being nio of great power under her sonnes banner (persuading his father) commanded the hoste to go forward in pursuing the king, till at length they were come to Strijon: where, before the whole Winteritie, the Quene, the young Duke of Aquitaine, Roger Mortimer, and other noblemen and lordiours, the chiefe denier of so wicked a dissension named Adam de Orleton Bishop of Hereford, made a publicke sermon touching the Quenes coming, and cause of the army, taking for his theme, My head grieueth me, which which authoritie he brought to such a question, that a balne and stouffshall head, ought necessarily to bee taken awaie from the administration of a kingdome, neither ought it to be bound with any hartfull bands of an hypocrite, &c.

After this the quene with her people came to Gloucester, from whence she went into Bristol, where Hugh Spencer the elder committed himselfe and all his into the mercie of the angry and outrageous woman, who commanded the earle to be bound, and without question or answer to bee drawn and hanged in his armour, taken downe alive and bowelled, his bowelles burned, then his head smitten off, and his bodie hanged vp againe, and after foure daies to be cut all to peeces and cast to dogges to be eaten, but his head was sent to Westminster. The quene went to Hereford. The last with Robert Baldock, and Simon de Reding being taken on the first day of Nouember, was committed to the custody of Hen. earle of Lancaster, who brought him to Spennymouth, to Ledbergh, and so to Kenilworth castle, where he remained the space of one winter, ordered for his diet no otherwise then a king.

The quene being at Hereford, Edmund earle of Arundell, Iohn Danell, and Thomas Mochelden were beheaded. Afterward Hugh Spencer the sonne Earle of Gloucester, was by certaine Welshmen, brought bounde before the quene, and without sentence or iudgement, was drawne, and hanged on a gallows thirtie fote high, and after beheaded and quartered on the foure and twentieth day of Nouember, whose head was sent to London by jage, his quarters to foure partes of the Realme. Simon Reding was drawne and hanged on the same gallows, but tenn fote higher: Robert Baldocke, after manie opprobrious words was brought to the Bishop of Herefords prison, where hee liued miserable untill the Purification, and then he was remoued to London, and cast into Fleetgate, where he was so hardly dealt with, that shortly after he died there.

These things being done, the quene with her sonne Edwards, Roger Mortimer, and other, went to Wallingford Castle, a little before Christmas, and before the Twelfth day they came to London, where the quene with much toy & great rewards was receiued: for al the nobilitie of the realme did assemble there being first summoned to come to the Parliament, to be holden the morrowe after the same feast of the Epiphanie, where they all iudged that the olde king was not too thie to beare the crowne, but for diuers causes was to be deposed: And that his eldest son Edward was to be chosen king with one whole consent, which consequentie was done, and the election openlie in Westminster pronounced.

The Archbishoppe of Canterburie did consent to the election, as all other the Bishoppes did the like: whereupon the Archbishoppe ascending into the Pulpit, preached a Sermon, taking for his theme, Vox Populi, Vox Dei, exhorting all the people to praye unto the king of kings for the king they had elected. The Sermon being ended, and the people departed, as soone as the quene understood that her sonne was elected king, and her husband deposed, she seemed to be full of sorrow, as it were almost besides her witte; her son Althowen his brothers beaues, and aware, that against his fathers will he would woulde neuer take the Crowne. Therefore by common decree on the behalfe of the whole Realme it was ordained, that thre Bishops, two Carles, Henry of Leicester, and John earle Waren, 2. abbots, Claffenbury and Boi, two barons, Roger Grey, and Hugh Courtney, two Justices, Sir Geoffrey Scroope, and John de Stanthour, two Barons of the Portes, foure Burgesles of London, 4 knights for the communalite of the land, &c. shoulde be sent to the king being in his first towre castle, where they ordained as followeth: John Stratford bishop of Winchester, Adam de Arlecon bishop of Hereford, and Henry Bishop of Lincoln were sent.

The bishop of Winchester and the bishop of Lincoln went before the rest, and talked secretly with the king, together with his keeper the Earle of Leicester, the thre craftily compassed him, counselling him to make resignation of the Crowne to his eldest sonne, promising him no lesse honor and renoume after the deposition of his royall dignitie, then his princelie estate was wont to haue of all men before. They added also, what a great reward it woulde bee at the hands of God, for the peace and quietnes of his subiects, for him to refuse the gouernement of a temporal kingdome. In the other part they threatened him, that if he woulde not make resignation, the people withdrawing their homage and obedience, faith and friendship from him, his sonnes also being forsaken, they woulde crowne another king, none of the royall blood. With these and other promises and threats, the king (not without sobbes and teares) agreed to the aduertisements of the Bishops. Finally, that malicious Embassador Adam de Orleton Bishop of Hereford, brought to the castle, where in the king was shut up, the kings other enemies, whome he placed orderlie according to their dignities in the kings chamber, referring unto himselfe the thinges which hee had sought long time before. At length the king comming forth of his secreet Chamber, being clothed in a mourning gowne, shewing himselfe to his seruants, knowing the businesse, for which they came, for vertis sorow, being as it were, distraught of his wittes, sodainelie swooned, the earle of Leicester, and the Bishop of Winchester did take him vp, being almost dead, and being called to his senses, Adam de Orleton Bishopp of Hereford declaring the cause of the messengers coming, did adde, that the king shoulde make resignation of the Crowne and realme to his eldest sonne, or else, after that himselfe was refused, hee shoulde suffer them to chole to their king another fitter man, whome they thought good for the defence of the kingdome.

The king hearing this, with much mourning answered, that hee was vertis soyle, that the Commons had concluded such wrath and indignation against him, that they disdained to be gouerned under his rule, for the which hee asked them forgiveness, and finally added, that hee would be very glad, if they woulde receiue his sonne to be their king. His resignation was made on the five and twentieth daie of Januarie, in the yere of Christ, after the receipt of the Historiographers (who beganne their yere at Christmas) 1327. after the account of the Church of Englande 1326. And forthwith in this castle, those messengers did renounce (as touching the realme) all homages and duties due to Edw. of Carnaruan late king of England by the hand of William

Trussell knight, be in presence of the aforesaid Lords, had these words following. Unto thee, O king, I William Trussell, in the name of all men of this land of England, and prolocutor of this parliament resigne to thee Edward the homage that was made to thee sometime, and from this time forth depyue thee of all kingly power, and I shall neuer be attendant unto thee as king after this time. Then Thomas Blunt knight and Steward of the kings household, by the breaking of the Rod, resigned his office, and shewed that the kings household had free liberty to depart.

After this the messengers returned to the parliament at London, declaring the resignation that was made, and the kings answer more fully then it was made. The Commons of the realme despising old things, willingly receiued Edward of Windsor eldest sonne to Edward of Carnaruan. Also such a great dowrye was assigned to Quene Isabell, that scarce the thirde part of the revenues of the crowne were left for her son, and his wife quene Philip. Moreover, Quene Isabell, the bishop of Hereford, and Roger Mortimer did appoint to expenses to Edward of Carnaruan 100. marks the moneth.

This Edward of Carnaruan, now depyued of his royall Crowne and dignity remained with Henry earle of Leicester his kinsman, lacking nothing but libertie, where hee being shut up, ledde his life, as if hee had bene a sponke. But the fierce and cruel woman being troubled with manie thinges, taking counsell of her wicked Scholemaster Adam de Orleton Bishopp of Hereford, she had an asseigne of him, which did not greve her a little, that was, that the Earle of Leicester did take pittie vpon Edward his cousin. Moreover, there was talke throughout the land, that there were covenantes made amongst manie, to take king Edward by force out of the castle of Kenilworth, to the which one friar Preacher, named Thomas Dunhed, and one Clarke were assenting, for which cause he and other were imprisoned at Ponke. It was therefore decreed by the cruel woman the Quene, through the subtil deuisse of her said Scholemaster, that Thomas of Gomey, and John Maltrauers knights, hauing receiued him from the keeping of the earle of Leicester, shoulde carry Edward the olde king about whither they woulde, so that none of his well willers shoulde haue access to him, or vnderstand where hee made any long abode.

And to these two wicked Traitors, authoritie was giuen by the biggish sort, that into what soeuer part of the kingdome they bent themselves, that all gouernours and keepers of the Castles shoulde suffer them to eniole their offices and homes during their pleasure, vpon paine of forfeiture of goods, landes, and life, if any shoulde denie them. By meanes of which authoritie Henry earle of Leicester, through commandement of king Edward the third, deliuered the olde king by Indenture to Sir Thomas Berkeley, and Sir John Maltrauers, and they brought him from Kenilworth, to the Castle of Corfe, then to Bristol, where for a season he was kept shutte vp in the Castell, untill it was vnderstande by certaine burgesles of the towne, who for his deliuerance conuened themselves ouer sea. Wherefore in a dark night, the keepers of Edward conuey him thence to Berkeley.

E. the second.

These tormentors of Edward exercised towards him such cruelties, unto whom it was not permitted to ride; but he it were by night, neither to be a man, or to be female of ante. When he came, they forced him to take bread: when he would sleep, they would not suffer him, neither when he was hungry would they give him such meats as he desired, but such as he loathed: so that he spake, was contrary by them, who gave it out most slanderously, that he was madde. And thoughtfully to speak, in all matters they were quite contrary to his will, that either by cold, watching, or unwholesome meats, for melancholy, by some infirmities he might languish and die. But this man being by nature strong to suffer paines, and patient thereof Gods grace to abide all griefes, he endured all the denials of his enemies, for as touching poplions, which they gave him often to drinke, by the benefice of nature he dispatched away.

These Champions bring Edward towards Berkeley, being guarded with a rabble of hel-houndes, along by the Grange belonging to the Castle of Berkeley, where that wicked man Gomey, making a crowne of hay, put it on his head, and the soldiers that were present, scoffed, and mocked him beyond all measure, saying, A prut, auaunt Sir king, making a kinde of noise with their mouths, as though they had started: they feared to be met of any that should knowe Edward, they bent their iourney therefore towards the lesser hand, riding along over the parish grounds, lying by the river of Severne. Spoke over, desiring to disguise him that he might not be knowne, they bestowed mine for to haue as well the haire of his head, as also of his beard: therefore, as in their iourney they traualled by a little water which ranne in a ditch, they committed him to light from his horse to be shaven, to whom, being set on a moale hill, a Barber came unto him with a bales of colde water taken out of the ditch, to shave him withall, saying unto the king, that that water should serue for that time. To whom Edward answered, that would they, would they, he would haue warme water for his beard; and, to the end that he might keep his promise, he began to weepe, and to shed teares plentifully. At length they came to Berkeley Castle, where Edward was shut up close like an anchor. Isabell his wife taking it grievously that her husbands life (which she dearly loved) was prolonged, made her complaint to her Scholemaster Adam de Orleton, saying that she had certaine dreames, the interpretation whereof she mistook, which if they were true, she feared lest, that if her husband be at any time restored to his olde dignitie, that he would burne her for a traitor, or condemne her to perpetual bondage. In like sort the Bishop being grieved in his owne conscience with this like feare. The like feare also strooke the hearts of other for the same offence: therefore it seemed good to many of great dignitie and blood, as well spiritual as temporal, both men and women, that all such feare should be taken away, desiring his death. Whereupon these wrote letters colourably written to the keepers of Edward, greatly blaming them, for looking so slenderly to the king, suffering him to haue such libertie, and notwithstanding him so delicately.

Spoke over, there is a prime motion made unto them, but put in such sort, as if it might be some halfe done, that the death of Edward would not be midling unto them, whether it were naturall or violent. And in this point, the great deceit of Sophisters sheweth in force, set downe by the Bishop who wrote thus:

Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est.

By thus:

To seeke to head King Edwards blood

Refuse to feare I count it good.

Which sophistical saying is to be resolved into two propositions, whereof the first consisteth of these words, to wit, Edwardum occidere nolite, doe not kill Edward, and the second of other three, that is, timere bonum est, feare is a good thing, so seeme to perswade subtilly from murdering of the king: but the recitours of these letters, not ignorant of the twisting, changed the meaning thereof to this sense, Edwardum occidere nolite timere, to kill Edward doe not feare: and afterwards these two words, bonum est, it is good, so that they being grafted, turned a good saying into euill.

The Bishop being thus determinately purposed touching the death of Edward, and warily providing for himselfe, if by any chance he should be accused thereof, craftily together that the authority which he gave by twisting, might seeme to be taken expressely contrary to his meaning, by reason of accenting and pointing of the same.

To conclude, the murderers of Edward hoping to haue founde both Isabell and the Bishops to be their trustie friends, they found them earnest persecutors of their enterprise, quite denying what sooner they had devised against Edward, yea, they were greatly busied in devising most cruel death for them, so that the murderers being quite dismayed, wist not what to doe: but they wrote the letters of Isabell, the Bishops, and other conspirators, being confirmed with their owne handes and seales, which the Bishops refused not, but confessed to be his and others, but construed them to another sense, accusing them to be false interpreters of his letters, and of his owne authority threatened them, untill hee forced them to runne away. Thus much touching the letters.

Now when King Edward was brought unto the Castle aforesaid, hee was courteously received by Thomas Berkeley then Lord of the Ex, who was allowed 100. shillings the day for the time: But the tormentors had received their letters of government over the Castle, the said Thomas is commanded to use no familiaritie with Edward: wherefore Thomas Berkeley both he and she departed thence to other his dwelling places: And Edwards persecution continuing to his death, beganne to take effect. For after this he was shut up in a close chamber, where, with the stench of dead carthasses, laide in a Cellar under him, he was miserably tormented many daies together, in such sort, that he was well nigh suffocated therewith. And that paine was almost intolerable unto him, It appeareth by the complaint he made on a certaine

day at the chamber window, certaine carpenters then working on the right side thereof, hearing the same. But those tyrants perceiving that this terrible stench was not of a sufficient force to cause the death of this ballant man Edward, one night being the 22. of September, they came rushing in upon him sodainly, as he lay in his bed, with great and heauie featherbeds, beeing in weight as much as 15. strong men could beare, wherewith they oppressed and strangled him by smothering. Into whose also they thrust a plummer's boozing piron, being made red hot, vp into his bowelles, through a certaine instrument like to the end of a Trumpet, or glister pipe, put in at the fundament, burning thereby his inward parts, promising thereby least any wound being founde in the kings bodie, might cause his tormentors to answer for committing open treason, and therefore suffer just punishment. In this sort was this foule knight oppressed, crying out with a lowd voice, so that many as well within the castle, as without heard it, perceiving it to be the crye of one that suffered violent death, which caused many of Barkley, and also of the castle (as themselves affirmed) to take compassion the reof, and to praise for the soule of him that was then departing the world. And this was at the ende of Edward of Carnaruan, being betrayed as is aforesaid: but to colour the matter that they might some guilelesse in this case, Isabel and the bishop of Hereford laboured to cleare themselves by banishing and outlawing of Thomas Gorney, and John Maltrauer, laying as it were all the fault upon them.

This Thomas Gorney flying to Paris, and there lying hid bytill the space of three yeres, was at length espied and taken, and as he was brought towards England, there to haue receiued iust and worthy punishment for his deserts, he was beheaded on the sea, fearing that if he had bene brought into England, he would haue accused diuers other great personages. The other, to wit, John Maltrauer, living in great contrition and repentance, spent a long time in Dunwich land. Thus far out of Thomas de la More, a worshipfull knight, that then lived and wrote in the French tongue what he saw with his eyes, or heard credibly reported, by them that saw, and some that were actors. All which was at the sale. Sir Tho. de la Mores request translated, and more orderlie penned in the Latine tongue, by Walter Baker, alias Swinborne, Canon of Winchester Diocess.

Now to conclude this hissoy, of the raigne and end of King Edward the second, called of Carnaruan, for that he was borne there: he was deposed on the 25. of January, in the yere of Christ 1326. when he had reigned 19. yeres, six moneths and od daies, and was murdered on the 21. of September next following, being the feast of S. Mathew the Apostle, in the yere of Christ 1327. whose death was not published till after the feast of all Saints, and he was buried at Gloucester on the feast daie of S. Thomas the Apostle, or 21. of December. He had issue by Isabel his wife, Edward, which was elected king, and to whom he resigned in his life: John of Elham earle of Cornwall, that died at the towne of S. John in Scotland without issue: Ioane of the Toctoe Queene of the Scots and Elianor Countesse of Gueldar, that died young.

King

Edward the third bozne at Windsor, about the age of fourtene yeres, after the deposing of his father, began his raigne the 25. day of January, in the yere of our Lord 1326. after the account of the Church of England. He was crowned at Westminster, on the first day of February, by Walter Reignolds Archbishop of Canturburie. This Prince was endued with passing beauty and fauour, of wit proud, circumpect, and gentle of nature: of excellent modestie and temperance. He aduanced such persons to dignities, as did most excell other in innocencie of life. In feats of armes he was very expert, as the noble enterprises by him atchieued doe well declare. At the beginning of his raigne, he was chiefly ordered by his mother Isabel, unto whom was assigned so great a dowrie, that the third part of the kingdome did scantlie remaine to her sonne.

The inhabitants of the towne of Warre in Suffolke, assembled themselves in warlike manner on S. Lukes day last before passed, in the twentieth yere of Edward the second, and besieged the abbey of Warre, bent the gates, beat and wounded the monks, bare out of the abbey all the gold, silver, ornaments, books, Charters, and other writings, with the assay of their coine, stamps, and all other things pertaining to their Mint: and all other goods, as Wasse, Pewster, Iron, Lead, &c. They also bent many houses about the abbey, and in the towne, pertaining to the Abbot, with his manors in Berton, Wickenham, Rugham, Oldham, Hergeneshurp, Pewster, Whippes, Westle, Kilsby, Angham, Ferneham, Wedwell, Haberdon, and others, with all the coine in the same manors, & done away the horses, oxen, kine, swine, sheepe, &c. They drew the monks out of their Abbey and put them in prisons, & after brought them againe to their Chapter house, where they forced them to search Charters at their pleasure, &c. For the which facts, the malefactors were this yere by vertue of the kings commission directed to Thomas Earle of Norfolk, Sparshall of England, Thomas Bardolfe, and others, apprehended and conuicted: nineteen of them were hanged, and one pressed to death. After this, the whole inhabitants of the Towne, for that they had not stayed the malefactors of their enterprise in the beginning (as they might haue done) were amerced to pay the Abbot toward his dammagens 140000. pound. Nevertheless, the Abbot and Couent at the kings request (who was there present with his Nobilitie) forgave and remitted to them 122333. pound five shillings eight pence of the summe: and for the rest bled such fauour, that if they truly payd 2000. markes in twentie yeres following, and obserued their covenants for good order and quietnesse, they forgave them all the rest.

About this time, the like stirre was made against the monks of Canturburie: whereof I find recorded as followeth.

King Edward preparing an army into Scotland, commanded the Bailiffes and Citizens of Canturburie, to furnish him twelve horsemen, and send them the second.

These tormentors of Edward exercised to wards him sheweth cruelly, and without it was not permitted to rise; but as it were saying so, neither to let him man, or to beleave of any. When he came, they forced him to this torture: when he would sleepe, they would not suffer him, neither when he was hungry would they give him such meates as he desired, but such as he loathed: curie word that he spake, was contradicted by them, who gave it out most dangerously, that he was madde. And shortly to speake, in all matters they were quite contrary to his will, that either by colos, watching, or unwholesome meates, for melancholy, by some infirmities he might languish and die. But this man being by nature strong to suffer paines, and patient through Gods grace to abide all griefes, he endured all the deathes of his enemies, as touching poplins, which they gave him often to spinke, by the benefit of nature he dispatched away.

These Champions bring Edward towards Berkeley, being guarded with a rabble of bel-boundes, along by the Grange belonging to the Castle of Wyke House, where that wicked man Gomey, making a crowne of hay, put it on his head, and the foulmouths that were present, scoffed, and mocked him beyond all measure, saying, A prut, anaunt sir king, making a kinde of noise with their mouths, as though they had started: they feared to be met of any that should knowe Edward, they bent their journey therefore towards the heath hard by, riding along over the sparrysh grounds, lying by the river of Severne. Spawner, desiring to disgrace him that hee might not be knowne, they betwixt mine say to shawe as well the haire of his head, as also of his beard: whereupon as in their journey they travelled by a little wood which ranne in a ditch, they commanded him to light from his horse to be shaven, to whom, being sit on a moale hill, a Barber came unto him with a basen of colde water taken out of the ditch, to shave him withall, saying unto the king, that that water should serve for that time. To whom Edward answered, that twentie they would they, he would have loarne teat or for his beard; and, to the end that he might keepe his promise, he began to weepe, and to shed teares plentifully. At length they came to Berkeley Castle, where Edward was shut up close like an anker: Isabell his wife taking it grievously that her husbands life (which she deprecates) was prolonged, made her complaint to her Scholemaster Adam de Orelton, saying that she had certaine dreames, the interpretation whereof she mistook, which if they were true, she feared tell, that if her husband be at this time restored to his olde dignitie, that hee would burne her for a witch, and condemn her to perpetuall bondage. In like sort the Bishop being grieved for his owne conscience, sheweth like feare. She like wise also sheweth the benefit of offer for the same offence: wherefore it seemed good to many of great dignitie and blood, as well spirituall as temporall; both men and women, that such feare should be taken away, desiring his death: whereupon there were letters colourably written to the keepers of Edward, greatly blaming them for looking so tenderly to the king, suffering him to have such libertie, and not rising him delicately.

Spawner, there is a plain motion made unto them, but not in such sort as

as if they should have said, that the death of Edward would not be without hanging to them, as they it were natural to be violent. And in this point, the great detest of the poplins that in those, it sheweth by the Bishop who wrote them, and would shew, and what you will.

day at the chamber window, certaine carpenters then working on the right side therof, hearing the same. But those tyrants perceiving that this terrible death was not of a sufficient force to cause the death of this balliant man Edward, one night being the 22. of September, they came rushing in upon him suddenly, as he late in his bed, with great and beanie featherbeds, beeing in weight as much as 15. strong men could beare, where with they oppressed and strangled him by smothering. Into thome also they thrust a plummers bozngy iron, being made red hot, vp into his bowelles; through a certain instrument like to the end of a Trumpet or glister pipe, put in at the fundament, burning thereby his inward parts, providing thereby least any wound being founde in the kings bodie, might cause his tormentors to answeare for committing open treason, and therefore suffer just punishment. In this sort was this brave knight oppressed, crying out with a lowd voice, so that many as well within the castle, as without heard it, perceiving it to be the crye of one that suffered violent death, which caused manye of Barkley, and also of the castle (as themselves affirmed) to take compassion therof, and to praye for the soule of him that was then departing the world. And this was the ende of Edward of Carnarvan, being betrayed as is aforesaid: but to colour the matter that they might seeme guiltlesse in this case, Isabel and the bishop of Hereford laboured to cleare themselves by banishing and outlawing of Thomas Corney, and John Maltruen, laying as it were all the fault upon them.

This Thomas Corney flying to Sparlils, and there lying hid p'ssulle the space of three yeres, was at length espied and taken, and as he was brought towards England, there to haue receiued iust and worthy punishment for his defaults, he was beheaded on the sea, fearing that if he had bene brought into England, he would haue accused diuers other great personages. The other, to wit, John Maltrauers, living in great contrition and repentance, spent a long time in Dutchland. Thus far out of Thomas dela More, a worthy full knight, that then lived and wrote in the French tongue what he saw with his eyes, or hearde credibly reported, by them that saw, and some that were actors. All which was, at the last, by Thoma dela Mores request translated, and more orderlie penned in the Latine tongue, by Walter Baker, alias Swinborne, Chanon of Winsey bestowes of Wilt.

Now to conclude this history, of the raigne and end of king Edward the second, called of Carnarvan, so that he was borne there: he was deposed on the 25. of January, in the yere of Christ 1326. when he had reigned 19. yeres, 8. moneths and od daies, and was murdered on the 21. of September next following, being the feast of S. Mathew the Apostle, in the yere of Christ 1327. whose death was not published till after the feast of all Saints, and he was buried at Gloucester on the feast daie of S. Thomas the Apostle, or 21. of December. He had issue by Isabel his wife, Edward, which was elected king, and to whome he resigned in his life: John of Elham earle of Cornewall, that died at the towne of S. John in Scotland without issue: Joane of the Tokeze Duene of the Scots and Elianor Countesse of Guelbar, that died young.

Edward the third borne at Windsor, about the age of fourtene yeres, after the deposing of his father, began his raigne the 25. day of January, in the yere of our Lord 1326. after the account of the Church of England. He was crowned at Westminster, on the first day of February, by Walter Reignolds Archbishop of Canterburie. This Prince was endued with passing beauty and fauour, of iust proudent, circumped, and gentle of nature: of excellent modestie and temperance.

He advanced such persons to dignities, as his most excell other innocence of life. In feats of armes he was very expert, as the noble enterprises by him atchieued doe well declare. At the beginning of his raigne, he was chiefly ordered by his mother Isabel, unto whom was assigned so great a dowrye, that the third part of the kingdome did scantlie remaine to her sonne.

The inhabitants of the towne of Burie in Suffolke, assembled themselves in warlike manner on S. Lukes day last before passed, in the twentieth yere of Edward the second, and beseged the abbey of Burie, bent the gates, beat and wounded the monks, bare out of the abbey all the gold, silver, ornaments, books, Charters, and other writings, with the assay of their colles, hammers, and all other things pertaining to their spirit: and all other gods, as Wasse, Pelster, Iron, Lesb, &c. They also bent many houses about the abbey, and in the towne, pertaining to the Abbot, with his manors in Berton, Wachenham, Inggham, Olbham, Hernigelbury, Pewts, Walthipster, Wethle, Kiteby, Inggham, Sferneham, Medwell, Haberdon, and others, with all the cozne in the same manors, & drove away the horses, oxen, kine, swine, shepe, &c. They drew the monks out of their Abbey and put them in prisons, & after brought them againe to their Chapter house, where they forced them to search Charters at their pleasure, &c. For the which facts, the malefactours were this yere by vertue of the kings commission directed to Thomas Earle of Northfolke, Marshall of England, Thomas Bardolf, and others, apprehended and committed: nineteen of them were hanged, and one pressed to death. After this, the whole inhabitants of the Towne, so that they had not stayed the malefactours of their enterprise in the beginning (as they might haue done) were amerced to pay the Abbot toward his dammages 140000. pound. Whereupon, the Abbot and Couent at the Kings request (who was there present with his counsaill) forgave and remitted to them 122333. pound five shillings eight pence of the summe: and for the rest used such fauour, that if they truly payd 2000. markes in twentie yeres following, and obserued their tenants for god order and quietnesse, they sozgaue them all the rest.

About this time, the like stirre was made against the monks of Canterburie: whereof I find recordeed as followeth.

Whereupon, William Chylham Bapteste, and many Commons of the cite, assembled themselves in the preaching friers Churchyard, conspired and ware against the Monkes, as followeth.

- 1 That they would ouerthrow the pentices, windowes, and milne, belonging to the Monkes.
- 2 That no Citizen should dwell in any house belonging to the Monkes.

- 4 That no man should lend or sell to the Monkes any victuals.
- 5 That they should sell all the hoxles and beasts that came into the cite with cartiage to the Monkes.
- 6 That all such Monkes as came forth of their house should be spoiled of their garments.
- 7 That a trench should be cast, to stoppe all men from going in or coming out.
- 8 That euery Pilgrime should at his entring, sweare that he should make no offering.

Sir Iohn the Carles brother of Henault, came to helpe Edward the third against the Scots, with five hundred men of armes: which Henaults and the Englishmen fell out by chance on Trinitie Sunday at Poike, where eightie of the Lincolnshire men were slaine, and much of the cite of Poike was burned: and the Englishmen slaine were buried vnder a stone in Saint Clements Churchyard in Fosegate.

This yere died Charles king of Fraunce the third brother, which was brother to the Ladie Isabel Quene of England, mother to king Edward the third: by whose death the succession of the kingdome of Fraunce came to the said Edward, but it was vsurped and possessed by Philip de Valois uncle to the said Charles, who did intrude himselfe by force.

King Edward married Philip daughter to William Carle of Holland and Henault, at Poike the five and twentieth of Februarie: she was sisters daughter to Philip de Valois aforesaid.

A War

A Parliament was holden at Northampton, in which a shamefull peace was made betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, so that David the sonne of Robert Bruce, seuen yeres old, married Ioane of the Tower king Edwards sister, at Berwik the twelfth of Iulij. Also the king made the Scots charters, the tenour whereof was unknowne to the Englishmen: but all was done as it pleased the old Quene, Roger Mortimer, and Iames Douglas. The Scots made many taunting rimes against the Englishmen, for the fond disguised apparell by them at that time used: amongst the which this was fastened vpon the Church doores of Saint Peter toward Stangate:

In a Parliament at Salisbury, the king made thre Carles, Iohn of Gloucestre his brother Carle of Cornewall, Roger Mortimer Carle of the March, and Iames Butler of Ireland Carle of Desmond. From this Parliament the Carle of Lancaster, the Lord Wake, Henrie Beaumont, Carle Sparhall, and other noble men did absent themselves, not being far off from thence in armes, for the which the king was highly displeased: notwithstanding in Sommer following, they submitted themselves vnto the kings mercy, seeking his fauour.

Salisbury.

Certaine men of this land, to the intent to trie what friends they had in England, craftily disguised that Edward the second king of England was alive in the Castle of Coziffe, but not to be seen in the day tyme, and therefore they bled many nights to make the wyes, & making vpon the towres and walles of the Castle, which being perceived by people of the countrey, it was thought there had ben some great king vnto whom they did these great solemnities: this rumour was spread ouer all England, to wit, that the old king was alive: whence it came to passe, that the Carle of Bent sent thither a frier preacher, to try the truth of the matter, who (as it was thought) hauing corrupted the porter of the castle with rewards, is let in, where he lay all the day in the porters lodge very close: and when night was come, he was willed to put on the habit of a Lay man, and then was brought into the hall, where he saw (as he thought) Edward the father of the king sitting royally at supper, with great maiesty. This frier being thus perswaded, returned againe to the Carle of Bent, and reported as he thought, what he saw: whereupon the Carle said and affirmed with an oath, that he would endeavour by all the meanes he could to deliuer his brother from prison.

Edward

The same yere at the earnest request of some, the king held a Parliament at Worcester, where, by procurement of the old quene, and Roger Mortimer, the said Earle of Kent, and many other noble men and religious persons, to wit, the p[ro]vincials of the white Carmelite Fryers, and of the blacke preaching Fryers, and Fryer Richard Wilson were accused of conspiracie, touching (as it was said) the delivrie of the Kings father: which matter although it were but beuilled fantastic and a mere lye, yet the said Earle for certaine confessions which he made, and for certaine letters which were found about him, was there beheaded. The other, to wit, the p[ro]vincials of the P[re]dicants and Carmelites, were banished: but, the bishop of London was set at libertie, Robert de Taunton priest, and some certaine Carmelite Fryers and P[re]dicants, were condemned to perpetual prison. The death of the said Earle was the lesse lamented, because his family and servants had above measure afflicted the Commons, in taking by thylings (as they traualled) at the kings price, paying nothing or very little for it.

There was a Parliament holden at Bottingham, where Roger Mortimer was in such gloze and honour, that it was without all comparison. A man durst name him any other than Earle of March: a greater route of men waited at his heeles, than on the kings person: he would suffer the king to ride to him, and would walke with the king equally, step by step, and chéeke by chéeke, neuer preferring the king, but would go for most himselfe with his officers: he greatly rebuked the Earle of Lancaster, cousin to the king, for that without his consent he appointed certain lodgings for noble mē in the towne, demanding who made him so bold, to take up lodgings so nigh vnto the queen: with which words the Constable being greatly feared, appointed lodging for the Earle of Lancaster onemyle out of the towne: and like wise were lodged the Earle of Hereford, Iohn de Bohune of Essex, high Constable of England, and others. By which meanes, a contention rose among the Noblemen, and great murmuring among the common people, who said, that Roger Mortimer the Quēens Paragon, and the kings Master, sought all the means he could to destroy the kings blood, and to usurpe the Regall Maiestie: which report troubled much the kings friends, to wit, William Mountacute, and other, who for the safegard of the king, swore themselves to be true to his person, and drew vnto them Robert de Holland, who had of long time been chiefe keeper of the castle, vnto whome all secret corners of the same were knowne. When vpon a certaine night, the king lying without the castle, both he & his friends were brought by torch-light through a secret way vnder ground, beginning far off from the said castle, till they came euen to the Quēens chamber, which they by chance found open: they therfore being armed with naked swords in their hands, went for wards, leauing the king also armed without the dore of the Chamber, leaue y his mother should espie him: they which entred in, slew Hugh Turpinton knight, who resisted them, Master Iohn Neuell of Wyndesore, giuing him his deadly wound. From thence, they went to ward the Quēens mother, whome they found with the Earle of March ready to haue gone to bedde: and hauing taken the said Earle, they ledde him out into the hall, after whome the Quēne folloved, crying, Bel filz, bel filz, ayes pitie de gentil Mortimer, Good sonne, good sonne, take pitie vpon gentle Mortimer: for the suspected that that her sonne was there, though she saw him not. Then are the keys of the Castle sent for, and euery place with all the furniture is yielded up into the kings hands, but in such secret wise, that none without the castle, except the kings friends, vnderstood thereof. The next day in the morning very early, they hying Roger Mortimer, & other his friends taken with him, with an horrible shout & crying (the earle of Lancaster then blind, being one of them that made the shout for) towards London, where he was committed to the Tower, and after ward condemned at Westminster, in presence of the whole Parliament on S. Andrewes daie next following, and then drawne to the Glines, and there hanged on the common gallows, whereon he hung two dayes and two nights by the kings commandement, and then was buried in the Gray Fryers Church. He was condemned by his Wares, and petitioner was brought to answer before them, for it was not then the custome, after the death of the Carles of Lancaster, Winchester, Gloucester, and Kent: wherefore this Earle had that law himselfe, which he appointed for others. The causes of his death laid against him, were these:

First, that he was consenting to the murdering of the Kings father: Secondly, for that he had receiued a great summe of money, whereby the kings honour was greatly abated at Stanhope Parke, where he gave a signe vnto the Scots that they should die.

Thirdly, for that he caused certaine ancient deeds and Charters to be burnt, wherein the king of Scots stood bound vnto the king of England: and especially for that he had caused a contract to be made betwixt the kings sister, and David the sonne of Robert le Bruce.

Fourthly, that he had vnprofitably consumed a great deale of treasure which he found in the kings treasure, and in the treasure of the Carles of Winchester and Gloucester.

Fifthly, for appropriating vnto himselfe the wardes and marriages of all England.

Sixthly, for being an euill Counsellor to the king, and to the Quēne mother, and for being overmuch familiar with her. There dyed with him his friends Simon de Burford knight, brother to sir William Burford that was Justice, and Iohn Deuereux Esquier, who was desirous to haue made open confession of the kings fathers cruell death, but he could not be suffered so to doe. Iohn Mautreuers was attaint for the death of Edmond Earle of Kent. Thomas Gurney, William Ogle, for murdering king Edward the second. Mautreuers restored the 25. of Edward the third, and the heiress of Mortimer in the 28. of the same king.

King Edward, the bishop of Winchester, William Mountacute, and berie few others passed ouer Sea, like as they had been Merchants, hauing with him scarce fiftene horsemen. He left Iohn of Elgham his brother, wrote our of the Realme. He returned againe about the beginning of Apriill, & then held a great Tournament at Wodstocke in Kent. mother, and anel left her a thousand pound the yere. About the feast of S. Machy, there was very solemn. Tysing of all the shute Carles, Barons, and Nobles at London in Cheape, betwixt the great Crosse, and the great Condoite nigh Soper Lane, which lasted the dayes, where the Quene Philippe, with many Ladies fell from a Stage, notwithstanding they were not hurt at all: wherefore the Quene took great care to save the Carpenters from punishment, and though her prayer (which she made on her knees) she pacified the King and Councell, whereby she purchased great love of the people.

Such a wet Sommer, with exceeding raine was this yere, that the come in the felde could not ripe, so that in many places they began not Haruett till Epiphanius. The house of Exorton got not in their wheate till Hallowtwe, and their Pease not before S. Andrewes tide. The Ponkes on Albalwyn day, and Partlemas day, were served with Pease greene in the coods, in stead of Peases and Apples.

King Edward held a solemn Christmas at Wils in Somersetshire, which he continued till the feast of the Epiphanie, where were many strange and sumptuous shewes made, to please the King and his guests.

In the beginning of August, Edward Bailiol, sonne and heire to John King of Scots, came into England, which Edward had ben before that time banished out of Scotland. At his coming, he declared what right he had in the Kingdome. Henry Beaumont Earle of Bohune, Gilbert Vrosecuill Earle of Arundell, David Earle of Athels, Richard Talbot, Ralph Baron of Stafforde, Fitz Fitz Williams, with many other noble men, affirming they had right of inheritance in Scotland, desired licence and ayde of the King of England, to recover the said Kingdome and lands due to them, but the King having regard of the peace lately made, and also for his sisters sake Quene of Scots, would not suffer them to leade an armie through his land, wherefore the said Lords getting a flet of ships, entered the sea, and sayling toward Scotland, landed at Bunkhozne, where the Earle of Gylfe, and Robert Bruce, halfard son to Robert Bruce, with ten sh. Scots resisted them nere unto Dunfermeling: but the Englishmen put them to flight, and slew many. After ward, to wit, on S. Lawrence day, they had a fore conflict at Gledesmoze, where two thousand Englishmen overcame fourtie thousand Scots. By reason of the great thyng of the multitude amongst themselves, five Carles, & many other were thrynged to death. On the morow, the Englishmen toke the Towne of S. Johns, well furnished with victuals.

The seven and twentieth of September, Edward Bailiol was crowned King of Scots, but after ward he resigned it to King Edward of England, and remayned under his protection many yeres after.

Henry Earle of Lancaster and Leicester, high Steward of England, founded the new Hospitall by the castle of Leicester, wherein were one hundred poore impotent people provided for with all things necessary.

Edward Bailiol, and the foresaid Lords and Nobles continued the warres in Scotland, unto whom came many other Noble men of the Realme of England voluntarily, serving of their owne charges, and besieged Berwike.

The King of England gathered a great power, and besieged Berwike, which at length was yielded for want of victualles. During this siege, the Scots sought many wayes to remove the same, leuving a great armie over al Scotland; but coming to the siege, they could not bring their purpose to effect, yet still prouoking the Kings armie to battell: whereupon at length the two armies appoynted to fight, and setting out upon Halidowne hill, there cometh forth of the Scots campe a certaine stout Champion of great stature, who for a fact by him done, was called Turnebull: he standing in the midst betwixt the two armies challenged al the Englishmen, any one of them to fight with him a Combat: at length, one Robert Venale knight, a Dorsetshire man, requesting licence of the King, being armed, with his sword & brane, marcheth toward the Champions meeting by way a certaine blacke mastiffe Dogge, which waited on the Champion, whom with his swoord he boldly strake, and cut him off at his lornes, at the sight whereof the master of the Dogge slaine, was much abashed, and in his battell more warie and fearefull: whose left hand and head also after ward, this worthy knight cut off. After this Combat both the armies met, but they fighting scarce half an houre, certaine of the Scots being slaine, they closed their armie (which was in thre) all into one battell, but at length flying, the King followed them, taking and chasing them into lakes and pittes, for the space of five miles. There were slaine of them eight Carles, 1300. Horsemen, and of common soldiers 35000. at a place by Berwike, called Bothull, nere unto Halidon.

In the meane season the Scots had besieged the castle of Bamburgh, in which at that time the Quene was: but when they heard of the slaine aforesaid, they left the siege and fled. The towne of Berwike yielded to the King of England both the castle and the Towne, who placing garrisons there, he sent Edward Bailiol, and other Nobles to keepe the Realme of Scotland. Earle Patricius, in the next Parliament holden at Berwick castle, and did homage unto the King by oath, who received of the King for yielding up of Berwike unto him, many honors and preferments: not withstanding this Earle returned againe to rebellion, who holding Dunbar against the King, was besieged by William Mountacute Earle of Salisbury.

This yere, William Elsing Mercer of London (obteyning the Kings licence) made a new Hospitall of an old house of Gunnes by Creeplegate with, in the wall of London, and placing Chanons Regular there, he became their first Prior, endowing the same with Lands for the reliefe of the poore and impotent.

Lewes de Beaumont Bishop of Durham deceased on the 28. of September, and was buried at Durham, he builded a wall of stone about the citie of Durham, and a hall with a Chappel at Spidleham, unto him succeeded Richard de Bury by the Kings appointment.

Also Simon Mepham Archbishop of Canterbury deceased about the fourteenth of October, after he had late five yeres, some monthes, & was buried at Canterbury.

Parliament at Works.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Wallingford, and immediately after, the Quene was deliuered of a daughter named Isabel Woodstocke.

The King summoned a Parliament to be holden at Poike, the same to begin on Monday the second weeke of Lent: to the which Parliament, the king of Scots (called Conquerour) although he were warned to be there, yet he came not, but sent messengers to excuse him, to wit, Henry de Bellemount and William Mountacute Carles, and certaine other Barons and knights, who signified, that the King of Scots Conquerour could not be there without great daunger, so; that certaine Scottes lay in the Islands ready to do him damage.

At the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, the said king of Scots Conquerour; did his homage to king Edward of England at Newcastle vpon Tyne, and not long after that king Edward take homage of the Duke of Wyntaine, for the Earldome of Richmond.

London.

In a Parliament at London it was told the king, that the Scots had taken Richard Talbot, and sixe other knights, and had slaine many souldiers: wherefore the king toke a fiftenth of the Laite, and a tenth of the Clergie, to the intent the malice of the Scots might be bridged.

Universitie at Oxford for William.

This yere in the moneth of November diuers masters and schollers of Oxford withdrew themselves to Stamford, minding there to have begunne an Universitie, without licence of the King obtained in that behalfe: whereat the King being offended, did by proclamation utterly forbid it, & suppressed it.

King Edward went toward the Marches of Scotland, and wintered in those coasts, but understanding that the Earle Dacels was traitterously turned to the Scots, and Henry Bellemount besieged by the Scottes, he entered Scotland, and raised the siege, and then kept his Christmas at Roxburgh, which castle he repaired. Presently after the feast of the Epiphanie, the French king sent messengers to K. Edward, to wit, the Bishop of Auxerres, and certaine Lords, to treat a peace for the Scots, who waited for an answer in England till mid-lent, and then at Nottingham a truce was granted unto them till the feast of S. Iohn next coming, that in the meane time a Parliament might be holden of matters concerning peace, and the state of both the kingdomes: in which Parliament holden at Poike, it was decreed that the K. should passe with his armie through Scotland, beyond the Scottish seas, the which thing was quickly performed & done: but the Scots desirous to fight a field, they feigned that they would have peace, to obtaine the which, many came about the feast of S. Michael, and chiefly the Earle of Dacels:

whereupon it came to passe, that after ward the Earle of Hereford being taken prisoner at Edenborough, was sent to be kept prisoner in England, and Richard Talbot was ransomed for two thousand five hundred markes, but the Earle of Dacels willing to shewe that he was truly revolted to the king of England, rode against the Scottes at a siege of a certaine castle, and falling into the hands of his enemies, because he would not yield, he was slaine with thirtene of his men.

After the feast of Saint Michael, the king continuing still in the marches of Scotland, was daily entreated by messengers from the French king, concerning some peace to be made.

About the feast of S. Martine, Edward Bohune a noble man, was drowned in the Marches of Scotland: for as he was dining a bottle of Cattell over a riuer, he felt himselfe in daunger, causing his guide to ride besyde him through the water, where through the smoothnesse of the stone whereon the water ran, his guide not being able to take sure footing fell downe, with his master being armed, and besyde any helpe could come, they were drowned in the bottome of the channell.

John Bohune

Iohn Archbishop of Canterbury went over the Sea to Philip de Valoys king of Fraunce, requesting of him the continuance of peace and amitie betwixt the two kingdomes to be maintained. Secondly, that all townes and castles taken besyde time by his father, should be restored to the King of England. Thirdly, that the said French King should sweare, neuer to give aid to the Scottes against the King of England: under which conditions, the two Kings of both Realmes should prepare to trauaile towards the Holy Land, and to fight against the enemies of Christ. But the French King accounted the King of England not worthy of his friendship, so long as he continued warres against the Scots his friends, whome he said were iust men. Unto the second petition he would not otherwise consent thereunto, than if all charges were repaid againe which his father Charles de Valoys laid out in the warres of Gascoigne. Thirdly, he said, that he was a friend and lover of iustice and equitie, which he would neuer swaue from, neither for friendship, nor affinitie, but he would by all means be comid, molest and bere all breakers of the peace of the kingdom of Scotland: so; (saith he) there shall neuer be perfect peace and quietnesse among Christians, before the King of Fraunce sit in place of iudgement for the right of the Kingdome of France, England, and Scotland.

Upon Saint Clements night, through abundance of waters, but specially high waters, in the Thames, all the cattell and beasts nere thereunto were drowned, and the land made unfruitfull by salt waters.

King Edward had a tenth of the Clergie, and also of the Burgeses, and a

About the feast of Whetecost, he held a Parliament at North-hampton, where leaving the Prelates, States, and commons debating about matters, himselfe secretly rode to Berwike, and there taking with him a few men of armes, he went to Saint Johns Towne, which he strengthened with trench and and ramplice, and sent his Carles, with the king Conquerour, to make an rode vpon the Countrey, and to see what Scots they could finde would resist them: but none durst abide their coming, but hid themselves in billes, Woods, and Marshes, and in the meane time many Carles and Barons came, and submitted themselves to King Edward vpon conditions as fol loweth.

These be the poynts agreed betwixt the Councell of the Kings of Eng land and Scotland on the one party, and Alexander Mowbrey, Geoffrey Mow brey, Godfrey de Roos, William Bullocke, and Eustace de Lorey, hauing full powler from Dauid Stravulgi, Earle of Daffels, and Robert Steward of Scot land, to treate, accord, and affirme all poynts enterparled and to be enterpar led betwixt the said kings, and the Earle, and Steward, as appeareth by their letters patents of either partie.

First it is accorded that the said Earle Daffels, the great men, and all o ther of the communalitie of Scotland, which shall come in the same conditi ons, shall haue life and member, lands and tenements, fees and offices within Scotland, which they ought to haue by inheritance or right, those except, which shall be surprisid by common assent.

Item, that they shall be pardoned of imprisonment, and of all manner tres passes by them done in the Realmes of England and Scotland from the begin ning of the world, vnto the date of these presents.

Item, the Earle Daffels, and Alexander Mowbrey, shall haue lands, tene ments, possessions, and fees in England, which they had at their departure, after the homage done at Newcastle vpon Tyne.

Item, that the franchises of the Church in Scotland shall be maintayned, after the ancient vsage of Scotland.

Item, that the lawes of Scotland in Borough Townes, & Shireuokes, within the lands of the king of Scotland, be vsed after the ancient vsages and custome of Scotland, as they were vsed in the dayes of king Alexander.

Item, that the offices of Scotland be ministred by people of the same na tion, yet not withstanding, that alwaies the king of Scotland may put such officers in as shall please him, of what nation soeuer they be.

Item, that all those that within the conditions of the Earle Daffels haue lands within the lands of the king of England in Scotland, shall haue againe the same lands, tenements, possessions, offices and fees, as they had them at their departure, after their homage done at Newcastle vpon Tyne, except those that shall be surprisid by common assent.

Item, that if they be employed for their landes and tenements aforesaid, that they haue their defences and recourries in Court where they ought to haue.

Item, as touching the demand which the Earle Daffels claime, that the king of England ought to acquite his lands in England which he hath in gage for eight hundred markes, the king neither ought, nor will do it, but as touch ing the Spanoz of Wyppingsdone, which the said Earle laide to pledge for two hundred and fiftie pounds, it is accorded that if the said Earle do come within one yeare, after the date of these presents, and will acquite the Spanoz, the king shall cause that he haue the same Spanour.

Item, as touching the Castle and Landes of Chilling, it is accorded that the said Earle be in the same poynt that he was before at his departure, and haue his recovery by lawe, and the king promisseth in god faith that he will cause that he may haue the land, without delaying either partie. And touch ing the lands which the said Earle claime, that he haue in Norfolk, of the which he hath charters, it is accorded that his charters being seen of the kings Councell, he will doe reason.

Item, that in case any man surmise treason vpon the said Earle, he may defend himselfe by his bodie, according to the lawes and blages of Scot land, and on the marches, and that all those that be within these conditions, haue the like graunt.

Item, as to the pardon which William Ramsey knight demaundeth for the trespassse by him done to William Lord Mountague, to wete, for beating down his castle of Houghton, the same William shall be ready to doe according to that that shall be aduised by the Kings of England and Scotland.

Item, that the said Stacie de Loraine haue his lands and tenements which he ought to haue within the Realme of Scotland, and if any man haue tres passed towards him, he shall haue his recovery by law. Written at Saint Johns Towne in Scotland the 18. of August, Anno 1335.

Philip Quene of England did beare her second sonne named William, at Hatfield, who shortly after died.

About the feast of the Epiphanie, the King and the Archbishop returned out of Scotland, to the buriall of Iohn of Eltham, Earle of Cornewall, brother vnto the King, who deceased at Berwike in the moneth of October, and was buried at Westminster. At which time, the King kept a Parliament at London, which began on the Sunday after Saint Matthes day: and on the first Sunday in Lent, he made his eldest sonne Edward Earle of Chester, and Duke of Cornewall. He made also five other Carles, Henrie of Lancaster (sonne to Henrie Earle of Lancaster) Earle of Derby, Hugh Audley Earle of Gloucester, William Bohune Earle of North-hampton, William Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, William Clinton Earle of Huntingdon, Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke, to the which Robert he at that time gaue the Spanoz of Bale court, in the Parish of Saint Giles without Cræplegate of London, commonly called to this day the Barbican, because in olde time the same had ben a Burgekening, or watch-tower for the citie.

The same day, the King made twentie Knights, to wit, Sir Edward Mountacute, Sir Thomas Somerton, Sir Ise, Sir Darcy Richard, Sir Dam wory, Sir John Poultney, Sir de Mere, Roger Banant, Roger Hilary, Sir Boling broke, Sir Butterel, Sir Simon Swanland, William Scot, William Bassier, Robert Sodington, William Zoules, Sir Cogshall, Roger Sangraule, Thomas de la More mine Authoz, and Iohn Strache.

In the same Parliament it was enacted, that no wooll growing within the Realme of England, should be transposed out of the same, but that it should

Although this Statute seemed at the beginning to be nothing profitable, yet in short time the Art of cloathing increased so much thereby, that it was twentie times more vfed than before.

Also it was enacted, that no man should after that time buy any cloth that was made beyond the sea, and that none should weare any Furres, but such as might dispend one hundred pound by yere.

The 20. of March, the K. granted by his Letters patents powler to the Chauncelloz of the Vniuersitie of Cambridge, to recceiue in his name yerele the oathes of the Mayor, Bayliffes, Aldermen, and Burgeesses of the town; which euer since hath so continued.

The. deli Mort.

After the feast of Saint Michael, a Parliament was holden at London, and a Conuocation was assembled by the Archbishop, wherein the Clergie granted a tenth for thre yeres, and the Commons a fiftenth, in consideration of the Kings warres which was hot in Scotland, and also to resist the French King, who made great bygges, and shewed great crueltie, so he outlawed, slew, and imprisoned all Englishmen, and confiscated the goods and cattels of all that were found in his kingdome of France, threatening that he would be reuenged for his friends the Scots.

Ann. reg. 11.

Moreouer, he let not so much as one towne or castle in the Countie of Aquitaine, or of Poytiers, that was not seized into his hands: whereupon King Edward sent into Brabant, to take vp all the wolle which Merchants had brought thither, and made sale thereof for ready money. He also wrote letters to the French king, exhorting him, that he would continue his old amitie, Sir Walker Many being the Ambassadors for the king of England, and desirous to renenge the blood of two Englishmen that were slaine comming a land so fresh water, in a certain Island, called the Isle of Agnes, nigh vnto Flanders, he caused all that he found in the said Island to be put to the sword, and toke prisoner the Earle of Flanders brother, who was capitaine of the Isle.

The warres being thus as aforesaid begun betwixt the two kingdomes, the rumour thereof came vnto the court of Rome, whereupon the Pope sent two Cardinals for the reformation and ordering of the peace betwixt the two kingdomes: who comming to Westminster, declared before the King the cause of their comming: wherevnto the K. answered, that although with out all reason they did seeme to restraine him of right and equitie, for that he ought to succed into the kingdome of his forefathers, the which his aduersarie Philip de Valois did deny him, expelling, murdering, and imprisoning his people, and taking away the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and Earledome of Poytiers without cause, maintaining the Scots and other rebels against him, yet these injuries notwithstanding, he was contented if they could take order for the quiet enioying of Aquitaine, and other lres belonging vnto him, which his predecessors did enjoy.

Moreouer, for the dismissing of all aid that the French king should giue vnto the Scots at any time of rebellion, for the which he offered him money, and also the marriage of his eldest sonne, and also to resigne all such rites and interest that he had to the kingdome of France.

The Cardinals being greatly comforted with this answer, departed, hoping that all warres were now ended. They toke with them John the Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard Bishop of Durham, & Geoffrey Lord Segrave, who all together went on message with the Kings answer to the French King, hauing full authoritie to treat and conclude a peace.

These being so reasonable offers, could not pacifie the furious mind of the French King, who repoled great trust in the Scots, hoping by them, and through their meanes, quite to dispossesse, and to disinherit the king of England of all the title he had.

This yere on the 7. of October, King Edward began the foundation of his Colledge in Cambridge, that since was called the Kings hall, but now with Michael house, and Physicke hostell, all made into one by King Henry the 8. is called Trinitie Colledge.

Also this yere because of the warres with France, king Edward caused to be confiscated all the goods of the Priories aliens in England, that is to say, such Priories as were selles to any monasteries in France. He let put the Priories to ferme, with all their lands and tenements, and rented them at his pleasure for the space of thre and twentie yeres: in the which time diuers of those Priories were purchased of the king, made free, and againe (as it were) new founded by Englishmen, as Witburie in the Caslie, and other; the residue not changed, were in the five and thirtieth yere of King Edwards raigne againe restozed to their lands: as shall be shewed when I come to it.

The King toke Wool, to a certain number of sackes, at a low price in euery countrey: the number that was set vpon Saffordshire was five hundred sackes, price nine markes the sacke of good wool: but nothing was paid. first, the Wool was vniuersally taken. Secondly, for the halfe, in whose hands soeuer it were found, as well Merchants as other. And the thirde time the King toke a fiftenth of the comminaltie, to be paid in wool, price of euery stone (containing fourtene pound) two shillings.

The fourth of October, Little Calles well manned and furnished, came to South-hampton about nine of the clocke, and sailed the to towne, to the townsmen running away for feare: by the break of the next day they which fled, by helpe of the countrey thereabout, came against the English, and fought with them:

them, in the which skirmish were slaine the number of three hundred pyrates, together with their Capitaine a young Souldiour the King of Sicilie sonne. To this young man, the French king had given whatsoeuer he got in the kingdome of England: but he being beaten downe by a certaine man of the countrey, cryed Rancon, notwithstanding the husband-man layd him on with his clubbe, till he had slaine him, speaking these wordes: yea (quoth he) I know well enough thou art a Frenchman, and therefore shalt thou dye, for he understood not his speech, neither had he any skill to take Gentlemen prisoners, and to keepe them for their ransom: wherefore the residue of those Schinowayes, after they had set the Towne a fire and burnt it by quite, fledde to their Galleyes, and in their flying, certaine of them were drownd. And after this, the inhabitants of the towne compassed it about with a strong and great wall.

The king still maintaining his warres in Fraunce, on the euen of the Annunciation of our Lady, eleven gallies approaching to the towne of Harwich, they cast fire therein: the force wherof, by a contrary wind was staied, so that no great harme was done thereby. Furthermore, in the same yere about the feast of Pentecost, certaine Pyrates of Normandie and Genoa (shippes in Gallies and Pinnares) made a shew on the Sea about South-hampton, as they would haue come aland, and threatened to spoile the towne againe, but perceiving the townsmen ready to resist them, they returned to the Sea at night, but entred not, being put backe by the inhabitants: whereupon they sailed about the sea coasts, seeking to land in places lesse defended, and after came to Hastings, where they bent fishers cottages, with their boats, and slew many men. Also they made great shewes many times against the Isle of Thanet, Dover, and Folkestone, but in those places they did little harme, except to poore Fishermen: thence they sailed about to the hauens of Cornwall and Devonshire, doing in all places much harme to the fishermen, and such shippes as they found unmanned, they fiered. At length they entred Plimouth Haven, where they bent certaine great shippes, and a great part of the Towne: these were met by Hugh Courtney Earle of Devonshire, a knight of fourescore yeres old, being accompanied with many souldiours of his countrey, who hauing lost at the first front a fewe of his men which were slaine by the quarrels of the French, turned to fight with their hand to hand, and slaying many of the pyrates upon the land, chased the residue which fledde to take their gallies, and being not able to come nigh them by wading, they were drownd in the sea to the number of five hundred. Fewes being brought to the King living in Brabant, that diuers Boyses of England were spoyled with the Pirates, he declared to his friends, to wit, the Marques of Salicenne, and a certaine Cardinall, what great causes he had to reuenge himselfe vpon them, and in the end, was answered by the Cardinall as followeth.

The kingdome of Fraunce (saide he) is compassed about with a threde of Alke, which cannot be broken, by all the strength of the kingdome of England, wherefore my Lord king, you must say so, the coming of the Dutchmen, men, and other your friends and confederates, the greater part wherof you now lacke. The King taking great dislike hereat, staying nothing at all, said, that he would ride into the land of Fraunce with banner displayed, and that there he would looke for that mightie power of the French men, and that he would either win the same against any man that should withstand him, or else honestly die in the field.

King Edward wintered at Antwerpe, where Duene Philip was deliuered of her third sonne Lionel after Earle of Ulster. The king took upon him to be Lieutenant of the Empire from the Duke of Banare, who helde himselfe as Emperour.

The first day of the assumption of our Lady, a suddaine inundation of water at Newcastle upon Tyne, surmounted the wall, and bare downe a peece of the Towne wall, a fire pearched in length nere to a place called Wall-knaw, where 160. men, and seven Chaplains and women were drownded.

In the Month of Marchy king Edward began to ride with banner displayed, and twelue thousand men of armes, against the French king, burning towens and castles wheresoeuer he came. In the first night being very darke, Geoffrey Lord Scrope one of the kings Iustices, led one of the Cardinalls, to wit, Bertrand de Mount Fauentine, of the title of our Lady, vp into an high Towler, shewing him the whole land about toward Fraunce, for the compasse of fiftene leagues, to be in euery place on fire, (saying these wordes,) Sir, both not this filken thred wherewith Fraunce is compassed, seme to you to be broken: the Cardinall answering nothing, fell downe as dead for sorow and feare.

In this fort King Edward made iourneyes into Fraunce daily, continuing the space of five weekes, and caused his armie to trauell in such sort, that they destroyed the whole Countrey of Cambzay, Tourney, Vermoden, and Landenew, excepting those Cities which were swozne to him, with Churches and Castles. The inhabitants of the Countrey fled, neither was there any man that durst resist his enterprises, although the French king had gathered great armies within the walled Cities, himselfe lying in the strong Towne of Saint Quintines, what time the Brabanters had determined to returne home againe, and were entred into their iourney, being forced thereunto, partly by want of victuals, and partly by the coldnesse of Winter which grew on fast.

The French king vnderstanding thereof, began to moue himselfe with his army toward the campe of the King of England, who gladly looking for his coming, called backe againe the Brabanters, and hauing received Letters from the French king, that he would soone battell against him, he sent him word backe againe, that he would stay for him three dayes, wherefore on the fourth day the king looking for the French kings coming, which would come no nerer then then two miles off, breaking bridges, and felling of trees, that the King of England might not follow him, he fled to Paris, whereupon King Edward returned by Hanonia into Brabant, where he continued almost the whole winter.

William de la Poole made knight banneret for his good service to the king.

Record.
This was farther to Sir Michael Lord Beauchamp earle of Suffolk and knight of the Garter, who had the gift of Suffolk that died at Agincourt the 3 of May, without issue, and with his own apparours and afterwards duke of Suff. beheaded the 26 of May the 6. of the Flemings.

teine in Fraunce, gave unto William de la Poole for the succour of Monmouth frankely by him lent, and freely brought unto him in the coasts of Brabant, so as thereby his honour was preferred, which otherwise was in danger greatly to have been embased, to be honoured with the Militarie girdle, appointing him to keepe, and continue the state and honour of a Banneret: and he gave him the manors of Burfworth, and Skipp, with the appurtenances of two hundred and forty marks, in part of five hundred marks land yearly, more conveniently to maintain the same estate. And 260. marks yearly to be received of the customes in the port of the towne of Kingstone, until he were provided off two hundred and threescore marks land of yearly revenue. Finally, because William had delivred him, laying his owne goods and lands in gage, for recovering the kings right in Fraunce, the king granted, that if he recovered the rights of inheritance in Fraunce, he would further withbin the realme of Fraunce (in some competent place) give to him and to his heires, a thousand marks sterling by yeare.

In this winter time, King Edward grew into great friendship with the Flemings, who prepared at all times to shewe their felues as good subjects unto him, swearing to doe homage and fealty, upon condition that he would call himselfe king of Fraunce: and in token thereof, would from thenceforth give armes with flourdeleys, for otherwise they durst not obey him, for feare of the Popes curse, which was to be laid upon them, if at any timesthey rebelled against the king of Fraunce. Wherefore by the counsell of the Flemings, and consent of his noblemen, he agreed therunto, and toke upon him both the name and armes of the king of Fraunce. He also toke Flaunders under his government, the people whereof long after in all matters were to him obedient, as unto the king of Fraunce Conquerour. Touching the title and armes aforesaid, the French king said to certaine Englishmen sent unto him: Our cousin (quoth he) both wrongfully beare quartered armes of England and Fraunce, which matter notwithstanding both not much displeaseth us, for that he is descended from the weaker side of our kinne, and therefore as being a bachelor, we would be content to graunt him licence to beare part of our armes of Fraunce: but whereas in his scales and letters patents he nameth himselfe as well king of England as of Fraunce, and doth set the first quarter of his armes with leopards, before the quarter of Lilies, it doth grieve us very much, making apparant to the beholders, that the little fland of England, is to be preferred before the great kingdom of Fraunce. To whom sir John of Bohemich knight, made answer, That it was the custome of men in those dayes, to set the title and armes of their progenitors, before the armes and title of the right descending of their mother: and thus of dutie and reason (said he) doth my Lord the king of England preferre his armes.

King Edward being thus buied, he kept his Christmase at Gaunt: the partners of the Cinque Portes, embarked themselves in pinaces and small boats well appointed, who after the feast of S. Hilarie arrived at Bononia upon the sea coast, the weather being so cloudie and darke, that they could scarcely be perceived to be in the haven: they went in the lower towne nine

these galleys and foure great shippes, and twentie small boates with all their tackling, and all such howes as were situate nigh to the sea coast, among which was one great houle full of oares, saples, weapons, and other necessities, sufficient to furnish ninetye galleys, and men for them: at the length in a skirmish betwixt the townemen and the Englishmen, many of the land men were slaine.

About the beginning of Februarie King Edward returned into England, came unto Gaunt, where the Quene lay in childbed of her fourth sonne named John, he held a Parliament at Westminster, wherein the Compoaltie granted him every ninth sheeke of Wool, every ninth Lambe, and every ninth sheefe of all sortes of coppe, and the Cleargie gave him a new tenth.

Immediately after Easter, the Earles of Salisburie and Suffolke, being accompanied but with a few men, gave an assault unto the towne of Aile in Flaunders, which towne was confederate with the French king, but they chasing the Frenchmen to farre within the gates, the Percolices being let fall, they were beset with a multitude of men of armes, and being taken, they were conveyed into France, fettered and shackle with yron, although they had sworn to be true prisoners: they were drawn in a cart through the middle of every cite, towne, village and hamlet, with great shoutes and cries, rayling on them: and at length being brought to the presence of the French king, he would have most shamefully slain them, had he not been therewith perswaded by the counsell of the king of Boemia.

The seventh day of May the king gave to William Marquess of Flanders, and to the heires of his bodie, the Earldome of Cambryge, with the towne and castle, and twenty pounes by yeare in fee, and created him at Westminster by the girding of a sworde, whereof he also made him his charter with the gift of one thousand pounds of yearly rent.

Record.

King Edward kept his Whitsontide at Ipswich, for that he intended from thence to take his passage into Flaunders, but being certified that the French king had sent a great number of Spanish shippes, and also the whole fleet of France, to stoppe his passage, he caused his shippes of the Cinque Ports and other to be assembled, so that he had in his fleet great and small two hundred and threescore shippes.

Wherefore on the Thursday before the nativite of Saint Iohn Baptist, having a prosperous wind, he began to sayle, and the next day in the even of the sayd feast, they eschued the French fleet lying in Swine haven. Wherefore the king caused all his fleet to come to anchor.

The next day being the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, early in the morning, the French fleet divided themselves into three parts, and removed themselves as it were a mile, approaching towards the kings fleet.

Great fight on the sea, against the French.

Which when the king perceived, about nine of the clocke, having the wind and sunne on his backe, set forward and met his enemies as he would have wished, where withall the whole fleet gave a terrible shoute, and a holow of arrows out of long wooden bowes so powred downe on the French men, that thousands were slain in that meeting, at length they closed and came to hand blowes, with pikes, pole-axes, and swordes, and some they wone from the toppes of shippes wherewith many were hained.

The greatnesse and height of the Spanish shippes caused many Englishmen to strike many a stroke in vaine. But to be shorte, the French shippes being overcome, and all the men spent of the first part, the Englishmen entred and took them.

The French shippes were chayned together in such sort, that they could not be separated one from another, so that a few Englishmen kept that part of the fleet: wherefore they set upon the second warde, and with great difficulty gaue the charge, which being done, was soner overcome then the first, so that the French men leauing their shippes, many of them leapt out boorde.

The Englishmen hauing thus overcome the first and second part of the fleet, and now hauing night drawing on, partly for want of light, and partly for that they were wearie, they determined to take some rest till the next morning, wherefore that night thirtie shippes of the third crewe slede away, and a great shippe called the James of Diepe, thinking to haue carried away a certaine ship of Handwich belonging to the Bishop of Canturbury was stayed: for the Gallies so slowly defended themselves by the helpe of the Earle of Huntingdon that they saved themselves, and their ship from the Frenchmen. The fight continued all the night, and in the morning the Frenchmen being overcome and taken, there were found in the ship above foure hundred men slain. Whereupon the King vnderstanding that thirtie ships were fled, he sent fourtie ships well appointed to followe them, ouer the which he made Iohn Grahbe gouernour: but what god spake he had is not knowen.

In the first company of shippes that were taken they found these conquered shippes, the Denis, the George, the Christopher, and the blacke Cocke, all which shippes were taken by Frenchmen at Sluce, and carried into Flanders.

The number of ships of warre that were taken, was about two hundred and thirtie barges: the number of enemies that were slain and drowned were about six and twentie thousand, and of Englishmen about four thousand, among whom were foure knights, Sir Thomas Mortimer the Kings cousin, Sir Thomas Latimer his sonne, Sir William Butler of Seoythorne, and Sir Thomas Poynings.

About the same time the Scots came with a great power into England, burning and spoiling all the Marches by fire and sword, and when they were returning with a great botle of rattel, the common people set upon them, took their botle, slaine many of them, and took more then fourescore Scots of good reputation, whom they kept for ransome, for the which fact the people men of the Marches were highly displeased.

About Lammas certaine french pirates gaue an assault to the Isle of Wight and suddenly entred it, but Sir Peter Russell knight, meeting them with the people of that Isle, put them backe againe, and made them to depart.

slaying many of them, in the which skirmish the said knight was wounded where he died. These pirates sailed thence toward the coast of Denmarke, and coming to Reigsmouth, they set fire on the towne and burnt it: from thence they sailed towards Blomouth, which towne was so defended, that they could not hurt it, but burnt the farmes and faire places nigh adioyning, and took a knight prisoner, whom they carried with them.

The same yere King Edward besieged Bourne, but upon intreatie made by the French, a truce was taken from Michaelmas till Epiphany, wherefore the King coming to Gaunt in Flanders, stayed there, looking for money out of England, which came not.

King Edward with eight of his men, sayning that he would ride abroad for his pleasure, secretly came into Zeland, where taking shippe, after he had layed three dayes and three nights, on St. Andrewes day at night about the Cockcrowling, he entred the Towter of London by water, being waited on by the Earle of Southampton, Nicholas Cantilope, Reinalde Cobham, Giles de Bello Campo, Iohn de Bello Campo knights, William Killesby, and Phillip Weston priests: early in the morning he sent for his Chancellour, Treasurer, and Iustices then being at London, and the Bishop of Chichester being his Chancellour, and the Bishop of Couentry his treasurer, he put out of office, minding also to haue sent them into Flanders, to haue ben pledges for money he owed there: but the Bishop of Chichester declared vnto him what danger might insue to him, by the Canons of the Church: whereupon the King dismissed them out of the Towter: but as concerning the high Iustices, to wit, Iohn Lord Stoner, Robert Lord Willowby, William Lord Scharshell, and especially Nicholas de la Bech, who before that time was Lieutenant of the Towter of London, and Sir Iohn Molens knight, with certaine merchant men, as Iohn Poultney, William Poole, and Richard his brother, and the Chancellours chiefe Clerkes, to wit, Maister Iohn de Saint Paul, Michell Wathe, Henry Stafford, and certaine of the Exchequer, as Maister Iohn Thorpe, with many other moe, the King commaunded to be imprisoned, some in one place, some in another, neither would he suffer them to be discharged thence, till he were thoroughly pacified of his anger conceived for not sending the money which should haue serued at the siege of Bourne.

This yere about Christmas, Henry Bishop of Lincoln, and Geoffrey Lord Scrope, chiefe Iusticiar to the King and his chiefe Counsellor died at Gaunt. King Edward kept his Christmas at Gilsford, and after that a great fasting at Kyng.

Also at Candlemas he kept a great fasting at Langley, for the honour of the noble men of Gasconia, which he trained by there in feates of warre. He made Robert de Bousier knight Lord Chancellour of England, and Robert Parrike knight treasurer, the one to succede the other. Also he sent out Iustifiers that should sit in every thre, to enquire concerning the rolled ours of the tenths and sixtenth, and of wittles, and to ouersee all officers. And because the Citie of London would not suffer that any such officers should sit as Iustices within their Citie as inquisitors of such matters contrary to their liberties, returned secretly into England, and entered the Towter by night.

liberties, the King provided that those Justices should hold their Sessions in the Tower of London, to make inquisition of the damages of the Londoners; but because the Londoners would not answer there, untill their liberties were fully confirmed, neither any such confirmation could be had either of the King, or his Chancellour touching Writtes and Charters in the Tower, there rose thereof such a great tumult, that the Justices appointed there to sit, said that they would holde no Session, till after Easter. Whereupon the King being highly offended for the said tumult, and desirous to knowe the names of them that had raysted it, could not understand but that they were certaine meane persons, who claimed their liberties: whereupon the King being pacified of his troubled minde, for that all the offences committed by the Londoners, the Justices breaking by all their sitting touching the said place. This yere within the quindene of Easter a parliament was holden at London, wherein the Carles and Nobles of the realme, with the commons requested, that the Charter called Magna Carta, and Carta Foresta, with all other liberties belonging to the Church and kingdome should be observed, and that the officers and chiefe rulers of the Kings house should be chosen by the pères of the realme, in the parliament: but these persons the King would not confirme, nor could abide to heare talked of.

About the beginning of the moneth of July, King Edward received letters from Lodowike Duke of Bauary, usurper of the Romane Empire, in the which pretending friendship betwixt him and Philip the french King, he signified that those warres which the King of England had begun in France, did greatly dislike him, and therefore desired that there should be concord and amitie betwixt the Kings of both realmes, the which to be performed, he offered to bestow some labour, requesting King Edwards letters of authoritie therof to treat and to conclude a truce for one yere or twaine, toward the end of which letter he addeth these words: The deputation and lieutenantship which we gave unto you, we doe for diuerse and sundry causes reuoke againe. Dated at Frankford the fourteenth of June in the seven and twentieth of our raigne, and of our Empire the fourteenth. To the which letters, King Edward wrote an inscription, in foote as followeth.

So the renowned Prince Lodowike, by the grace of God Romane Emperour, allwayes Augustus, Edward by the same grace King of France and England, Lord of Ireland &c.

This yere John Maluene, Fellow of Oxiall Colledge in Dorseth, made and finished his booke entituled, The Mitions of Pierce Plowman.

King Edward gaue the Cardedom of Cambrydge to John Lord Benault, brother to Quene Phillip, and after kept his feast of St. Katherine at Newcastell, and his Christmase also. Untill this time David King of Scots threatened to leise an armie, and to enter the land, whereupon King Edward entered Scotland, and followed after David, who fled before him beyond the Scottish sea, working and spoiling all as he went, except Castles and Parishes, in the which the Scottes together with David their King hidde themselves. And William Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, hauing gotten a great flecte, entered an Island belonging to Scotland, where most victoriously he conquered it, and the same Ile being called the Ile of Man, the King gaue it to the conquerour frankly and freely to be possessed, and caused him to be called and crowned king of that Ile. When king Edward returning towards the south parts, kept solenne turneaments at Dunstable, being accompanied with two hundred and thirte knights.

The same yere was a Parliament at Westminster, wherein the Archbishop of Canterbury, was reconciled to the king, before whom the Archbishop swore that although the king by his counsell and consent had done homage to the french king for the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and the Earldome of Devon, yet he neuer consented thereto as to be any hurt or prejudice to the king, or that by his counsell he might incurre fauour, or seeke to please the french King, but for that present time he thought it best to be done, both for the obtaining of peace, and also for the profite of the king and realme.

After this Parliament the king commanded flozenges of golde to be made at the Tower of London, that is to say, the penny of the value of five shillings eight pence, the halfe penny of the value of thre shillings foure pence, a farthing twost twenty pence.

In a Parliament at Westminster, in the moneth of May, the religious men that were possessours of lands, granted to the king, towards the maintenance of his warre, all their felwels and plate, aswell flax as golde, hoxes, carts and wagons, whereupon the kings treasure was notably enriched.

The same yere authoritie was giuen to the Kings escheiters, to enquire and certifie the Counsell of all such persons, which helde of the king any lands in capite, or by any other se, to the value of one hundred shillings, and that the names of all such should be enrolled and giuen by for record. Also certaine other were put in authoritie to signifye how many sufficient and able hitmen were in euery shire: also what other sufficient men were able to beare armour for the defence of their Countrey, and to see them practised with such kind of weapon wherein they had best skill: and being thus assembled in all parts of the realme, specially such as were of lawfull age, commaundement was giuen out, that they should be ready at the Kings commaundement to fight against their enemies.

King Edward and his nobles pertaine the derogation that was done to the Realme by such reservations, piousness and collations of benefices; as the Pope practised here in England, wrote to him, requiring, that like the Churches of England had been founded and endowed by noble and worthy men, to the ende the people might be instructed by men of their owne language, and that he being so farre off, could not understand the benefices, yet his predecessours, and he more then had ben used, by diuers reservations, piousness, and collations made to diuers persons, some strangers, and some enemies to the Realme, whereby the Realme and poples were carried forth, their cures not provided for: according to the founders minds, they therefore upon due considerations desired to him, that they could not suffer such enormities any longer, and besought him to revoke such reservations, p[ro]visions and collations wholy, to avoid such disorders, mischiefs and harmes as might ensue, and that the cures might be committed to persons mete for the exercises of the same, beseeching him further without delay to signify his intention, sith they meant to bestowe their diligence to remedie the matter, and see that redress might be had. Given in full Parliament at Westm[on]ster, the eighteenth of May, in the yere of our Lord 1343.

Many being called to ayde the King against the Scottes, but not being ready, they contributed their money, wherewith the King might hire soldiers in place of them that remained at home. This yere saith one witten booke in French, that Edward held a great feast at Windsor of 300. knights, and as many labours, with great outrage of expences and costs.

King Edward caused to be called together a great many of Artificers, to the Castell of Windsor, and began to build an house which was called the round Table, the floore whereof, from the Center to midde point into the compass, was an hundred fote, and the whole Diameter two hundred fote, and the circumference thereof is five hundred fote and thre quarters.

The same time Philip de Valois King of France, builded a round Table in his Countrey, to the end that he might allure the men of Barre of Germany and Italie, and so to keepe them from the King of Englands round Table.

King Edward in succour of John Mountfort Duke of B[er]kshire, and of his wife and children, who then remained in the Kings custody, sent the Carles of Southampton, and of Oxford, Hugh Spencer, and Richard Talbot knights, and Master William Killesby Clarke, every one of them having under them many men of armes and archers, into B[er]kshire, who entred therein, in despite of all their enemies which resisted them, making many conflicts. They took as well walled townes as other, with divers fortresses and castles, both by assault and surrender, by which means they had the whole countrey under their subjection, conquering till they came to the towne of M[ar]tine, where Charles de Blois met them with a great army. Therefore in the champaigne ground nigh unto M[ar]tine, the two armies made great and most fowle battell, wherein the worthinesse of both sorts did full well appeare: for they fought so stoutly, that in the first conflict it chaunced as the like had not ben sene: for the chiefe Captaines, Charles de Blois, to whome the French King had given the Dukedome of that countrey, and William de Bohune Earle of Southampton, who for the defence of the right of John de Mountfort, naturall heire and Duke of that land, the King of England had made a Generall over the armie of the Englishmen, fought so long with hand strokes in the fildoe that day, that no man but a liar could give more paine to the one then to the other. Thre times that day they being wearied on both sides, withdrew themselves to take breath, and then fell to it againe with spear and shield, and sword and target: but in the end the right worthie and stout Charles de Blois, his men fleeing away, was also forced to flee himselfe, wherupon wherupon after many saine on both sides, the victory fell to the Englishmen.

King Edward sent over Henry Earle of Derby, sonne to the Earle of Lancaster his cousin, with more then five hundred men of armes, amongst whom was the Earle of Derby, and Walter de Maui, with many Archers into Gascoigne, with Ralph Baron of Stafford Seneschall of Gascoigne, who being come thither, the said Earle made fifty knights of his army, and after wanh many walled townes and castles, making many worthie skirmishes, and at length tooke the towne of Dagulstone by assault, to the keeping whereof they appointed Ralph Stafford, afterward they appointed thre townes towards other townes, as especially to Wigerette (so called for the strength thereof, and also called the chamber of France) and also to the towne of Saint John de Laruell, and to many other great and strong townes well fortified, which with great toiles and divers dangerous assaults they won: where the Earle of Derby and his souldiours undermining the towres and walles of the said towne, were very sore assaulted by them which defended it.

Thus he conquered cities, to townes, castles and fortresses, to the number of one hundred and fiftie, bringing a great part of Gascoigne under subjection, even to Toulouse, unto the which cite he did no damage, neither to the inhabitants thereof, but that he made them wonderfully afrayde: as certaine of them tolde me (saith my author) their feare was such, that the religious people were constrained to beare armour, and the Prior of the Carmelite Friars of our Lady of Toulouse, having a banner of our Lady in golde set in a feld of siluer, displayed the same, provoking thereby many to take armour.

About the second Sunday in Lent, the earles being fully fraught with booty, prisoners, gold and siluer, they returned towards Barbeur, where John de Valois, eldest sonne to the French king, being accompanied with a great number of hyed Dutch souldiours, besieged the towne of Agnolwone, and the captaines thereof the Earle of Stafford and other, so intrenched the same towne, that without great daunger the Englishmen could have no access unto them, but the Earle of Derby beate away them that besieged the cite, and elisions new victualled the same, notwithstanding they were not able to raise the siege, because they had so intrenched themselves without the towne, who refusing to fight in the fild, would answer, that they came not to pitch a feld, but to besiege a towne, wherefore they continued the same siege until the decollation of Saint John, but understanding then that the King of England chased his father Philip very sore to Cressie, and fearing that he should come very late to the ayde of his father, he gave up the siege, setting all his tents on fire, and fled in the darke, but the Earle of Stafford with his powder pursued them, cut off their talle, took a great many of their horses, and returned.

After this certaine bow-men are mustered in England, appointed to be sent over sea, who coming over, are layde in garrison for defence of the countrey. Also twentie thousand sackes of wolle are granted to the King. 20000. sackes of wolle granted to the King. Geoffrey de Harcourt a Bozman, came to the King requiring ayde against the French King, who wrongfullie with-helde his landes from him:

Richard de Bury deceased at Aukland, when hee had late Bishoppe of Durham eleven yeeres, two moneths, and odder dayes, and was buried at Durham, unto whome succeeded Thomas of Hatfield the Kings secretary, by meanes of the Kings letters to the Pope: And when certayne of the Cardinales saide, that the saide Thomas was a light person, and a lay man: the Pope answered, truly, if the King of England at this time had made his request for an abbe, hee should haue obtained it. But Richard Bury is somewhat to bee remembred for example to other, hee was bozne nere Saint Edmundsbury, by his father Sir Richard Angarvill Knight, and his uncle Sir John Willowby his gouernour hee was first set to Grammar schole, and after sent to Oxford, from whence hee was called to teach Edward of Wintonse, then Prince: afterward this Richard was made principall rectour to Edward the second in Calcoigne, at such time as young Edward with his mother fledde to Paris, whose expenses beginning to faile, the said Richard came to them priuily with a great summe of money, for which cause hee was pursued to Paris where he lay hid in a steeple by the space of seuen dayes. After this hee was made Cosseter to Edward the third, then treasurer of the Wardrobe, then cleaerke of the priuie scale by the space of five yeeres, in the which time, whise he went to Pope Iohn. In the five and twentieth yeere of his age hee was consecrated Bishop of Durham, then was he made Treasurer of England, and after Chancelour, since the which time hee was sent thirke to the French King to claime the kingdome of France, and after that, to Antwerpe, and other places in Habant in embassage by the space of nine yeeres, hee was greatly delighted in the company of Clearkes, and had alwayes many of them in his family, among whom were Thomas Bradwardine, after ward Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard Fitz Ralph Archbishop of Armaicham, Walter Burley, Iohn Mandit, Robert Holcot, Richard Kilwington, all of them doctors of diuinitie, Richard Wentworth or Benworth Bishop of London, and Walter Segreue Bishop of Chichester every day at his table, hee was accustomed to haue some reading: and after dinner daily hee would haue disputation with his priuie clearkes, and other of his house, except some by gent cause had let him. At other times hee was occupied, either in seruice of God, or at his bookes, whiche he bestowed for the reliefe of the poore eight quarters of wheate made into bread, besides the ordinary fragments of his house. Moreover, in coming or going from Newcastle to Durham, hee bestowed sometimes twelue markes in almes, from Durham to Stockton eight markes, from Durham to Aukland five markes, from Durham to Spidaleham an hundred shillings, &c. Hee was so delighted in Bookes, that hee had more (as was thought) then all the Bishops of England besides, hee bestowed many rich ornaments on the Church of Durham, hee busied an hall or house in Oxford, indowing it with revenues needfull for his schollers. And also provided in a library great store of Bookes, for the use of the whole Ministrie, as the said Bishop writeth himselfe in his booke entituled, Philobiblos, and and appointed the masters of the Hall to assigne five schollers for keeping of the common library, &c.

The same yeere died Adam Tarkton Bishop of Winchester that had been long time blinde, after whom succeeded William Edendon treasurer of England.

This Edendon founded the monastery of Edendon, the religious brethren whereof were called Bonhomes.

The same yeere died Henry Earle of Lancaster, father to Henry Earle of Derby, and was buried at Leicester, in the monastery of canons, the King and both the olde and yong Quenes being present, with Archbishops, Bishops, Cardes and Barons, in manner of all the land, whose sonne was then in Calcoigne doing chivalrous acts.

This yeere the Scots, to the number of thirtie thousand, William Douglas being their leader, entred into Westmerland, and bent Carlisle, Penrith, with many other townes, wherfore the Bishop of Carlisle, with Thomas Lucy, Robert Ogle, and a great number, compassed them in the night season, and with lights and noise so disquieted them, that they neuer durst goe out for bidualles, nor giue their bodies to sleepe, but at the last Alexander Stragan stoutly prepared to goe out for bidualles, whom the Bishop and Robert Ogle mette, and with a speare thrust him through the body, so that the Scots were sone after ouer come and slaine.

The Earle of Northampton, and the other Lords in Brytaine committed certain castles wome by them in Brytaine, to the safekeeping of the faithfull captaines and souldiours, and then returned into England.

King Edward prepared to make a voyage into Normandy, his nauy being ready to transport him from Portsmouth and Dorchester, with the Cardes of Northampton, Arundell, Warwicke, Herecourt, Huntingdon, Drenford, and Suffolke, the Bishop of Durham, and Maister William Killesby cleaerke, every one of these leading a great army of souldiours well appointed, were embargued, and waited for the winde, from the first of Iune, to the sixt of July, and then hauing a good winde, they beganne to make saile with the number of one thousand shippes of burthen and pnales, and on the thirtieth day of July, they landed at Hogges in Normandy, where on the shoare of the Sea, King Edward made his eldest sonne Knight, and also Prince of Wales, and immediately the Prince made knights, Mortimere, Montacute, Rose, and other.

That night the King lodged in the towne of Hogges, and the next day the towne was bent by the army.

The night following King Edward lodged in Perrels. where he stayed five dayes, during which time, all the Countrey, with the Towne of Warberste, was by his men consumed with fire. From thence they departed to Melongis, which they set on fire: then they went to Saint combe Mount, which is nigh the sea, and to Garantam, thence to Serius, and to Saint Lewes, passing along unto the towne of Tournay, waisting all with fire, and that night the King lodged at Camartin, then to Gerin, being a religious house belonging belonging unto Cane, leaving nothing behind them unpoyled.

Afterward they made an assault, and entered the City of Cane, making their entrance by a bridge which was strongly defended.

There was slain an hundred and thre and fourtie knights, among the which was taken the Earls of Cleve, and Camberlinde Tankerull, with divers other capitaines, and of them of the Citie, were slain above one thousand thre hundred.

At this Citie the armie remained five dayes, and the spoile thereof they sold to those mariners which followed the coast as the King went. Then they went to the monastrie in the Towne of Toward, a verie strong thing, and well defended. Afterward, they came unto Argons by night, burning still as they went, till they came to the Citie of Licens, where they found the Cardinall of Clarimount, and of Paples, and one archbishop, who offered the King a treatie of peace, and there the King continued thre dayes, refusing to treatie of peace. Then they went to Kessentmoland, and to the Towne of Wyke, and lodged at Peter Burge, and after at Selesse upon Sayne, and there the Welchmen swamme through the water of Segan, and being resisted by the inhabitants, they slew many of them. When they passed nigh to the towne and Castell of Mount Darch, being strong places, and not assailable. This night he lodged at Lury upon Segan, nigh unto the good Towne of Louars, which they did burne. After, they passed by the towne and castell of Gallon, which they took, and bent, and lodged at Lingene, which is nigh the good towne and Castle of Wernon, which they touched not, and there they first entred into Fraunce, and the same night they bent the Castell of Roche Blanch, which standeth on the other side of Segan, and lodged at Fremble upon Segan. After that they passed by the Towne of Mount, lodging that night at Apoyne. On the next day they passed to Frignias, and the next day to the good towne of Poecie, where being a bridge to passe over the river of Segan, the French had spoiled it, but the King caused it to be redified: and the next day they came to Amias, where were thre Armies appointed to keepe the King from passing that way: but he slew thre hundred of them at the first charge, put the residue to flight, and spoiled their tentes, burning thre hundred and two cartes and wagons laden with crosebowes, quarrels, armour and victualles: the King staying there two dayes, they went to Greslie nigh unto Mountops, then to Antell: the next day they passed by the Citie of Gennepe, which they touched not, and so by Trosolours at the water of Some, where they lodged.

The next day they wanne the towne of Poys, and bent the castell. From thence they went to Argens, then to Achen, where they lodged. The next day they came to Spoell upon the sea side, the French men of Dabulle and the countrey came to the foydes side to hinder their passage, with whom the King had a close conflict, but the enemies were put to the worse, and more then two thousand slain, and the Towne of Croptoy taken and bent, and above thre hundred Germanes slain.

The next day they followed the King on the river of Some, and on the banks banks side (where the King with his host were lodged) came traveling Philip de Valois the French King, with the Kings of Boheme and Palegre, leading an armie of men innumerable, divided into eight great battelles. King Edward sent to the French King, offering him free passage over the foyde, if he would come and chuse a place apt to fight a field in, but this Phillip went to another place of passage.

On the morrow King Edward remoned to Cressfield, where the armie of the French King met him. The King therefore set his sonne the Prince of Wales to gouerne the backward. The middle warde the earle of Portbampton. The third he took to guide himselfe.

The armie of the Frenchmen were deuised into nine troupes. The backward was committed to the King of Boheme. The French King commanded his banner called Millaine to be set vp, after which time it was not lawful vnder paine of death to take any man to saue his life.

This banner, that it might differ from his standard, had in it lillies of gold very brab.

On the other side, King Edward commanded his banner to be erected of the dragon, which signified fiercenesse and cruelty to be turned against the lillies.

These armies being thus appointed, rode in the feldes from one of the cloche untill the evening. About the Sonne setting, after the armies had rested, they beganne by the sound of Trumpets to give signe of battaille, but they themselves felt the force of the English Archers, and as for their quarrels, they fell short a great way. Moreover, their footemen being placed among their owne horsemen, were by them (when they were gauled with the English shotte of arrowes) overrunne and troden vpon, that a great outcry was made as if were to the starres, and the whole foyme of the array was broken, and they fighting with the English armed men, are beaten downe with poles.

In this so terrible bickering, the Prince of Wales being then but sixteenth yeeres old, shewed his wonderfull to wardnesse, laying on very hotely with speare and shield. This battell dured thre partes of the night, in the which time the Frenchmen gave five great assaults against our men, but at the length they being conquered, ran away.

On the morrow, there came foure armies of fresh souldiours to the French side, and making semblance as though their part had suffered no harme, they came against the Englishmen, and gaue them a fresh battell. On the other side, the Englishmen withstood them very stoutly, and after a sharpe conflict they forced their foes to flie, and in chasing of them together with them that were slain in the conflict, they slew thre thousand men in the said two dayes. There were slain in the battaille of Cressie, the Kings of Boheme and of Palegre, the Archbishop of Zahrinus, the Bishop of Poypone, the Dukes of Lozaine & Bourbon, the Earls of Alanfon, Harecourt, Aymarle, Sanoz, Pois, Mountbilliard, Pluars, and of Flanders, with the great Prince of the Hospital of Fraunce, and 4000. men of armies, beside common souldiours without number.

The third day after, King Edward passed by the Abbey of Mountney, and the next day they came to the town of Mountney, & from thence to the Burgh of Saint Joice, and after they passed over a fowde, and came to Newcastle, where they stayed two dayes, and from thence they came to Calets, which presently they entrenched to besiege, being the fourth day of September.

The French king in this meane time sent a number of Senowayes, and other hired scaldours, unto David king of Scots, earnestly requesting him that he would invade England with all his force: wherefore about the 7. of October, he with a mighty power entered England, passing along by Berwikke, which was strongly defended by the Englishmen, and so ranging over the forefrest of Alnewikke, they tooke a certaine mannour place called Ludey, belonging to the Lord Walter Wake, who yielded himselfe on condition to be ransomed, where (Selby a knight being desirous by law of armes to save his life) he was taken, which when it was known to David, he commanded him to be slaine: but Selby intreated for him, that he might be brought alive to the presence of David, who having obtained his request, he saileth downe before David, requesting his life for ransome, but he was againe adjudged to die. The malice of the tyrant was such, that he commanded two of the children of the poore knight to be strangled in sight of their father, and afterwards himselfe being almost madde for sorrow, was beheaded.

From thence the Scots passed forward, waiking along the Countrey, wherein were many farmes belonging to the monasterie of Durham, & coming within two miles of Durham, they tooke certaine of the Spokes, which they kept prisoners, for their ransome, making covenant with the residue for a certaine summe of money and coine to redeme their mannours from spoiling. The Englishmen of the marches staid before the face of the enemy, William de la Zouch, Archbishop of Porke, vicegerent to the king in the marches, calling together the bishop of Carlisle, the Earle of Anguise, the Lord Mowbray, the Lord Henry Percy, the Lord Ralph Neucl, Ralph Hastings, with all their apde, together with the archers of Lancashire, went towards the armie of the Scots, and on the even of Saint Luke, met them at a place called Bewze Parke, nere Hewils Trosse. The Scottissh nation not accustomed to fite, with stode them stoutly, and having head-pieces on their heads, and targets on their armes, preading fore upon the Englishmen, they abode the brunt of the archers: but the men of armes which were in the forefronts, gave their enemies many deadly wounds. The Marchall of the Scottes, Earle Patrick, who had the charge of the reereward, when he perceived his men to be beaten downe, he fled away with other that were puaile to his cowardlines: he being fled, the residue of the Scottes continuing faithfully with their king, stode about him like a round Tower, keeping him in the middle, who continued till there was scarce fortye of them left alive, of the which not one of them could escape away.

At length David their king valiantly fighting and fore hurt, an English of Northumberland, named John Copland took him, who with eight of his servants rode strait out of the field with the king, and so rode siffene leagues from from that place, to a castle called Argaine, the residue about him being taken by slaine, the Englishmen pushed the chafe after them toward Wretton, slaying and taking them as fast as Bradshott and Colbyge. In this great battell were taken David de Bruce king of Scottes, the Earle of Gentles, the Earle of fife, the Lord Paleolin Flemming, the Earle Wilton, William Douglas, William de Lenningstone, Walter de Haliburton, John Douglas, David de Anade, John de Saint Clere, William Mowbray, David fir Robert, William de Ramsey, Adam Moygne, John Steward, Roger de Kirkpatrick, John Hume, and William Morrey knights, James Sudelloure, James Lorn, Henry Delker Barohets. There were slaine in this battell the Earle of Porzise, the Earle of Straterne, also Alexander Stragy, John de Haliburton, Henry de Ramy, Naso de Ramy, Adam Nilkenon, Thomas Boid, John Steward, Allan Steward, David de la Hay, Edward Keth, John Crawford, John de Kindesey, Philip de Maldren, Henry Ramsey, Alexander Morey, Humfrey de Bois, Gilbert Inchmarren, Robert Maltallen, and his brother Humfrey Kirkpatrick, John Strange, and Patrike Hearing knights. There were many slaine in the chafe, but there were no more coate armours found in the maine battell then two bare reckened.

This battell was fought on the seventeenth of October. The prisoners were conveyed to London about Christmasse, David de Bruce except, which might not traueil by reason of two deadly wounds in his head with arrowes, but the second of January he was brought by, and conveyed from Westminster to the Tower of London, in sight of all the people, and there lodged in the blacke towke of the said Tower, nere to the Constables guard, there to be kept. About the feast of S. Math: the Apostle, the Earle of fife was at London drawn, headed and quartered, his head set on London Bridge, his quarters set by in foure parts of the Realme.

John Copland, that took David de Bruce king of Scottes at the battell of Durham (so is it called in the Record) for his seruice, King Edward made him a banneret, and gave him for his maintenance in that state five hundred pounds by yeare, after this manner, to wit, four hundred poundes out of the custome of the Citie of London, and one hundred poundes out of his custome of the Towne of Barwikke upon Tynde, untill such time as five hundred pound lands by yeare were given to him and his heires for ever. And more for his good seruice with one hundred men of armes, one hundred pound the yeare, out of the custome of the kings port of Newcastle upon Tyne, till the said John had paid for him and his heires one hundred pound land by yeare.

While these things were done in England, the King was buised at the siege of Calets, which towne is situated in the marches of Artops, being closed about with a double wall, and a double ditch, hard on the thore of the English sea, right over against the castle of Douer. And there is belonging to the same towne an haven, wherein ships may lie very safe without danger. This towne was sometime with the castle thereof very strongly built by the force and balancines of the Romans, for after that Julius Caesar had brought all France under his subication, he built Calets in Artops, and the castle of Chepstow in Wenebedia, or South Wales, and the Castle of Dover in Kent, what time he had conquered Brytaine (as saith mine author,) King Edward cast a ditch about his campe, and laide his maine of ships against Caleis hawke, to the intent that the Frenchmen should make no invasions upon his landes ours, neither they within receive any victuals by water. The forman piers at sundry times take 15. of his ships, wherof some of them they carried away for their owne occupying, the other they burnt, and Sir Thomas Hach, with Sir William Borton Knights, as they were sailing into England, were taken prisoners on the sea. King Edward having fortified the siege, lay without giving any assault, knowing that it was not possible to fight with his enemies without great losse of men, considering the depth of the ditches, and height of the walles: neither would he erect any engines against the towne, for there wanted firme ground whereupon to place them. Besides that, if he should beate downe the walles, yet were the ditches so deepe, and full of salt water let in on every side, that they were able to withstand all the work, with little strength and defence. On that side of the Towne on which the Bolloniers were wont to victual Caleis, that is along on the Sea side, and especially when the shippes could not be suffered to passe by Sea, but along the shoare with small boates, the Earle of Northampton made a rampe, wherewith he kept away, & beat backe such boates, & after ward when the Armie of France had purposed to come with his ships of war to fight against our English ships that lay at the kege, thinking, & in the meane time, whilst they were in fighting, the small boates should passe to Caleis with victuals, the said Earle of Northampton meeting with him valiantly, put him to flight.

This siege during in such sort, from the feast of the Nativite of our Lady, all the whole winter, with a great part of the summer, and still warring stronger and stronger. On monday next before the feast of Saint James, the French King came to the castle of Guynes, with his eldest sonne John, and the Kings sonne of Boheme: and a great power, to have removed the siege from Caleis. Also the Emperour (promising by othe, that he would remove the siege either by warre or peace, or at the least, he would victual them that were besieged) came with his army towards the English campe, and lodged scarce a mile from thence, requesting by messengers a treatie of peace. He sent the Duke of Betenes, and the Carles of Bulone and Darminake, who paroling with the Duke of Lancaster, the Carles of Northampton and Huntington, touching a truce, could not obtaine their consent, whereupon after they had exercised a little warlike iusting, they returned to their Tents. The second day following, the French king offered the king of England a day of battell, which the king on certaine conditions accepted very gladly. In the meane season, they which were besieged, made known their state to y<sup>e</sup> french king by signes and tokens, for at his first comming, they within the Towne set up his ancient on the chiefe tower of the castle, and also they let out banners of the Dukes and Carles of France, and a little after the shutting of the evening, they made a great light on the top of one of the highest towers, which was towards the army of the Frenchmen, & therewithal they made a great lights and noise with trumpets and drummes: The second night they made the like, but somewhat lesse. The third night a very small fire, giving light therewith a sorrowfull voyce, signifying thereby that their strength touching the keeping of the Towne, was quite spent and done. And the same night they took in all their flags and ancientes, except their standard. At the last, the day of battell drew on, against which time, there came out of England and Dutchland, toward the helpe of King Edward 17000. fighting men, whereupon the french King betimes in the morning of the second daye of August, making fire in his tents, Bedde, whose tale the Duke of Lancaster and Earle of Northampton cutting off, they flew and took many of them.

When they of Caleis perceived this, they took their standard downe, and with great sorrow cast it from the Tower, downe into the ditch, and on the satterday following, John de Vienna their Captaine, a man very skilfull in warlike affaires, opening the gates of the Towne, came out to the King of England, sitting on a little nagge, for that hee being lame on his left side could not well goe, with an halter about his necke, with the other burgesses and souldiours following on foote, bare headed, and bare footed, hauling hal- ters about their neckes.

The Captaine comming thus before the King, offered him a warlike sworde, as unto the chiefe Prince of armes amongst all Christian Kings, and as one that had taken that Towne from the mightiest Christian King by noble chivalry. When he delivered to him the keyes of the towne. Wherby, he requesting of him pitty, asked pardon, and delivered him the sworde of peace, wherewith he should give right judgement, spare and forbear the humble and lowly, and chasten the proude hearted.

The King receiving that which was offered him, sent the Captaine with fiftene knights, and as many Burgesses into England, enriching them with large gifts. The common sort of people, and such as he found in the Towne, being somewhat refreshed with the Kings almes, he commaunded to be safe conducted to the castle of Guines.

After the taking of the towne of Caleis, the souldiers at the kings commaundement took the Spanes of Sparks and of Hop, and with great difficulty they built in their forts, setting in order where walles wanted, hoggesheads filled with stones against the enemies, whilst the walles were a building within. Immediately after the taking of Caleis, there began in those parts a generall pestilence of the Aire, comming from the east part, into many other parts of the world, whereupon it came to passe, that a great multitude of people dyed. This pestilence gave occasion that certaine Cardinals were sent on the behalfe of the french King, to craue a truce from that time, unto the feast of Saint Barnabe next following, which was agreed upon on the eight and twenty of September.

The truce being taken as aforesaid, King Edward built a Castle at Rishbank, betwixt the towne of Caleis, and the havens mouth, to the intent to keep off all the enemies force of ships from the said towne: & he made Captaine of the towne Say John Montgomery, and thence conueyng the Queen and his eldest sonne, with a great company of noble men, he took his longney-wardes England by water, and being on the Sea, he was beaten with a tempest, that he lost many of his ships, and hardly escaped himselfe, notwithstanding he came on land the fourteenth of October, and so to London.

This peace being made, it seemed through England as a new summer followed, because of the plenty of all things, for there was no want of any name, but he had some of the pyses of Cane and Calceis, or of other cities beyond the Seas, whereof the maiesties being proud, did bragge in French and trones apparell.

At the feast of Easter, James Douglas, who was taken at Durham in the warres, and brought to London with the king of Scottes, was licenced to depart home againe, swearing to the king peace and fealtie, who afterwards liuing peaceably in the Marches, and being requested by William Douglas to ride a hunting with him, was by him comming behind his back most treacherously slain.

After Easter, the king held a councell, wherein it was decreed that none of his seruants should take by any viuals of any man against his will, nor but that he payd for it ready money, upon paine to bee punished and banished the court, Richard Talbot high steward of the kings house being appointed to see execution of that proclamation.

The Earle of Arrent was raked, arreigned, and committed, for that contrary to his faith and homage sworn to the king of England, he did againe beare armes against him, and so that sad he was dytome, hanged, and quartered. To this councell came two Carles, and two clerkes sent from the Princes electors, signifying that their election was made to the king, for the dignitie of the kingdom of Armaine. These messengers the king received with due honor, but answered them, that he would not take so greete honour upon his shoulers, untill he had the crowne of France, due vnto him, in peaceable possession.

A little after Easter, there were great Justings holden at Lincoln by the Duke of Lancaster, where were present many Ladies, with the Countesse, and also certaine messengers sent from the King of Spaine, for the lady Iane daughter to the king, that should be married to their master the kings sonne, whose her husband meeting, she died of the great pestilence, so that he followed her to the graue.

The same yere R. Edward with his eldest sonne the Earle of Marwick, and the bishop of Winchester, went to Calceis, from whence the king sent the Duke of Lancaster to Poenemre, to receive in his behalfe fealtie and homage of the earle of Flanders, which thing was by the said earle performed. John Stratford Archbishop of Cantuarie deceased, vnto whom succeeded John Vifard Doctor of Law.

Where began amongst the East Indians and Tartarians a certaine pestilence, which at length waied so general, infecting the middle right of the ayre so greatly, that it bestrafed the Saracens, Turks, Syrians, Persians, & the Grecians, with a wonderfull, or rather incredible death, in so much that those peoples being exceedingly dismayd with the terror thereof, consulted amongst themselves, & thought it good to receive the Christian faith & Sacraments, for they had intelligence that the Christians which dwell on this side the Greekish sea, were not so greatly (more then common custome was) troubled with sickness and mortallitie. At length this terrible slaughter passed ouer into those Countreies which are on this side the Alpes, and from thence to the partes of France, which are called Hesperia, and so by order along into Germany and Dutchland. And the seventh yere after it began, it came into England, and first began in the townes and ports lonyng on the Sea coasts, in Dorsetshire, where, even as in other Countreies, it made the Country quite void of inhabitants, so that there were almost none left alive.

From thence it passed into Devonshire, and Somersetshire, even vnto Bristol, and raged in such sort, that the Gloucestershire-men would not suffer the Wyllow-men to haue any access vnto them, or into their Countrey by any meanes: but at length it came to Gloucester, yea and to Dors, and London, and finally it spred ouer all England, and so wasted & spoiled the people, that scarce the tenth person of all sorts was left alive: when Church-yards were not sufficient and large ynough to bury their dead in, they chose certaine fields appointed for that purpose.

Gualter Mayny, Lord of Mayny, borne in Cambray, who serued in company of Henry Duke of Lancaster in his great ad of Calceine and Guen, after this time made knight of the Garter in England, hauing a respect to the danger that might fall in tyme of this pestilence then begunne in England, if the Churches & Church-yards in London might not suffice to burie the multitude, he purchased a peece of ground called Spittle Croft (so that it belonged to the Garter and brethren of S. Bartholomewes Spittle) containing 13. acres and a rodde, without the barres of West Smithfield, & caused the same to be enclosed, and dedicated by Ralph Bishop of London, in the which place in the yere following, was buried more then fiftie thousand persons, as is affirmed by the kings Charters which I haue seene, and also by an inscription fired on a stone crosse in the same place And in memorie thereof, the same Gualter Mayny caused vpon the same ground a Chappell to be builded, & after founded the same to be an house of Charter-house Monkes, in the yere. 1371.

Also about the same time, one John Cory procured of Nicholas Wyloz of the Church of the Holy Trinitie neere vnto Aldgate, one toft of ground neere vnto East Smithfield, for the buriall of them that died, that it might be called the Church-yard of the holy Trinitie: which ground he caused to be enclosed, and dedicated by Ralph Stratford Bishop of London, in the which place King Edward the third, by consent of the said Wyloz and Conuent, founded the abbey of S. Mary of Grace in the yere 1359. placing therein an Abbot and Monke of the order of Cisterciars, which were white monks, and named the place Eastminster.

Where few noble men died, among whom departed Iohn Montgomery, his Ladie: the Lord Clifles Capitaine of Caleis died at Caleis, and was buried in the white Friars at London. Of the common people, together with Religious and Clerkes, there died an innumerable sort, for no man but God onely knew how many. Where died from the first of Januarie, to the first of July, in the Citie of London 57104 persons, besides Ecclesiasticall spendicants and Dominikes. There was buried in the Church and Church-yard of Parmouth, in one yere 7052 men and women, before which time the personage there was worth 700. markes by yere, and afterwards was scarce worth ffortie pound the yere. This note was certified to King Henry the seventh in the 22. of his reign, & the same is written on the gates of the Church of Parmouth. This great pestilence began at London about the feast of All Saints, in the yere 1348. What time this pestilence had waiked all England, the Scots greatly reioycing, mocked and swore oft times by the deathe of the Englishmen: but the word of Gods wrath, thus consumed the Scots in no lesse numbers, then it did the other. It also waiked the Welsh men, and within a while passed over into Ireland, where it destroyed a great number of English people that dwell there, but such as were right Irishmen bozne, that dwell in the hilly countries, it scarcely touched, so that few of them died thereof. This plague continued sometime in one place, sometime in another, untill the yere of our Lord 1357. the same yere for a truce of small peace to be concluded, the Bishop of London, the Earle of Northampton, the Earle of Stafford, Richard Talbot, Walter Mayny knights, sailed over the sea into France, whom the Frenchmen met peaceably, but they would not agree to a final peace, unless that Caleis were restored to them againe, which would not be graunted: and the truce which was taken for a yere was continued. But the Earle of Flanders, who would not in any case receive conditions of peace, unless the French king were quite forsaken, notwithstanding his solemne oath, not long after entered into Flanders with a great power of Frenchmen, burning & killing where ever he came: but the people of the countrey with a few Englishmen withstood him stoutly, and gaue him a fore skirmish, in the which, beside that many Frenchmen were slain, the earle himselfe was forced to fle, for the which worthie acte, many knightes were made, amongst the which was Iohn de Filbert, an English man.

In the feast of the Purification of S. Iohn, the Quene was purified at Windsor, where were solemne Iusts, and running at the tilt, at the which, David king of Scots was present, and the Earle of Cleve, the Lord Tankerville, Lord Charles de Valois, and many other strangers captives, who by the kings licence were permitted to runne also at the tilt, at the which pastime the prize of the field was adjudged to the Earle of Cleve. After in Sommer season, these strangers passed their time in hunting, in the companie of the king, and other nobles of the Realme, at Claringdon in Northshire, and in divers other forests.

Whiles the king was thus occupied, the Frenchmen notwithstanding their truce, entered the marches of Britaine, but the Countes of Sabazer, with a few men, who went out a foraging, take Thomas Dagworth knight, a man of great experience, who but with a few men, to wete sixteen armed men, entered the wood against these robbers, & invaded them, slaying to the number of thre hundred, but at the length being stricken five times in the face with quarels, all his men being first slain, he himself was thrust through the body with a sword.

About the feast of Saint Michael, more then 120. persons of Scotland, and Holland, comming through Flaunders into London, sometime in the Church of Saint Paul, sometime in other places of the citie, twice in the day, in the sight of all people, from the loynes, unto the heeles, covered in linnen cloth, all the rest of their bodies being bare, hauing on their heads hats with red crosses before and behind, every one in their right hands a whip with thre cordes, each cord hauing a knot in the midst, beate themselves on their bare bloudie bodies going in procession, some of them singing in their owne language, all the other answering them.

The same yere the Earle of Lancaster, the Barons of Stafford & Grey, Stocke, also the helres of the Lords Percy and Nevell, and the Lord Furniwall with Bartholomew Burwash, and divers other, about the feast of all Saints, passed over sea into Calcoigne, to delay the furious voyage that Iohn de Valois came to the French king had made in that Dukedome, greatly spoiling and waiking the same. Also the kings Counsell ordained, that none of the kings officers during the time of their offices, should receive any fee, gift, or reward of any man, except it were of the king himselfe.

Also this yere in the Countie of Dorset, nigh unto a towne called Chipplingdon, there was found a serpent hauing two heads, and faces like two men, one being shaped after the new tye of that time: another after the manner of the old attire, and it had great wings, after the manner of a flindermouse of Bat. Thomas Bradwarden Archbishoppe of Canturburie deceased, Simon Ilip succeeded.

About the feast of All Saints, king Edward being accompanied with the Carles of Lancaster, and Suffolke, and divers others, passed over the seas into Flaunders, and thence leading his armie towards France, the Frenchmen made meanes unto him to renewe their truce: and now the Earle of Flaunders submitted himselfe the third time unto the kings mercie & dominion. When the king returning toward England, to solemnizate the translation of Saint Thomas the Confessor and Bishop of Hereford, did with his presence and nobilitie honor the same, to the great experiences of Nicholas Cantulupus Baron, and cousin to the said Saint Thomas: during which feast and solemnitie, it was signified to the king by the Secretaries of Emericus of Padua, who was a seed man to the king of England, that on the fourteenth day of Januarie next comming, Geoffrey Charney knight, and many other French men should be received into Caleis, unto whom the said towne was sold by the said Emericus: but the towne being presently rescued by king Edward, the said Emericus of Padua with other Venetians continued in Caleis, being maintained there at the costs of the French king against the king of England, when he besieged it, who also after the yielding of it to the king of England, being being pardoned both of life and limme, from thenceforth continued and dwelt as a feed man of the kings in the said Towne for the defence thereof. At that time the said Geoffrey was Lord of Gascon, a man more skillful in warfare than any French man in France. Wherefore he was greatly esteemed, even to the time of his death. His craftie deviser inducured by his letters, wherein he made promise of large gifts of gold, and other sophistical persuasions, quite to subvert the faith and loyaltie of the said Emericus.

Finally, this craftie deviser agreed with this false man, that for twentie thousand French crownes he should let in the French men to the Towne, and as much as lay in him, deliver by to the French men both the Towne and Castle. This bargain being most traitorously made, by oath and breaking of the Sacrament betwixt them, yet at this notwithstanding, he wrote letters unto the king touching the state of the whole matter, but very privately, how that he was ready to shew friendship to the French men, yet meaning to make frustrate their purpose, whereby they should be convicted of breaking the true, and also many of them should be taken to bee ransomed, wherefore King Edward speedily passed over, being accompanied with his eldest sonne, the Earle of March, and a few other, comming before the time appointed for the yeelding of the Towne, certaine daies. Therefore being come to Calais, hee lade certaine men of armes within the Mantles which were betwixt the outer gate and the inner part of the Castle, building a thinne and slender Wall before them newly set up, not made of plaister, but of counterfaste matter, which layned to the other Wall, craftily devised and made like the olde woocke, so that no man would iudge that any were enclosed therein.

Also hee caused the mainepostes of the drawe brydge to bee sawed almost in sunder, yet in such sorte, that armed horse-men might ride over it: and for the purpose he had a great stone, which was laid up in a hole made in form of an arch, being in the forefront of the Towler hanging over the Brydge, in which hee appointed a faithfull Souldier should bee in due time to throwe downe the said stone upon the Brydge, that with the fall thereof, the Brydge being halfe cut in two, should bee broken in sunder, and so that hole where the stone was laid, should bee wrought in such sort, that bee within should perceue through the hole how many did enter in: some were made privie to this practise, neither did many know of the kings presence or of the Wynde of Wales, who when they had wrought this feate, secretly conveyed themselves into the Towne.

The day before the time of deliverte of this Towne, Geoffrey Cheneysent fiftene of his faithfulllest men with the greater parte of the golde which was to bee payde, who should also trie the faith of Emericus, and the order of the Castle, who searching everie where, in everie Tower and corner which they could finde open, could perceue nothing contrarie to their liking, whereupon on the next day in the morning, they set by the French Kings standerde in the highest Tower of the Castle, and the ancients also of Geoffrey, and of other Lords upon other Towers and places. When the people of the Towne who kept common watch and ward, not knowing of this secreete devise, were greatly terrified therewith, in so much that they taking weapon in hand, began to give a charge against the Castell: by and by the French men who had entred the day before, took Thomas Kingstone, then standing away, quite ignorant of that which was devised, and forcibly they set him in the stocks. When certaine of them being sent out to the French men their companions and masters, who lay without in ambushes they towed them the ancients and standard set by, and all to be well, even as they would have it, hastening them so; ward to come to the defence of the Castle, against the townes men: wherefore they rising from their lurking places, advanced themselves in pride and bragging, and came by heapes in at the gates of the Castle. The townes men perceiving this, had much ado to forbear their hands from them, had not their chiefe leaders with; a wen them from it, least some danger should have happened to them that lay hid: by and by those that lay hid closed under the arches of the walles, prepared themselves to bryake out upon their enemies. In like sort also be that with the great stone was shut up in the hole, after that he saw so many entred in, esteeming that his fellows were sufficient to overthrow them, with that great stone put to his cuffe he bryake the draw brydge, by the which the enemies had entred in, but being once in could not goe that way out againe: when the stone was thus downe, and had discharged the thing for the which it was laid by, and the French men deceived by that practise, they were enclosed safe enough. At the noyse of this stone and the brydge that bryake, these armed men of whom before I spake, breaking downe their counterfaste wall, besyde the which all the deceit was hid, they presently set themselves in order to invade the French men, bitten to a bitter breakfast. The conflict was sharpe for a good season, but at the length the enemies being overcome, yielded themselves to the pleasure of the Conquerours. They which were without and had not entred, as soone as they perceived their companions to be deceived, fled, after whom the king with scarce fiftene men of armes and as many archers followed apace, the rannall wayes not knowing what companie would follow them: many in this chase were wearied, and many more slaine, and in a small time the king overcame dangerous and great labours: but at length, when it was understood by them that fled, how few there were that chased them, fourscore armed men turned them against the king. I dare not ascribe this boldnesse of the king in chasing of his enemies, to his wisdom, but onely to the stoutnesse of this minde, the which is well knowne through Gods grace to be brought to good effect by his meanes, though the danger were never so great: for when hee perceived that the French men had turned themselves to withstand him, hee erst alway the scabers of his sword, and comforting his men about him, setting them in good order, exhorted them to play the men lustily. The Archers being placed in the March against the sides of the enemies stand on by the bryke, which were compassed about with gnagge-myes and soggie places, that neither horse-men nor foot-men might approach them, but they should rather be downed in made then come nere to hurt them: these also did the king comfort, saying to them (doe well you Archers) play the men lustily, and know that I am Edward of Windsor. When the presence of the King, and necessity the matter, stirred up their hearts to doe well: the Archers uncovering their heads, stripping by their sleeves, bent themselves to bestow their arrowes in such sorte that they might not be lost: and as the French men drew to wards them, they saluted them after with their arrowes. The armed men of both parts stood in order to fight upon a long and narrow way, the breadth whereof was not able to receive scarce twentie men of armes in a front, having on both sides thereof the sparish, in the which the Archers were placed, who galed and wounded their enemies on the sides, fleeing as thicke as haile. The King and his men befoze with the Archers on the side, flew and took a great many: and many of them stood stoutly to it, till at the length by the coming of the Prince of Wales, the French were put to flight: after a long chase in pursuing the enemies, they returning backe againe to Caleis, numbered those which were fled, as well as those which were taken, and they found, that for the taking of the Castle (as the prisoners reported) there came a thousand men of armes, and six hundred armed men, but they which serned, were above thre thousand: among them which were taken, was Geoffrey Charney and his sonne, Edward de Renty, Robert Danquile, Otto de Gulo, the Baron of Sparringham, Baldyna Saylly, Henry de Pres, Garinus Baylofe, Peter Renel, Peter Dargemole, Eustace de Riplemount and many other, Lordes, Knights, and Barons, who were chased and rane away with their vassals, as the Lord de Mountmarice, also Laundas, who married the Lady Saint Paul Countesse of Wembroke in England, also the Lord Fenas, the Lord Planches and another Eustace de Replemount. There were slaine in the skirmish the Lord Henry de Boys, the Lord Archibalde, and many others, whose names the Conquerours were not able to certifie. Thus by pollice and devised treason the authors thereof came to death and destruction: neither Eustachius himselfe escaped scotfree from the snares, for he within a while after being taken by the Frenchmen, was burned alive with a hot yron, and degraded from the order of Knighthood by the cutting off of his heeles, & depviling of his tongue by abscision: after ward, he was hanged up, and last of all beheaded and quartered; receiving iust punishment for his treason and false swearing.

This yere the Lord Furniall giving a rashe enterpryse upon his enemies, was taken prisoner in Gascoigne. Not long after King Edward prepared to make a voyage into France, but the Earle of Lancaster, returning out of Gascoigne, signified that there was a truce taken by him, by reason whereof of the passage prepared by the King was laid aside.

This yere on Saint Georges day, the King held a great and solemne feast at his Castle of Windsor, where he had augmented 8 Chappell which Henry 6 first and other his progenitors Kings of England had before created of eight Chanons, he added to those eight Chanons, a Deane, and sixtene Chanons more, and 24 poore and impotent Knights, with other ministers and servants as appeareth in his Charter, Dated the two and twentieth of his reigne.

Besides the King, there were other also that were Contributors to the foundation of this Colledge, as followeth.

All these together with the King were clothed in gownes of Russel, powdered with garters blew, wearing the like garters also on their right legges, and mantels of blew, with scutcheons of S. George. In this sort of apparell they being bare-headed, heard Masse, which was celebrated by Simon Islip Archbishop of Canterbury, & the Bishops of Winchester and Excester, and afterwards they went to the feast, setting themselves orderly at the table, for the honor of the feast, which they named to be of S. George the martyr, and the choosing of the Knights of the Garter.

In the Sommer following, barancie rising betwene the states of England and Spaine, the Spaniards beset the Wyptaine Sea, with 44. great ships of warre, with the which they sunk ten English ships coming from Gascoigne towards England, after they had taken and spoiled them, and thus their former injuries being reuenged, they entred into Saluce in Flanders.

King Edward vnderstanding hereof, furnished his naule of fiftie shippes and Pinaces, for calling to mete with the Spaniards in their return, having in his company the Prince of Wales, the Earles of Lancaster, Northampton, Warwick, Salisbury, Arundale, Huntington, Gloucester, and other Barons and Knights with their seruants and archers, and vpon the feast of the decollation of S. Iohn, about Cuenlong time, the Spanies mette at Wincheles, where the great Spanish bevels surmounting our ships and forsses, like as castles to cotages, sharply assailed our men, & stones and quarels flying from the tops, soze and cruelly wounded our men, who no lesse buile to fight alone with lance and sword, and with the foreward manfully defend themselves, at length our Archers peared their Arbalisters with a further retch then they could strike againe, and thereby compelled them to forsake their place, and caused other fighting from the batres to made themselves with tables of the ships, and compelled them that they wold fones from the toppes, so to hide thing that they durst not shew their heads, but tumble downe: then our men entering the Spanish vessels with swords and halberds, kill those they mette, withins while make boorde the vessels, and furnish them with English men, untill they beeing beset with darknesse of the night, could not discerne the 27. yet remaying untaken: our men cast anker, Tying of the hoped battell, supposing nothing finished, whilst any thing remained undone, dressing the wounded, throwing the miserable Spaniards into the Sea, refreshing themselves with victuals and slepe, yet committing the vigilant watch to the armed band. The night overpassed, the English men prepared (but in daime) to a new battell, but when the sunne began to appeare, they biewing the seas, could perceiue no signe of resistance, for 27. ships flying away by night, left 17. spoiled in the cucking, to the Kings pleasure, but against their will.

The King returned into England with victorie and triumph, the King preferred there 80. noble ymages to the order of knight hood, greatly bewapling the loss of one, to wit, Sir Richard Goldesborough Knight.

This yere Philip de Valoys French King, deceased, and his eldest sonne John was crowned.

Two hyed souldiers of the King of Armenia, came into England, into the presence of the King, where they shewed the letters of the aforesaid King of Armenia, wherein it was signified that the one of them, to wit, John de Vilcount, a man bozne in Cyprus, had slanderously charged the other, that is Thomas de la March, a French man bozne, and bastard sonne to Philip late King of France, saying that the said Thomas should haue receiued of the Turkes a certaine somme of gold, for the betraying the armie of the Christians onto the Emperour of the Turkes: and for the proue of this slander, this John challenged a combate with the said Thomas, to be tried by the iudgement of Edward King of England, and that by him (as by a most worthy Wyne,) all this should be ended. For this therefore were these two worthy souldiers appointed to fight, which they perfourmed within the lisses of the Kings palace at Westminster, on Spynay next following after the feast of Saint Michael, where Thomas, in declaration of his innocencie, in that he was accused of, overcame his enemy, but yet killed him not, for he could not, because he was not able to wounde him being so armed, with any kinde of piercing weapon, except it were in his face, which was bare. For after that they had runne at the wille, and fought on fote, as they were striding together on the ground, with certayne piches both short and sharpe, then called Gadlings, being closed in the topes of his right gauntlet, the said Thomas stroke the said John in the face, and soze wounded him: but on the other side John had no such short kinde of weapon, wherewith he might hurt Thomas face, and therefore cryed out aloude most horribly, whereupon by the Kings commaundement the Combate was ended, and the victorie adiudged to Thomas, who gaue the said John, being thus overcome, to the Prince of Wales for a Captiue, and offered vnto his owne armour to Saint George, in Saint Pauls Church at London, with great deuotion. These matters being thus finished, the Cyprus man is manumitted and set at libertie as a free man againe. And Thomas thinking boldly to goe into the presence of his brother the French King, toke his Iourney thither, and at his coming, found the said King and the Nobilitie of France, greatly offended, and in indignation against him, for that he agreed that the combate should be tried before the King of England. Wherefore Thomas thinking secretly with himselfe how to winne the false friendship of his brother, being desirous to shew that therein he had done well, among all other things he greatly praised the nobilitie of Edward and his worthie fame spread ouer all the world, and also the iustice which he vsed in iudging, not accepting the person of the man of Cyprus, (yea though hee loued the king himselfe very well) neither suffered him to be preferred before me, which am a Frenchman, and brother, and friend to thy my Lord King of France, Iudge ouer the said King Edward my aduersarie. Also the Earle of Cleue highly praised the King of England, for that he had receiued great comfort and commoditie at his hands during the time of his Captiuitie in England, shewing also how farre that good King had banished enuie and hatred from his heart, who at a time of iusting, being in the field at that exercise, and the King also, was commaunded by the King himselfe to beare away the pryce and pycke from them all. These commendations did the French King enuie at, and for indignation, hee most wickedly commaunded the letters forth of those prayes to be beheaded. And for to colour the matter the better, hee sayned that the Earle vsed too much familiaritie with the Quene his wife, and that his brother was guiltie of treason against the king of France, because he committed his cause and the combat to be thus tried by the iudgement of the King of England. After hee had thus murdered his brother, hee tormented his wife to death by famine, who was daughter of the noble king of Boheme, lately slain in battle by Geoffrey.

William Edington Bishop of Winchester, and treasurer of England, a wise man: but losing the Kings commoditie, more then the wealth of the realme and common people, caused a new coyne called a Groate, and halfe Groat to be coyned, but these were of lesse waight then the pence, called Casserlings, by reason whereof victuals and merchandise became the dearer thow to the whole realme.

After the Statutes of the Purification of our Lady, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, Henry Earle of Lancaster was created Earle of Lincoln, Leicester, Derby, Glosinount and Ferrers, and Duke of Lancaster, unto whom also was giuen great priuiledges, such as neuer any Earle had before his time. Also Lionel of Antwerpe the Kings sonne is made Earle of Ulster in Ireland, John of Gaunt his brother is made Earle of Richmond, and Ralph Baron of Stafford, is made Earle of Stafford. John Mautmours, one of the murderers of Edward the second, was this yere restored to his lands.

In the last following Walker de Maine, and Robert Herk Capitaine of Calais, rode into France, making great prayes and doing great damage, brought away great trove of beasts, cheape, and swine, so that at Calais a fat Colwe was scarcely scarcely sold for fifteen pence sterling. About Easter the Duke of Lancaster departing from Calais marched along the Sea coasts of Artops, and Picardie, burnt the suburbs of Bulloigne, but assaulting the Towne he prevailed not, for that onely the ladders were too short. Wherefore he wasted the Cities of Artois, and the haven, also the townes of Fauconbridge and Staples, and in the same havens he burnt about 120. ships of divers moulds. After this burning the champion countrey, he rode unto Saint Omers, and winning by force many fortresses, with a great pray and many prisoners he returned to Calais. About the feast of Saint George things prospered well in Calais, for the Marshall of France, with a great number of armed men spoiled the countrey about Saint Wangel, where Edmond Rose a Norfolk man was Capitaine, who with the garrison, valiantly encountered the enemies, slew many of them, and took the said Marshall and many other Nobles of France, chasing above 400. Knights.

The same yere the Spanish Ships by a treatie of peace came into England, where the last yere they were restrained, but now a truce was taken for twentie yeres, betwixt England and Spaine, and a truce betwixt England and Fraunce for one yere, which the Frenchmen brake, by reason of taking the Castle of Guines, as in the next yere shall be shewed.

About this season the olde coine of gold was changed into a new, the olde Noble was worth much above the fared rate of the new, and therefore the Merchants bought the olde and conveyed them out of the Realme, to the great losse of the king and kingdome, to the which there was a remede provided, by changing of the stampe.

About the beginning of Januarie, the Frenchmen being occupied about the repaying of the walles of Guines towne, being asofore that time destroyed by the Englishmen, some men of armes of Calais understanding their doings, devised how they might overthrow the worke, in this sort. There was an Archer named John Dancaster, in prison in the castle of Guines, before that time taken, who not having wherewith to pay his ransome, was let loose, with condition that he should worke there among the Frenchmen. This fellow charged to lye with a laundress, a strumpet, and learned of her where beyond the principall ditch, from the bottome of the ditch, there was a wall made of two foote broad, stretching from the rampiers, to the bylme of the ditch within forth, so that being covered with water it could not be seen, but not so low, as that a man going aloft thereon, should not be wet past the knees, it being made for the use of ffishers: and therefore in the middle it was discontinued for the space of two foote: and so the Archer (his Harlot helving it to him) measured the height of the Wall with a threde. These things thus knowne, one day slipping downe from the Wall, he passed the ditch by that hidden Wall, and lying hidde in the Marsh till Evening, came in the night nere unto Calais, where tarrying for the cleare day, he then went into the Towne (for else he might not:) here he instructed them that were gredie of pray and to scale the castle, how they might enter the same: they caused ladders to be made to the length by the Archer appointed. Whittle men conspiring

together, clothed themselves in black armour without any brightnesse, went to the Castle by the guiding of the said John Dancaster, and climbing the wall with their ladders, they slew the watchmen, and therein they had long headlong beside the Wall: after this, in the Hall they slew many whom the found unarmed, playing at the Chess and Hazard. Then they brake into the Chambers and Turrets upon the Ladies and Knights that lay there asleepe, and so were made masters of all that was within: and slutting all their prisoners into a strong chamber, being bereft of all their armour, they took out the English men that had been taken the yere before and there kept in prison, and after they had relieved them well with meate and drinke, they made them guardens over them that had them in custodie: so they won all the Fortresses of the Castle, unknown to them that were in the Towne, (appointed to oversee the repaying of the broken walles) what had happened to them within the Castle. In the morning they commanded the workemen in the towne to cease from their workes, who thereupon perceiving that the Castle was wonne, straight wales fled, and the new Castilians, suffered the Ladies to depart on horsebacke, with their apparell, willings, and ornaments, where they ought to hold their seas: and the same day there came from Calais to their ayde such persons as they sent for, by whose ayde they kept the Castle: and about thre of the clocke there came two knights, sent from the Earle of Guines, who demanding a truce, willed to know of them that were thus entered the Castle, who they were, to whom they belonged, and by whose authority they kept the Castle so taken in the time of truce, whereunto they answered; that being intruded, they would not declare to any man their purpose, till they had tryed a longer possession: and therefore on S. Matthees day, the Abbot (the King being busie in Parliament,) to the Frenchmen being sent from the sayd Earle of Guines, declared, how in prejudice of the truce, the sayd Castle was taken, and therefore by right of mutuall faith it ought to be restored unto them. The king answered, that without his knowledge that enterprise was made, and therefore he gave commandment to his subieds, that none of them should deteine the castle of Guines, but deliver it unto the lawfull Lords thereof. The messengers being returned home, and reporting what they had done, the Earle of Guines cometh to the Castle, demanding of them within, as at other times, in whose name they kept it. Who constantly affirming that they kept it in the name of John Dancaster, he required to know if the same John were the King of Englands liegeman, or would obey him: who answering that he knew not what messengers had been in England: the Earle offered for the Castle, besides all the treasure found in it, many thousands of Crownes, or possessions for exchange, and a perpetual peace with the King of Fraunce. To this they answered, that before the taking of that Castle they were Englishmen by nation, but by their demerits banished for the peace of the King of England, wherefore the place which they thus held, they would willingly sell or exchange, but to none lower then to their naturall King of England, to whom they said, they would sell their Castle, to obtaine their peace: but if he would not buy it, then they would cell it to the King of France, or to whomsoever would give most for it.

The Carle being thus shifted off from them, the king of England bought it in deede, and so had that place which he greatly desired. The Fortresse was wont to stop by the passage into the higher Countrey, giuing to some great suerty from the forrangers, that were to issue forth of Caleis. The Countess of fraunce therfore wishing to haue that Castle againe, or to builde another of like vtilitie, for the defence of the Countrey thereabouts, they sent for Geoffrey Charney lately redeemed out of English Captiuitie, with authoritie to build and fortifie as followeth.

To them that traualle from Guisnes to Caleis there was a place on the left hand strong, but decayed, hauing a Church, in which certaine priens were resident, and it was called Lalbassie: this place was so nere to Guisnes, that the Englishmen standing without the gate of their Fortresse might shote to it. This Monasterie of priens might easily be made defensible, for it had high walles like a Castle, and a high towre, and very large for a skaple, and being situate in a marshy ground, it might with small labour be compassed with a ditch. This place the Englishmen had spared for deuotion sake, but till that the foresaid Geoffrey, in breach of truce, with a mightie powre besieged Guisnes, and removed the priens from the Church, making a Castle of the Church, and fencing the walles with rampire and ditch: and this was about Pentecost, in which season the waters not impeaching him, his people might worke in the parish. They with in the Castle therfore being besieged, were vnneth able to come aboade with their boates by the ditches that were full of water, and by the parish impassable and also full of water, neither they of Caleis could victuall them by any manner of meane, by reason of the sieg, and warding that was kept at Lalbassie. They that were thus besieged, oft times sallied out and fought with them of Lalbassie, but due very few, sometime with arrows, and sometime with other weapons: at length, vpon a day appointed, the Calissians, with them of Wyne and Sparkes on the one part, and they within Guisnes on the other, met, set on their enemies, slew many, chased many, and finally burnt by Lalbassie, and dismantling the walles, made all plaine with the ground.

This yeare the Duke of Lancaster going into Spynce, by the aduice and ordinance of the king, his daughter was espoused in England to William Duke of Zeland, eldest sonne to Lewis Duke of Bawire, that intruded vpon the Romaine Emprere.

About the fiftenth of August, Walter Bentley Capitaine, Robert Knolles, and other, in the Marches of Brytaine, valiantly encountered their enemies, where in a fight doubtfull for a good while, were slaine the principall Marshall of France, also the Lord of Quintin, of Curtmoke, of Richmond, of Mount Albion, of Leguel, of Launey, of Pontbech, of Vile Chassel de la March, & other knights, in number 140. and Bachelers, to the number of 500. whose countenances were bought away: the number of commons were not counted. There were taken the Lord of Bulebeke, sonne of the Marshall Beuram, also Tristram de Maleis, the Lord of Spaletret, the Viscount of Cy

Walter Geoffrey de Graues, William de la Vall, Charles Darchefill, John de Bruse, and other knights, with Bachelers, about 130. This armie of the French men, vnder the conduct of the said Marshall, of purpose deuised by him, was so beset on the backe halfe, with the strepenesse of a Mountaine, that the they could not, to the end that hope of flight being taken frō them their courage to fight might the more increase. There were many of those knights surnamed of the Starre, vno in their profession had conspired neuer to turne their seare, full backs vpon their enemies, of which number of knights, there were among them slaine and taken, numbez 45. ffrom that dangerous encounter few escaped unhurt, and among other, the foresaid Walter Bentley Capitaine was so wounded, who commanded thirtie archers to be condemned, for that in the greatest heate of the fight they fled.

The Carle of Stafford also entred into Calcoigne, where encountering with a great armie of the French men that were issued forth of the fortresse of Sagent, he discomfited, toke, and chased them: there was taken that valiant knight Bruse Gaude, and seuen knights of the Starre. Shortly after, died John Dediascles, and Thomas Wale, knights of great valour.

The same yeare, it being heard that Pirats troubled the Seas, there were seuen ships of warre ordeyned, certaine priences attending vpon them: ouer the which were admirals, Thomas Cooke, and Richard Tottelham knights, who scoured the seas about the coast of Picardy and Normandy, but before the feast of S. George, they returned as they wished.

Whilist these things were a doing by Sea and Land, Otto sonne to the Duke of Brunswike, the French Kings sed man, sent letters to the Duke of Lancaster, being returned out of Spynce, by p̄renour wherof he accused him, affirming that as he returned out of Spynce by Colein, he maliciously informed the Coloners, that the said Otto went about by stealth to haue taken him prisoner, and to haue presented him to the French king, adding herunto, that because he neuer ment any such taking of him, he was ready in declaration of his god name, by a singular combat onely in the French Kings Court, to proue the Duke of Lancaster a lyer touching the said article. The letters were not sealed, and therfore, least it might haue ben thought folly to haue given credite to the letter, deliuered by a seruant, the Duke sent vnto Otto two knights to learne the cause of the chalenge, and to demand thereof his letters patents, sealed with his seale of armes, which knights accomplishing the effect of their tourney, and returning with spede, the Duke sent to the French king for a safe conduct for himselfe and his men, and with much adoe obtaining it, he went to Paris, where in the lills, in presence of the French king, the king of Nauarre, and the Duke of Burgoyne, and many p̄eres, and other of the Realme of fraunce, he mounted on his steed in seemely wise, ready in all signes, without default, to trie the combat, and so staid till his adversary was ready, and the voyce of the Herauld and Cantor to be had by their common oath, for the assurance of his word, and to obey the Law. On the contrary part, the said Otto scarcely was set on his horse, and was not able decently to set on his helmet, nor to weilde his speare (or else he sayned) whose unbleness being perceived by the French king, the king of France; and other, the king took the quarrell into his hands, whereupon Ous was commaunded first to depart the lists, and so went his way, but the Duke abode still within them. After this, by commaundement of the French king, Ous swore that he should neuer after that day appeach the Duke of Lancaster of that article: and so from thence the Duke returned home by Zeland.

This yere, the dearth of Coyne by them of Ireland, and the Irish men that brought in coine to sell onto diuers Hauens of the Realme, was allwaged, to the great reliefe of the people.

S. Stephens Chappell at Westminster.
Ex Carta.

King Edward altered the Chappell, which his progenitors before had founded of Saint Stephen at Westminster, into a college of twelve secular Chansons, twelve Clerics, and other ministers accordingly, and endued it with revenues, to the summe of five hundred pound by yere.

Staples of wool to be kept in England.

The moztow after Saint Machies day began a Parliament, wherein it was ordeined that the Staple of wool before kept in Flaunders at Bruges, should from thenceforth be holden in diuers parts of England, Wales and Ireland, as at Newcastle, Pojke, Lincoln, Canterburie, Ro:wich, Westminster, Chichester, Winchester, Excester, Wiltow, and Carmarven.

The Earle of Northampton went into Scotland with a great compaign of armed men and archers, where he rode through the marches, and enforced the castle of Loghinaban, and other fortreddes to yield, and took the Scots that were laid in ambushes. He also held a treatie of peace with the Scots, who gladly would haue redeemed their king, and made a perpetuall peace with the Englishmen, but yet so as the king of Scots should not hold his land of the king of England.

Treatie of peace.

Innocent the first, for the desire of peace, sent the Cardinall of Bononie to Calcis, to heare the treatie of the final peace betwixt the kingdomes of England and Fraunce, to whom repaired the Counsellors of both Realmes, with full authoritie to treat and constitute the conditions of the same peace, and at length they agreed upon this point, that the king of England should resigne all his right that he had to the Realme of Fraunce, and remit it to the French King, and should haue therfore the Dutchie of Aquitaine, and the Countie of Artops and Guines, for him and his successors king of England, with out that he should hold the same of the French Kings in any manner of vills.

Ann. reg. 28

To these conditions the King of England gaue his consent, and for the aduance of the covenants, Embassadors are sent to the Sea of Rome from eyther Realme. On the King of Englands behalfe went the Bishoppe of Ro:wich, the Duke of Lancaster, the Earle of Arundell, and other Knights, who going to Auinion, there came to them the Archbishoppe of Koban, the Duke of Burgoine, Geoffrey Charney, and other of the French Kings

Counsell

Counsell: all these were receiued in great honour: many Cardinals and Bishops met the duke of Lancaster, who brought him for the space of two miles into Auinion, and to the Popes pallace: at length in the Consistorie of the Pope, he with the Cardinales and Embassadors being present, the causes of their message was declared, and the Embassadors of England requested to haue the covenants confirmed, which had been concluded at Calcis: to whom the Frenchmen answered, that gladly they would haue peace, but touching Aquitaine, and the foresaid Countie, as they said, the French King could not, nor they might giue their assents that the same should be alienated from the entire body of the kingdome, the which, as well the King as they had taken an oth to maintaine, but yet they could be contented that the profitable dominion of the said Dutchy and Countie should be deliuered, and come to the King of England, as his Auncessors had Aquitaine, but so yet as the regalitie of the Crowne of France should ever be reserved. The Englishmen requested that these said dominions should be absolutely, and without any condition reseyed to the King: answered also was made to the reason of the Frenchmen, touching the oth of their King and themselves, whereby they were bound to conserue the integritie of the honour of their kingdome, to wit, that the Pope for the benefite of peace might assolve them from the said oth, and this as to certaine articles permitted, it should be very well done: but yet nothing was done that might be of force to the furthering of the peace. And so the Embassadors without effect returned home, the Bishop of Ro:wich excepted, that deceased, and was buried there, to whom succeeded Thomas Percy.

The King of France through a byawle raised, Aue Charles de Spaine, Marshall of France, whereupon to auoide the displeasure and punishment of the French King, he fled into his owne Countrey, sending his uncle unto the Duke of Lancaster with letters humbly beseeching him that he would come into Normandie to his aide and defence, and to receiue an oth of fidelitie and amitie of him against al men. The Duke therfore getting licence of the King, assembled together a great nauie at Southampton, where when the Duke was ready to haue made saille, his knights that he had sent into Normandy, came backe to vieto the truth of this busines, by which it was notified to the Duke, that the said King of France his cousin was reconciled to the King, and so the Dukes voyage was stayed.

A great dissention fell in Oxford, betwixt a Scholler and a Manner, for square of wine, so that the Scholler potwoted the wine on the Manners head, and brake his head with the pot, by reason whereof, a great cruellie was made betwixt the Schollers of the Vniuersitie, and the lay men of the towne, in the which, many lay men were wounded, and about twenty slain: These troubles continued the space of two daies, and then the religious men of the towne labouring to make peace, the lay men pursued a Scholler, who had been slain, yet that day the tumult was appeased, but on the next day the people of the villages about Wyke, being confederate with the lay men of the town came with great force, and erected a blacke banner, whereupon the Schollers fledde to their Colledges, but the Lay men breaking by the doores, slew many of them, and twelue them into their pyntes: they cut and rent their bookes, and bare away what they liked. By this meane the vniuersitie was dissolved, the Schollers (sauing of Sperton Colledge) went vnto their friends, and so continued moze then a yere. Many, both Schollers and Lay men were twited by the kings Justices, amongst the which, foure Burgeses that had ben Mayors of Wyke, were sent vnto the Towre of London.

Vniuersitie of Wyke restored.

Ex Record.

King Edward sailed into France.

About the twentieth of November, King Edward held a Parliament at Westminster, in the which was granted towards the recouerie of his title in France, fiftie shillings of euery sacke of Woll to be transported ouer the sea for the space of five yeres then next following, by meanes whereof, the King might daily dispend during the said five yeres, moze then one thousand marks sterling, for by the common opinion, there were moze then an hundred thousand sackes of Woll yerely into foraine landes transported, so that during those five yeres, the said grant extended to 150000. pounds sterling.

King Edward held a great Iussing at Woodstocke, for honour of the Quene, who was then married of her sonne Thomas.

After Easter, in a Parliament at Westminster, the king toke the quarrell of Wyke into his hands, and sauing euery mans right, he forgane the schollers all the whole trespass, so that in the summer following, the vniuersitie began againe to flourish, and the king came to the Chancellour of Wyke the quely view of the assise of bread, ale, and wine, and al other victuals, ercluding the Mayor viceroy from that office. The communalitie of the Towne gave to the vniuersitie two hundred and fiftie pounds for amends, sauing vnto them neuertheless the actions which they had vnto euery singuler person of the Towne.

In this Parliament, the proccesse of the iudgement made against Roger Mortimer Earle of March, was reuoked, deemed erroneous & false, so that the young Roger Mortimer, sonne to Edmond Mortimer, sonne and heire to Roger Mortimer, was restored to the title and possessions of the Earledome of March, as cousin and heire to his grandfather.

King Edward being about Sandwich, on his iourney towards France, and the Prince of Wales at Sutton in Devonshire, on his voyage towards Aquitaine, looking for a prosperous wind, by the space of forty dayes or moze, all things else being ready, the french king had his armies diuided in many places about in the bayens of Normandy, and other parts, to impeach the landing of the King and Prince, and so long they lay there, that the frenchmen with their hired condourers did soluly waste their owne Countrey, and consumed so many thousands of Crownes out of the french Kinges coffers vaine, that in the ende he being needie, payde not his people, and so he was forsaken of them, that when King Edward was in France, the french king had not men to encounter him, but fledde before him, as he followed, burning his owne Townes, and destroying his castles, that the king should find neither harborough nor meate.

After the moneth of August, the king of England, and the Duke of Lancaster, with seven thousand armed men, and their retinue, entered France, and by the space of nine daies iourney, as they went, waisting all by fire that came in their way, and returning to Calais, the king heard that the Scots entred by health, and had taken the Town of Warwicke, the Baron of Gray, Locke being in the army with the king, to whom the chary of that Towne had ben committed, whereupon the king hasted vnto Warwicke, and with fiftene daies recovered the Towne againe, being deliuered vnto him, life and liberty to depart being giuen vnto them that were found therein.

Warrwicke taken by the Englishmen.

After this he passed through Scotland vnto the Scottish sea, but because victuals failed for his army, the king giuing them licence, they all returned towards England. There followed on the taile of the army, by the space of twelue miles, Robert Herle, Almerike de Saint Edmond, Robert de Hildesley, and other, whom the Scots in the night season found asleep and at rest, doubting nothing of any misadventure, wherfore they gaue a cruell assault vpon them, with an hideous noise and cry, where, after long resistance, Robert de Hildesley, and Iohn Brancester knights were taken prisoners, Robert Herle and Almericke hauing much adoe to escape, so the said knights perceluing the Scots to be too strong for them, thought with themselves, that their Lozges being Barons, of whom they held in fee, would redeme them, and so they withdrauing, deliuered them from the Scots captiuitie.

Henry Duke of Lancaster being appointed chiefe Admirall of the English flote, landed it at Hogges about the feast of Saint Bartholomew, and from thence rode towards Poymandie, being accompanied with Philip, brother to the king of Nauarre, who desired aide of the said Duke, and requested him to come to helpe him. At this season, the french king hauing the king of Nauarre, Geoffrey Harecourt, and diuers other noble men in great suspicion, touching the Realme and Kingdome, hidde them all to a seale, where he toke the said king of Nauarre, and cast him in prison, and murdered the rest of the noble men, sauing, Geoffrey Harecourt, whom he caused to be beheaded with an are.

The king of Nauarre being thus imprisoned, his brother Philip sealed many Castles and holds into his hands which were in Poymandie and there about, strongly fortifying them with men and victuals, through the help of the Duke of Lancaster, being manned as well with Englishmen, as with the men of the same Countrey, to withstand the frenchmen.

The same time when the king passed ouer to Wales and France, his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, hauing with him the Earles of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisburie, and Wyke, toke shipping in the beginning of October at Sutton Haven in Devonshire, and luckily sailed, and landed at Burdeaur, where he was honourably receiued by the Bishop and Clergy being accompanied with all the common people in the first Sunday of that moneth: The Monday following, the Prince going out, lodged two miles from Burdeaur, at the Castell of Gironn. On the next day, he passed through a streight way, and so through the middle of the towne of Loogan, sometimes walled, but now defaced: and so passing on a long journey, he lost many horses, and came at length to the strong Castell of Wandzet. On Thursday he came to the Citie of Belas, having in it a Cathedral Church, and a convent of sisters minours. On Friday proclamation was made in the army, that every man should beate the armes of Saint George, and it was said that his enemies bore the same also. On Saturday he passed to the Castell of Pau, where stand three castles of three Lords, wherof one he weth a farre off.

On Friday the twelfth of that month, his army passed the lands of Moysur, which are belonging to the Earle of Flur, this daies journey being long and tedious, he lost many of his horses in the wast ground called the Laundes. Two miles from the towne of Aurule, he displayed his banners, and divided his armies into diuers troupes. In the baward, wherein was three thousand men of armes, were the earle of warlike high Constable, Reignold Cobham, Lord Marshall, Lord Beauchampe, a Somersetshire man, the Lord Clifford, and the Lord Thomas of Hampton, belonging to the Ancients, and with them seven Barons of Calcoigne. In the middleward, wherein were seven thousand men of armes, besides Clerkes and Pages, there was the Prince himselfe with a double Antient, the Earle of Arford, the Lord Bartholomew Burwash, the Lord John de Lile, the Lord Willowby, the Lordle War, the Lord Maurice Barkley, sonne to Thomas Lord Barkley then living, very olde, the Lord John Bourlers, Lord John Rose the elder of Burdeaur, Capitaine de la Busch, the Lord Camount, the Lord Mountferrant, with their antients. In the rereward was foure thousand men of armes, committed to the charge of the Earle of Suffolke, the Earle of Salisburie, and the Lord Pemers, who led the Bernences: In the whole army was of men of armes, Clerks, Pages, Archers, Bigants, and other, about 60000 men, and this day was Ikenes Barefort, and diuers other made knights, and the village of Aurule, with three other villages (wherof William Lord Raymond was Capitaine) were deliuered vp vnto the Prince, wherein he lodged his army, and resting there two daies, as many as would were suffered to go out, and take victuals, and byent these enemies country. On Tuesday, they lodged in the towne of Mount Clere, where the Castell belonging therunto was given vp to the Prince, and after he left it againe to the Frenchmen, by reason of fire which brake vp in the towne, wherupon the Prince went out into the field, and lodged in his tentes, euer after refusing to lie in any towne. This day having taken three townes, and burning them, he made knights Gileus de Straton, and diuers other. Also John de Lile stricken with a quarrell at Ainsage, died. On Wednesday and Thursday he lay still, and on Friday he came before the strong towne of Loegeron, where he lodged in his tents. On Saturday he came by force to Placence, a very faire town, a strong, the inhabitants wherof fled away into the Castell, where the Earle of Arford, and many knights were taken by Capitaine de la Bouch, and the Lord Mountferrant, & de Lonchis, who was that day made knight. On Sunday & Lukes day, they staid at Cluant, and taking the fort of Galian, by force, they set it on fire, and burnt it. On Monday by casting fire in the towne of Placence, they passed along, leaving the towne of Beal Marchi on the right hand, and lodged before the towne of the Archbishop of Anser, called Le Bafe. On this day Richard Scalford brother vnto the Earle of Stafford, led his men with his Antient towards the towne: and on the next day being Tuesday, the towne was yielded vnto him, and because it belonged to the Church, the Prince would not suffer any man to enter into it, excepting certaine persons appointed of purpose, for the deliuering of victualles. On Wednesday they leaving the faire towne of Escamout, on the left hand, they came before the noble towne of Sperand, belonging to the Earle of Comenge, which was full of armed souldiours, and the Prince lodged in the great monastirie of Sartons, in the which Abbey, there was not so much as one liuing creature found. On Thursday they lay still, doing no harme to the said Abbey. On Friday they went out of the faire and rich countrey of Arminake, and entred the countrey of Austerrike, through the which, the passage was very hard and hilly, and lodged at Sarraunt a towne, they set it on fire, contrary to the commandement of the prince.

All that day, and three daies following, they passed alongst by the high hills of Aragon. On Saturday, they came to the towne of Saint Poze, where the rereward of the army lodged in a great monastirie of blacke monkes, which were all fled away: the middle ward at Wilfranks, and the baward at Ternaine: these villages being very rich, and full of victualles, had no man in them, for all the inhabitants were fled.

Sunday the foure and twentieth of October, they passed a certaine way, and entred into the lands of the Earle of Comenge, which reached vnto Tolouse, but these countries were wasted with fire and sword, and leaving on the left hand the towne called Sannetere in Austrike, they passed by the strong Citie of Wilmbers, where Pope John the two and twentieth removing the blacke monkes, erected a Bishops see, and they were lodged in a great & rich towne called Sotanco, belonging to the Carle dome of Comenge, where was a convent of sisters minours: and burning this towne on Monday they passed through a goodly wide countrey, very plaine, and so came to the towne of Saint Joy, and Saint Liz. On Tuesday they rested: and on Wednesday being the feast of Simon and Jude, the army passed through the riuer of Geronand, being a water very fierce, stony and terrible: and againe the same day, through the riuer of Arage, much more dangerous, and came vnto Tolouse: before that time, neuer durst any horseman passe over these waters, wherfore the people of this countrey being wonderfully made afraid, could not tell what to doe, for being sodainly taken, they could not flee: that night, the prince lodged at Falgard, a little towne, one mile from Tolouse. On Tuesday they came vnto the faire and great town called Mount Olfard, being part of the inheritance of the Lord Almerike de la Fossad, the which town the French king had taken from him, because he was the king of Englands sedeman. Fast by the said towne were twelue windmilles, the which they set on fire all at once. There were taken two espies, they certified the Prince that the Earle of Arminake was at Tolouse, and the Connestable of France at Mount Haban, foure leagues from Tolouse. On Friday, they passed on towards Aunioin, by the god towne of Balge, and the Towne called Franke, and the whole armie lodged at the great Towne called Aunet, and the middle ward and reuerward lay in one side of the Suburges, and the backward lay on the other side of the Towne, which the townsmen perceiving, fled euerie one.

There were about this towne twentie Windmills, which they set on fire. On Saturday the last of October, they lodged in the great Towne called Clastannanner, where a Church of the Chanons, a couent of Friers Spinors, and another of Carmelites, with an Hospitall, and a village called Les mauns de Pucels, with a couent of Friers Augustines, were all consumed with fire. On Sunday, the feast of Allsaints, the army rested, out of the which armie, certaine going to take bottles, they took a little Towne, the inhabitants wherof to be spared from spoiling, gaue them ten thousand dozens of gold. On Monday they marched along by the townes of S. Spathele Port, and the great Town called Alkapinch, and from thence, they entered the Countrey of Carhalon, & the Prince lodged at a little village called Alfe. On Tuesday they came to Carhalon, a faire Towne, rich & well built, bigger then London. Within the wals, betwixt the towne of Samburge, and the City being double walled, there ran a goodly water, which passed vnder a faire stone bridge, at the foote wherof, were foure couents of religious, of the which, the friers ran not a way, but the other fled into the Citie. The whole armie was lodged in the Towne, which abounded with Huskabel, and all other delicate victualles. This day, the sonnes of the Lord Liber, and Master Bassier, with Rowland Daves, and many other, were made knights.

France burnt.

On Wednesday and Thursday, the armie lying still in the Towne, and hauing made a truce, they parlied with them of the Citie concerning a peace, the Citizens offering so; saving the Towne from burning two hundred and fiftie thousand of golden Soules: the Prince answered, he came not for gold, but to take Citie and Townes, together with their inhabitants, and the next day commaunded the Towne to be burnt.

On Friday, the Towne being burnt, the armie departed, leaning on the left hand the Castell of Botenake untouched, passing through the champaign Countrey, burning Townes called la Rustican, and all the countrey thereabout.

On Saturday they travelled through a great wind and dust, leaning on the left hand a great pole of fresh water, being in compasse about xxx. leagues, and is called Calibon. They came to a Towne called Salony, which was yielded to the Prince, and therefore neuer touched: and the Prince was lodged that night at a god towne called Canet. On Sunday the eight day of November, they passed the water of Sandey, partly at the ford called Cha-Well de Terre, and partly over a bridge, and so travelled betwixt high hills, vnto the great Citie of Narbon, wherof that Countrey taking his name is called Gallia Narbonensis. The Citie was verie strong, and well walled, hauing in it a great Cathedraall Church: also a notable Castle, belonging to the Bishop, a verie strong Tower for the Earle of the same Towne. It had also a Suburbe called a Bozough, much bigger, and better built, then the Bozough of Carhalon.

In the Bozough were foure Couents of religious persons. Betwixt the Bozough and the Citie, there runneth a water called Ande, comming from Carcalon, and runneth into the Greeth sea. Betwixt the Citie and the Bozough are two bridges of stone, and the third of timber, built with Tower-houses for diners Merchandises. The prince was lodged in the house of Carmelites friars. On Tuesday the Bozough being set on fire, the armie passing to the waters side, went ouer it in diners places. From thence, they went and lodged at the Towne and Castell of Ambion. On Wednesday they travelled an euill journey, and hurtfull to the horse for lacke of water. On Thursday Theodorike Dale, Woyter of the Princes chamber, was made Knight: thence the armie passed by a good Town called Wilmes: the middleward passed into the good Towne of the Earle of Aile, called Arnle, where they lodged that night. The Prince lay at the Friers Spinors, where was great abundance of Huskabel, being prouided for the Countesse of the Ile, which was all spoiled. This day also, the good Towne of Pipions was destroyed, with the Castle therof called Redote. On Friday, the army passing by a long stonle way, lodged at Laman. On Saturday, returning backe toward Carcalon, and all the journey that they went before, and the reuerward lodged at a good Towne called Abier, and the middleward at Purchiancles, where a Castle being defended, withstood them a season, but at the length was won, and the Prince lay beyond the Bridge, by a saye running water, on both sides wherof, the Countrey was spoiled with fire, together with the god Towne of Besaunce where the backward was lodged that night. On Sunday they travelled a long journey, because the Prince should be lodged in the great Abbey of our Lady de Prolion, where in feuerall Cloysters did live 100. Medicants, inherunto, the Prince was devoutly received. In the day, the armie set on fire the Towne of Lemnis, where there was foure greater Couents of Religious, then at Carcalon. Also, they burnt the faire Towne called Salanges, vnto which Towne belonged one and twentie Windmilles. They burnt also the Townes of Vinard, and Serre, with all the whole Countrey lying thereabouts. On Monday the middleward lodged at the god Towne called Dealpubbon, which long time was defended, but at length gotten by force, the Castell wherof yielded, vnto the which Towne and Castell, the Prince commaunded, that no harme should be done by fire. On Tuesday early passing ouer the river of Weselle, they entered into a countrey which was broad. About one a clocke, they came before a great Abbey called Bourghbon, where the Earle of Flourens with great force resisted the Prince, hee being newly escaped out of prison from Paris, where he had laine by the space of two yers: and the said earle remained from that time faithfull to the Prince. This day they rode in the Lordships and signories of the same Earle, by the townes of Pafel and Chimon, and on the right hand they passed by the great towne of Saint Canole, and the high Castell called Hautripe: but on this day they bent nothing for reverence of the foresaid Carle & his vineyards, but passed againe over the water of Arage, leaving also Tolouse as they did at the first, but then one mile on the left hand, and now foure leagues on the right, and the middle ward was lodged in the great towne of Hermount, which together with the Castell was bent. On Wednesday, they passed by the Castell of the Carle of Flure called Gonnthane, at the fote wherof, all the horsemen passed over the great water Ge-round, & there toke the towne and castell of Nozth, then leaving the river of Gerond on the left hand, and so passed unto the towne of Sparconaw, which they toke: then they returned over the river againe, & toke the strong town of Carbone. On Thursday the army rested. On Friday word was brought to the Prince that the French were by, and had gathered a great force, which they had divided into five great battels, being in the field not farre from them, whereupon our me let themselves in battel aray, about one mile from the place where they lodged, and being now ready to fight, some one of the souldiers by chance start a hare, whereupon a great shout was made, which the enemies hearing, they sent out forty light horsemen, to see what was the cause thereof, who drawing nigh to the English army, and perceiving them to be set in battell aray, returned backe againe, and declared what they had seen: whereupon presently the whole army of Frenchmen fled with great feare. The same day Bartholomew Burwash, John Chandos, and James de Audley, with 24 light horsemen, were appointed scouts, and conning to the tale of the Frenchmen, they toke prisoners 32 knights and Gentlemen, amongst whom they toke the Carle of Romerne, also they slew many Carters, and Waggoners. The Prince lodged in the town of Anwole. On Saturday they marched to the Castle of Draby, in which Castle the Prince lodged, and in the morning they burnt it. On Sunday the two and twentieth of November, about evening, they perceived that their enemies were on the other side of the great Will hard by the great town of Gernount, so that the Englishmen being benighted, sent out 12 light horsemen, and certaine bowmen unto the right hand of the towne called Auremount, where finding 400 men of armes of the Constable of France, they chased them out of the town, and slew and toke many: the middle ward lodged at Auremount, and the forward at Colimont. Early in the morning the Waggoners being commanded to remaine in the towne of Auremount, all the residue being divided into troopes, went into the field, waiting for the coming of their enemies, all in vain: for the prince taking the towne of Camouat, was told that his enemies fled away at midnight. On Tuesday the army lodged in the field, and for lacke of water, their horse were faine to drinke wine, whereupon it came to passe, that the next day their horses were so drunke they could not go right forth, and many of them died. On Saint Katherine day, with much adoe they came to water, and leaving the towne of Florence on their right hand, they passed to the great towne called Sallard, and the middle ward was lodged at a towne called Salladunt, which they toke by maine force, & therefore bent it. On Thursday

Thursday they rested. On Friday they travailed a long journey, by walled townes and strong castles, the middle ward lodged at Berde. On Saturday they passed over a certaine water with great difficultie, and through woods, till they came to a good towne called Melin. On Sunday the prince rested, and toke homage and oathes of the townemen. On Monday S. Andrewes day travelling along journey, they came to the town of Tolouse, where were three Castles. On Tuesday the prince travelled to the castle of Belan, where he lodged. On Wednesday the prince came to Regla, where his horses and Waggoners passed through the river of Verond. In this towne of Regla, the prince appointed divers Barons and such like to winter in divers places of the marches, to the intent they should keepe the inland parts of Gascoigne against the Frenchmen.

The prince of Wales touching these matters aforesaid, and for other considerations also, caused a new coyne of gold to be made in Gascoigne, being busied himselfe about the repairing of such things as were decayed & broken downe. And in this season, there sprang up a foolish fantasie in the French mens heads, that the King of England was come into Gasconny, the cause of which rumour rose by, for that the Duke of Lancaster, after that he had fortified the strong places belonging to the King of France, which were in the Ile of Constance & other places, did direct his journey towards Byptaine, whereof he was newly made chiefe captaine. Another cause was this, Philip brother to the king of France, came into England, and earnestly craved aid of the king against the French king, who kept his brother in prison, that hee might by force of armes restore all such lands unto him as were wrongfully withholdden from him, whereupon hee offering to do homage and fealtie, had (of the kings appointment) Miles Stapleton a man of great integritie, and in mar-tiall affaires verie skillfull, bin (I say) the king appointed to be his faithfull fellow. These men with two thousand men wel appointed travelling through Gasconny, toke townes & fortresses, burning divers of them, passing along till they came to a castle nine leagues distant from the Citie of Paris: neither did they abake their travell, untill they had forced their enemies to enter into a pærcely truce. By this meanes a great report and no lesse feare filled the hearts of the Frenchmen, which report at length came to the eares of the Prince lying at Regla, wherefore hee gathering all the power hee had with him in his Dukedome, to the intent to meete his father, which hee must doe by travelling through France, hee came at length to Byngnet, where he was certified that the Carle of Ardenia, would after his departure have spoiled the Countrey, and for that intent had provided a great band of men: wherefore hee sent backe to the Gouvernour of Gascoigne unto Barnard de Librie, and other. From thence the prince went into France through the coastes of Bracy and Limon, still encouraging his men against their enemies, sending before him John Chandos, James Dawdeley, and other complices, to trie out the state of their enemies Countrey, least perhaps some crafty ambushment might sodainly assault our men, aforesayd they were aware. He himselfe removing his campe every day, and now being entred into Picardia, his espies brought word that the French king had gathered a great armie, being nobe in Auerlan, who also knew of the princes comming, for he sent out espies to discouer our armie, amongst whom Griffin Micco of Chamblay, peitie capitaine of two hundred men, meeting with other espies, came to his coast: for our espies took thirty of them, and slew the residue, so that there was not one of them left to carry word what was become of their fellows. Our espies proceeded to wards Comerentine, where meeting with the Lord Creane, and Lord Wilsford, they set upon them and slew them, their chiefe Captains being forced to flee to a Castle, and having taken their lodging in a Towne, the prince commanded that on the morning a great assault should be given to them of the Castle.

The day following our men being all armed, passed through the ditches, and came unto the walls of the Castle, some applied to scale the wal with ladders, some burne the gates, and entering, slew a great many of the chiefe men, but the Lords before named fled unto the principall tower of the castle: but the prince determined not to depart, till they that were besieged, were either taken or yielded: at length the Castle being undermined, the men besieged, with all humilitie yielded by the Castle. After this the spies declared that the French king was come down to Warron, to prouoke armies to go against the Prince, of the which tidings the Prince being glad, he pight his tentes against the French king, but could not passe the river of Legers, by reason of great floods, and the French king had broken all the Bridges, to the intent there should be no passage betwixt the Prince & the Duke of Lancaster, whose armies might wel every night perceiue each others fires in the Campes: but the Prince following alongst the river of Legers Castward, he pight his tentes nere unto Warron, where looking for the French king foure daies, hoping to fight with him, for that he was distant but one league off, he understood that the French king was rettyed backe to Blania, ten leagues off: passing ouer by a Bridge the Riuer of Legers at a place ben betwixt two strong Townes, and so toward Woyters. This retiring of the French king certified, the prince returned backe, intending to haue met him in the way, which he could not doe: yet crossing ouer all, as he imagined the nether way, he set upon the taile of his enemies, and cut from them the Carles of Arpyn and Winters, and also the marshal of Burgony, these being taken, died, as was thought, though the great toyle they had taken: night bytuning on, our men gaue themselves to rest in a wood, intending the next day to take their iourney toward Woyters, and by the way they were certified that the French king, with great prouision prepared himselfe to battell, and byew night to our tents: the prince therfore committed the halward of the armie to the Carles of Warwicke and Wroza, the middle ward was guided by the Prince, and the reerward was led by the Carles of Salisburie and Suffolke. In all the whole armie of the Prince there was not aboue foure thousand men of armes, one thousand armed souldiours, and two thousand Archers: The pompous nobility of the Frenchmen byew night, greatly exceeding the small company of the English men, for they had in number eight thousand fighting souldiours, they had also seven tentents. At this matter a great many of our men murmured, because of late a great part of our army was sent to defend Calcoigne. There was among the Frenchmen a certaine Scot called William Douglas, a man of great force and practise in the warres: this man did the French king make knight, and because he knew he would be a deadly enemy to the Englishmen, he gladly hearkened to his aduices. This William was capitaine ouer two hundred Scots: these men understood well that it was the custome of the English men in these dayes to fight on foote, in which point they followed the Scots, and the Scot also prouoked the French king and other French men to fight in like manner. The French king obeying his foolish counsell, gladly agreed vnto his sayings, whereupon he sent light horsemen into the Cisse, that they should suffer no man to make any chase, but onely 500. horsemen wel appointed to come out against the archers, in the beginning of the conflict, and to run them ouer and to tread them vnder their horse fete: but these performed not that which was commanded them, as it appeared by the sequelle thereof. The armies being set in a readinesse on both sides for to fight early on Monday in the morning which was notable saye, behold there came the Cardinall of Petrargozen, and charged the Prince, in the name of God who was crucified, that it might please him to deferre the warre for a time, both for ecclesiasticall peace, and also for the sparing of Christian blood, and to the end there might be a treatie had of peace, the which he promised should be performed with great honour on both sides. The Prince neither feared nor refused peace but modestly agreed to the request of this Father. All this day now being appointed for the obtaining of peace, the armie of the Frenchmen increased by the number of a thousand men of armes, and also of other. On the morrow after, the Cardinall came againe from the French king, in his behalfe to request a truce, which should endure for one whole yeere, the which the Prince denyes, yet at the importunate sute of that Cardinall, he granted a truce to continue till Christmas next comming. Wherefore the Cardinall returning to the French king, requested him of pledges for the truce, but the Marshall Dawdenam, Geoffrey de Charney and Douglas the Scot, perswaded him that by common reason it could not come to passe that the Englishmen should at that time prouaile, and especially, because they were but fewe, and in a strange country, and wearied out miserably with their toyle in trauell, and therefore not able to endure so great a number of the Frenchmen of France, who stood in defence of their owne land. The Prince of Wales being certified, that the captaines of the French, would haue no kind of peace, but such as they could get by force of armes, and calling his men together, he made to them an oration first in general, and then to his Archers as followeth: your manhood (saith he) hath bin alwaies known to me, in great dangers, which I see with that you are not degenerate from true sonnes of English men, but to be descended from the blood of them which heretofore were vnder my fathers Dukehodie, and his predecessors Kings of England, vnto whom no labor was painefull, no place invincible, no ground unpasseable, no hill (were it neuer so high) inaccessible, no tower unscalable, no army impenetrable, no armed souldiour, or whole host of men was formidable. Their lively couragiousnesse tamed the Frenchmen, the Cipzians, the Syracuzians, the Calabrytians, & the Palestines, and brought vnder the stiffe necked Scots, & vntuly Irishmen, yea, and the Welchmen also, which could well endure all labors. Occasion, time, and dangers, maketh of fearefull, very strong an hoste, & doth many times of dull witted men make wittie: honour also, and love of the Countrey, and the desire of the rich people of the Frenchmen, doth stirre you vp to follow your fathers steps. Wherefore followe your Antientes, and wholy be intentive to followe the commandment of your Captaines as well in minde as in body, that if victorie come with life, we may still continue in firme frendship together, hauing alwayes one will, and one minde: but if eniuous Fortune (which God forbid) should let vs at this present, to runne the race of all flesh, and that we ende both life and labour together, be you sure that your names shall not want eternall fame and heauenly ioy, and we also with these gentlemen our companions, will drinke of the same cuppe that you shall doe, vnto whom it shall be an eternall glory and name, to haue wonne the nobilitie of France: but to be overcome (as God forbid) is not to be ascribed vnto the danger of time, but to the courage of the men. Having spoken these wordes, he perceived that there was a hill hard by which was planted on the top with hedges and ditches, the inside whereof was very plaine, and a pasture field on the one side thereof, with many rough bushes, and on the other side it was all planted with vines, and the residue was plaine, in the top whereof he did imagine the arme of the French to lye betwixt our men and the Hill. There were great and lowe valleys, and a piece of parish ground. One company of the Prince finding out a narrow passage, entred the valley and toke the hill, where among the bushes they hid themselves, taking the advantage of the place. The felde wherein our men lay, to witte, the barwarde and middlewarde, was deuided from the plaine where the French armie lay, with a long hedge and ditch, the one end whereof did reach down to the parish aforesaid: that of the Hill next the parish, the Earle of Warwicke kept, Captaine of the barwarde. In the upper part of the hedge, toward the hanging of the hill, there was a great gap, from the which a fowles cast stode our rereward, ouer the which the Earle of Salisbury was Captaine. Our enemies perceiuing our Princes Attente to be displayed, and oftentimes to be remoued from place to place, and by reason of the Hill to be sometime quite out of sight, they iudged that the Prince fled: yet Douglas the Scot and Sparthall de Clarimount, said that it was not so, but Sparthall Dawdenam being deceiued in his owne opinion, thought otherwise, crying out still to follow & chase the Prince now fleeing, and with him also Douglas, to the intent to gette preferment and a worthie name of his new warfare: But Clarimount to walsh away the euill opinion which was conceived of him touching his fidelitie, was the more belement to perswade them forward, for vnto them the charge of the barward was deputed: befoze these went out, the fashion was, certaine to chase and to iuste, against whom certaine that were vnder the Hill of our barward came to meete Sparthall Dawdenam, who staying to see the ende of the iusting, kept himselfe from encountering. In the meane time Clarimount thinking to come out by the gap in the hedge, and so to come at the backe of our barwarde, and to compasse them in, met with the Earle of Salisburie, who perceiuing his coming and purpose, suspected his whole intent, and so they which gouerned our rereward, making backe to take the gap, and keepe the enemye from passing that way sustained the first charge of the battell. Then began a terrible meeting betwixt the armed men, who laid on load with swoydes and speares, neither did the Archers slacke their dutie, but lying in safe trenches, sturt vp aboue the ditch and shot ouer the hedge, preuailling moze with their arrowes then they did that fought in armes: thus our rereward slaying the enemies, who came stragling to the gap, and the barward which lay on the hanging of the hill toward the parish being gouerned by the Earle of Warwicke, were alwayes ready and met with the Frenchmen, beating them downe. The Archers of the barward were placed in the parish, out of daunger from the Hostemen, yet for all that they did preuaile there somewhat, for the Hostemen were appointed to no other purpose, but to ouerrunne the Archers. The Earle of Oxford considering the discommoditie that might ensue therof, departed from the Princes warde, and leading with him the Archers, set them on the one side of the Frenchmen, commanding them to shote at the hinder parts of the Hostes, by meanes whereof the hostes being gauld and wounded, fell to tumbling with them that fate on their backes, or els turned backe & ran vpon them that followed after, making great slaughter vpon their owne masters. The Hostemen being thus beaten backe, the Archers retired towards the place from whence they came, shoting & gawling the sides of the French men which fought right ouer against them: by this time the force and beate of the battell began to be in prime, when as the Earles of Warwicke & Salisburie, like fierce Lions, endeuoured of purpose which of them should dunge the land of Popers most with Frenchmens blood. Neither was the Wolfe Counsellor Thomas Darnford of Suffolke idle at that season, who right worthily in all his acts behaued himselfe, being expert and skillfull in activitie. For he continually running from warde to warde, and into all troopes and companies, comforted and stirred them vp with good wordes to doe well, hauing a great regard that the youthfull sort of lustie souldiers being so bolde vpon their god hearts and courage, should not without regard goe out too farre, and placed the Archers at sundry times to great advantages, and oftentimes as lesure would suffer him, he would encourage by the minds of the souldiers. Clarimount was slaine, William Douglas also being wounded fled, hauing with him a selue Scottes of his bande, with Archebald Douglas his brother & our men rettying, put themselves in good aray, and our barward and middle warde ioynded themselves together, by and by there marcheth forth a newe armie of the Frenchmen, the which the eldest sonne of the French King Dolphin of Vienna, brought forth. The order and aray of this armie was more terrible & fierre then the shew of that which was last opposed, yet for all that could it not make our men afraid, who were sharpe set, and very desirous of honour, and also of reuenge, both for themselves, and their fellows, which a little before were slain and wounded. And therefore boldly they goe to it on both sides, making shoutes and noises, crying out, Saint George to harrow, o, Saint Denis be for vs. Within a while they were come to fight man to man, and euery man ready to die fight now to save their liues, neither doth the Lion make the wolfe more afraid, o, Tiger is more terrible to the simple beast, then our lusty gentlemen were to their enemies, who chased them, and slue them like as the wolues chase and kill sheepe. And though that this battell withstood our men more then the first, yet, after they had lost a great many of their men, they had such a beaule, that they feared many, & yet, not by running away, but by a faire retreat, which the Frenchmen are accustomed to be. But our men considering, that the victorie of the fieelde was doubtfull, as long as the French King might be in presence with his armie, who lay there halfe hid in a Walley, they would not afterward, when they had chased any that fled, goe out of the fieelde, but the worthy man Maurice Berkeley, sonne of Thomas Barkley, had no regard thereunto, who so; the space of two houres together with his men, neuer spaced, but would be still in the forefront of the battell, invading his enemies with the first. This Maurice being in the midst of the Dolphins gard sowd blowes among them, first with a speare, then with a sword, and at length being all alone compassed with the multitude, and loosely wounded, he was taken prisoner. In the meane time our men caried those which were wounded of their campe, and laid them under bushes and hedges out of the way, other hauing spent their weapons toke the speares & swordes from them whom they had overcome: and the archers lacking arrowes, made hast to drave them from worse wretches that were but halfe dead: there was not one of them al, but either he was wounded o; quite wearied with great labour, except 400. men who keeping the chiefe standert, were appointed to mete the French King. The Dolphin being thus put to flight, one came to the French King, and said, my Lord, the fieelde is fallen to the Englishmen, and your eldest son hath withdrawn himselfe: unto whom the French King answered with an oth, that he would not that day forsake y<sup>e</sup> field unless he were taken o; slain, and so by that means caried away by force: wherefore the ancient-bearers are commanded to march forwards, after whom followed two great companies of armed men into a wide field, shewing themselves to our men, & strooke a great feare into their heartes, in so much that they were out of hope to conquer any more. The which thing a man of great wisdom standing by y<sup>e</sup> Prince signified with a holow voice, (saying alas we worse wretches are overcome,) but the prince hauing a great trust & faith in Christ, checked him saying, thou likst thou bastards fellow, for thou canst not say that we can be overcome as long as I liue. Capitaine de la Buche, a noble man in all affaires as some as be preferred the armie of the French King, marching forth of their tentes, alking licence of the prince departed away with li. soldiers, & a hundred archers, whom many of our men thought to have fled away, therefore our soldiers (excepting the chiefe Capitaines) being quite out of hope of victorie, committed themselves wholly to the mercy of God. Then the Prince commanded his Ancient beere Sir Walter Woodland, to march forward to march his enemies, mes, and with a few fresh men he opposed battell with the great armie of the French King: by and by they sounded their trumpets, one giuing answer to another, they made such a noise, that the walles of Bopters sounded with the Echo thereof like a wood, in such sort that a man would haue thought that the hills had bellowed out to the balleis, and that the cloudes had giuen forth a most terrible thunder, to the which there wanted no cruel lightnings, whilst the aire shone on the bright armour & speares dashing againe shining barneis. Then came on the cruell company of crossbowmen making a barneis in the sides with the multitudine of quarrels which they shot, against whom came a worthy company of English bowmen: out lies also darts of Arth which met with the enemye a far off: but the French army being full of braver troupes, and many armed men defending their bodies with their shields, pushed forward against their enemies: wherefore our Archers hauing emptied their quiers in vaine, being armed onely with swordes and targets, are faine to encounter with them that were laden with armour. When he desired himselfe the worthy Prince of Wales, cutting and beuiling the Frenchmen with a sharpe sword. In the meane time Capitaine de la Buche marcheth a compasse about; under the hanging of the hill, which he with the Prince a little before forsake, and pitifully compassing about the fieelde, at the length cometh close vnder the place where the French Campe lay, from thence he ascended to the toppe of the hill that way, which the Frenchmen had beaten with their trauaile, and so suddenly breaking forth vniuersed, and the wing by the ensigne of Saint George that he was our friend, the Prince with great courage giueth a fresh charge on the French armie, being desirous to break their ranks, before the Capitaine also sayde, should set on the side of the battayle. The Prince lustily encountering with his enemies goeth into the huddle of the fighting, and where hee seeth most company, there hee aspieth about him on euery side.

In the meane time on euery side, his friends which serned with Capitaine de la Buche, were at the backes of the enemies, beating downe and killing without pittie, and the Archers also placed for the purpose shot so thicke, wounding the backes and sides of the Frenchmen, in such sort, that the fourme of the battaille was quite spoiled, neither could they put themselves in order or aray any more. This was the courage of the Prince who at the length thrusteth thorow the throngs of them that guarded the French King, then should you see an Antient beginne to nod and stumble, the bearers of them to fall downe, the blood of slanes and Princes ran mingled together into the waters which were nigh. In like sorte the Boze of Cornuall rageth, who seeketh to haue none other way to the French Kings Standard, then by blood onely: but when they came there, they met with a company of Montie men to withstand them, the Englishmen fight, the Frenchmen also lay on: but at length fortune making halfe to turne her wheele, the Prince preacht forward on his enemies, and like a fierce Lion beating downe the pards, he came to the peeling by of the French King. The Frenchmen being scattered abroad in the feloes of Bopters perceiving that the Standard with the

As they were thus beaten downe, fled with all speede towards the Towne, which was not farre off: the English men perceping them to be fleeing, though themselves were either soze wounded or wearied, followed them in chase even to the gates of Poytiers, where in a great skirnish and very dangerous, they slew a great number of Frenchmen. At the last our men being called backe by retreat with the sound of trumpet, and assembling together, there were diuerse pavillions and tents set up in the fields, and the whole company being thoroughly comforted with this victorie, gaue their whole endeavour to provide for them that were wounded, for the quiet rest of them that were wearied, for safe keeping of them that were taken prisoners, and for the refreshing of the that were almost famished, until they had full understanding who and how many were wanting: Among them which were found halfe dead, was found the Lord James Dawdeley, by reason of his broad buckler, and being caried in the armes of his souldiours, was brought to the Princes lodging, and the Prince himselfe rose from his supper, and came to him, and caused him to be stripped and laid in a soft bed, and being somewhat better com to his remembrance, the Prince comforted him, swearing to him that he had the French King yielded unto him, which newes when the languishing Noble man heard, he straightwayes reuiued. The Prince returning to the French King, willed him not to denie that to be a worthy dede of his that rose from his supper to comfort him that was almost dead, who spared not his owne blood to purchase victory. After that they hauing had some talke concerning the warres which James Dawdeley made, the French King said that amongst all other Route Champions which ballantly that day behaued themselves, he did greatly wonder at the noble dedes of that Knight, and he spake not much more in all his supper, but what he spake to the Prince, who comforted his noble pray. Such like words, it is said that the French King spake: Although it be our chance to fall into an euertlasting sorrow, yet for all that we thought it good to refrain from the same by a kind of measure, for though we be under subiection by law and right of warre under our noble cousin, yet are we not as calves, or faint hearted runne aways, or taken lying hid close in a copse, but after the manner of the helbe by the ende and successe of warre, where we were as ready to dye as live for iustice sake. And in the same field were many rich men taken, whose lives were reserved for ransome, the faithfull hearted and lewd chased away, but the worthiest and stoutest were spoiled of their lincs. This battell of Poytiers was fought on the nineteenth day of September.

The next day after the battell, all the prisoners were numbez, to wit, the French King, also Philip his sonne, the Archbishop of Senon, the Earle of Pontue, the Earle of Longuile, the Earle of Clewe, the Earle of Tankerville, the Earle Daunfer, the Earle of Wendabour, the Earle of Blouancer, the Earle of Malapount, the Earle of Wandome, the Earle of Juyng, the Earle Don Martin, the Earle of Selabuse, the Earle of Salso, Viscount Perbon, the Lord Daubeny, Marshall Daubedenam, the Lord Guinchard de Angle, Marshall de Seintong, the Lord Poyez Maluimier, the Lord Leonard de Col-

Egre, the Lord Damobd Senechal of Annar, the Lord Tower, the Lord Wars, the Lord Durnall, the Lord of the towne of Ernel, the Lord Maugelcr, the Lord Planke, the Viscount de Wellmount, and the Lord of Sulp: there were also the bodies founde of many that were slaine, as the Duke of Burbon, the Duke Daillnes, the Countesse of France, Marshall de Carimount, the Lord Geoffrey de Charney, the Lord Pounce, the Bishop of Chaloner, the Lord of Landas, the Lord Ripemount, the Lord Chanery, the Lord Jacle, the Lord Jele, the Lord Janger, the Lord de Mount John, the Lord Dargenton, the Lord Gwale, the Lord Knas, the Lord Koehechicheward, the Lord de Willem. The Prince bought all the prisoners and captives of them that kept them, and carried them with him to Burdeaur, there to remaine in safe custodie, during his abode there.

Edward Prince of Wales returning into England with John the French King, Philip his sonne, and many other prisoners, arrived at Wiltmouth on the sixt of May, and the saure and twentieth of May entered London with them, where he was receiued with great honour of the Citizens, and so conueyed to the Kings pallace at Westminster, where the King sitting in his estate in Westminster hall, receiued them, and after conueyed the French King to a lodging, where he lay a season: and after the said French King was lodged in the Chauncy, (which then was a pleasant place belonging to the Duke of Lancaster.) In the winter following were great and royal Jousts holden in Smithfield at London, where many knightly fights of armes were don, to the great honour of the King and Realme, at the which were present, the Kings of England, France, and Scotland, with many noble estates of all those kingdomes, whereof the moze part of the strangers were prisoners.

After this taking of King John of France, Englishmen (which befoze were bearded and the haire of their heads short rounded) then used long haire on their heads, and their beards to be shauen.

Henry Picard Wintner, Mayor of London, in one day did sumptuously feast Edward King of England, John King of France, the King of Cyprus (then arrived in England) David King of Scots, Edward Prince of Wales, with many noble men and other, and after the said Henry Picard kept his hall against all comers whosoeuer, that were willing to play at dice and hazard. In like manner the Lady Margaret his wife did also keep her Chamber, to the same intent. The King of Cyprus playing with Henry Picard in the hall, did winne of him fifty marks, but Henry being very skilful in that arte, set his hand did after win of the same King, the same fiftie marks, and fiftie markes moze, which when the same King began to take in all part, although he dissembled the same, Henry said unto him, My Lord King be not angryed, I cannot not your gold but your play, for I haue not bid you hither that I might geue you, but that amongst other things I might trie your play, and gaue him his money againe, plentifully bestowing of his owne amongst the rest: he also gaue many rich gifts to the King and other nobles and Knights, which done with him, to the great glorie of the Citizens of London in those dayes.

John Beauchamp
died in Paris.

John of Gaunt the Kings sonne (by dispensation) toke to wife Blanch, daughter of Henry Duke of Lancaster his kinwoman, John Beauchamp constable of Moner, warden of the postes, knight of the Garter (sonne to Edward de Beauchampe, Earle of Warwick, and brother to Thomas also Earle of Warwick) deceased, and was buried on the south side of the middle Ile in the body of Saint Pauls Church in London, a faire monument of him remaineth there, by many ignorant people misnamed, to be of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, who lyeth honorably intombed at Saint Albons.

The French King under colour of peace, offered to King Edward Flaunders, Picardy, Aquitaine, and other lands, which the Englishmen had raged through and spoiled, for the performance whereof, messengers were sent into France, but the Frenchmen would not performe the offer, wherefore King Edward being angry with a naute of ships passed the sea to Caleis, where dividing his army into thre parts he committed one company to Henry Duke of Lancaster, another to Prince Edward, and the thirde he reserved to himselfe, and so passed into Burgundy.

King Edward
invaded Burgundie.
Frenchmen arrived at Wimburye.

In the Lent season, the Normans with a small naup arrived at Winchester, and partly bent the towne, and slew such as did withstand them: wherefore the Prelates of England assembled from all parts in armour to withstand them, but when they had prepared themselves to battell, the French were gone, leaving behind them two of their ships, which sticke fast in the land, and 200. of their men.

King Edward with his power rode through France, by Picardy, Artois, Norm, Champagne, & so to Britayne, destroying the countrey before him. And here is to be noted, that the 14. day of Aprill, and the morrow after Easter day, King Edward with his host lay before the Cite of Paris, which day was full dark of mist and haile, and so bitter cold, that many men died on their horse backs with the cold, wherefore unto this day it hath bene called the Blacke Monday. The king of Navarre vered soze the marches of Normandy. Thus was the realme of France miserably beset on all sides. At the last, a final peace was concluded on this condition, that King Edward should have to his possession, the countreies of Gascoigne, Guyen, Poitiers, Limosin, Valentia, Crantes, Caleis, Guisnes, and divers other Lordships, Castles, Townes, and all the landes to them belonging, without knowledge of any soveraigntie or subjection for the same. This peace being confirmed by writing and by oath, King Edward came into England, and so straight to the towne for the French king, where he appointed his ransom to be thre millions of flozencs, and so delivered him of all imprisonment, and brought him with great honour to the Sea, who then sailed over into France.

French king
released.

Edward the 24. of Januarie began a Parliament at Westminster, where the forme of the agreement was read, and allowed of all estates, where the king on the last of Januarie caused his nobles to sweare to hold and keep the said agreement, especially those as well Prelates as other that were not at Caleis, where he sweare, and other that were there with him.

And on the first of february following, the king restored to the Prelates all their houses, lands, tenements, &c. as by his patents may appeare: likewise as followeth. Edward by the grace of God king of England, Lord of Irelands, and of Aquitaine, to all by these presents, &c. Although the Priorie of mountacute, in the county of Somerset (by reason of the warres betwene us and France) with all the landes, tenements, fees, advowsons, together with the goods and cattels belonging to the same, hath ben of late taken into our hands, and by us farmed & rented forth, as appeareth by divers patents. Now therefore, since peace is betwixt us and the noble Prince, our most deare brother, the king of France, we for the honour of God, and holy Church, restore to the said Priore, the Priorie, with all the landes, tenements, fees, advowsons: and whatsoever else belonging to the same, to hold the same, in as free manner as they held it before. And withall, forgive and release all arreages of rents which might be due unto us, by reason of any former grants. In witness, &c. the 6. of february the 35. yere of our raigne.

Restitution of the Priories
Record.

The like letters of restitution had the houses (in the patent) undernamed, to wit, Poxtampton, Arundel, Camerlingham, Striton, Wistowel, &c. to the number of one hundred and tenne in England, besides them in Ireland, Poxtmable, and the parts of France. All which houses were cleane suppressed and dissolved, with many moze by King Henry the first.

A great dearth and pestilence happened in England, which was called the second pestilence, in which died Henry Duke of Lancaster in March at London, and was buried at Leicester, in the Collegiate Church which he had founded, with a Deane, twelve Chanons, Prebendaries, as many Clerg, and other ministers accordingly, and one hundred weak and sick persons, fiftie men, and fiftie women, and tenne other women to tend upon them that were sicke and weak, so that the same college and hospitall, at the suppression by king Henry the eight was valued by the yere in lands five hundred ninety and five pounds, seven shillings, and five pence.

The king held his Christmas at Windsor, & the x. day following, a sore and vehement South-west winde brake forth, so hideous, that it overthrew high houses, towers, castles, and trees, and so bowed them, that the residue which fell not, but remained standing, were the weaker.

Feasting in Smithfield.

The first five daies of May, at London in Smithfield, were Joutes holden, the king and Quene being present, and the most part of the Chivalrie of England and France, and of other Nations, to the which came Spaniards, Cipriets, and Armenians knightly requesting the king of England also against the Pagans that had invaded their confines. The staple of wooles, notwithstanding the oath received of the kind of England, and other great men of the land, is sent to Calais.

The third of Aprill was bozne at Burbeaur, Richard sonne to Edward the blacke Prince, which Richard was after king of England by the name of Richard the second.

There was then a pylate in England, called William Wicham, who was so great with the king that all things were done by him, and without him nothing was done. And so when the Bishopricke of Winchester was void, the king of England at the desire of the said pylate, wrote to the Duke of Burbon, that he would for his sake, make such sute to Pope Urban, that his chaplein might haue the bishopricke of Winchester, promising the Duke in his doings, to intreat him right courteously for his imprisonment and hostage. When the duke of Burbon saw the B. of Englands messengers and his letter, he was therof right ioyous: and shewed all the manner to the French king, who counselled him to go to the Pope for the same, and so he did, for he went to Auignon to the Pope, who was not as the gone to Rome, and so the duke made his request to the Pope, and beganted him, and gaue him the Bishopricke of Winchester at his pleasure, so that the king of England would be fauourable to him in the composition for his deliuarance, that the foresaid William Wicham should haue the said Bishopricke. When the duke of Burbon returned into France, and so into England, and there treated with the king and his counsel for his deliuarance, or he would shew his buls from the Pope. The king of England loued so well this pylate, that the Duke of Burbon was deliuered quite, and paid 20000. frankes. And so Sir William Wicham was B. of Winchester, and Chancellor of England.

Paulus Iovius.
Leonell Duke of Clarence married and died.

In the moneth of Aprill, Leonell Duke of Clarence, with a chosen company of the English nobilitie went towards Spillaine, there to marry with Violentis the daughter of Galeasus the second of that name, Duke of Spillaine, of which marriage Paulus Iovius writeth thus, upon the life of the said Galeasus: By the means of peace being obtained, and Barnabe with no lesse earnest endeavour seeking by force and armes to recover the Principedome of Bononie, as taken from him by fraud, and detained by injury, Galeasus desired to justify himselfe with forraign assistance, glorious in deed, in princely payre, but inevent to him and his unfortunate, matching his sonne John Galeasus with Isabelle daughter to Charles the French king, and his daughter with Leonell Duke of Clarence, sonne of the king of England, to whom having received 200000. Florences of gold for a dowry by the marriage of Violentis, the Cities of Monsregalis, and Alba Pompeis submitted themselves. And Isabel which came to spillaine was so troublesome to her father in law, that she cost him 200000. Florences, although the rebelling of the Towne of Pesantes; and the title of that most honourable name had been given to her new husband in part of her dowrie. Whereupon, at the coming of Leonell, such abundance of treasure was in most bounteous manner spent, in making most sumptuous feasts, setting forth stately sightes, and honouring with rare gifts about two hundred Englishmen, which accompanied his sonne in law, as it seemed to surpass the greatness of most wealthy Princes: for in the banquet whereat Francis Petrarch was present, amongst the bestest guests, there were about thirtie courses of service at the table, and betwixt every course, as many presents of wonderous price intermixed, all which John Galeasus, chiefe of the choise youth, bringing to the table, did offer to Leonell.

A most stupendous feat.

There were in one onely course fencyng goodly hozes, adorned with silke and siluer furniture: and in the other siluer beccles, falcons, hounds, armour for hozes, costly coates of mayle, beaflaffes glittering of massie stele, helmes, and co:lets decked with costly creases, apparrell distinct with costly Jewels,ouldiers, girdles, and lastly certaine gemmes, by curious art set in gold, and of purple, and cloth of gold for mens apparrell in great abundance. And such was the sumptuousnesse of that banquet, that the meate which were brought from the table, would sufficiently haue fedd 10000. men: but not long after, Leonell liuing with his new wife, whilst after the manner of his olde countrey, as forgetting of, or not regarding his change of ayze, he addicted him selfe ouermuch to intymity banquettings, spent and consumed with an ingring sicknesse, died at Alba. Afterward Violantis was married to Ocho Queensborough, Kingston upon Hull, and S. Botolphs, alias Boston, were made Staples by Parliament.

The Kings sonne John Duke of Lancaster, and Humfrey Bohan Earle of Hereford, with a great armie went into Fraunce, where they little perceived, because an huge Army of Frenchmen had pitched their Tents upon the toppes of Chalke hill, nere unto Caleis, so strongly, that they could not be set on without great losse and damage: but shortly after, Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwick, arrived at Caleis with a number of cholen souldiers, at whose coming, the French men leaving their tents and bivouals, fled away, neuertheless, hee passed forth, spoiling and waisting the Isle of Calis with fire and sword, but as he returned toward Caleis, he fell sick, whereof he died, and the other captaynes returned without honour.

King Edward borrowed of the Bishops and other, many great summes of money, saying, he would bestow the same in defence of the Church & realme, but about this tyme he led a great army into France, whereof Sir Robert Knowles was generall, a man, who before tyme had fortunately handled the beyond sea wars, so long as they were ruled by his counsell: but towarde winter, the young Lords said they ought not to be subiect to him who was not so noble of birth, as they, and so dividing themselves into diuers companies, Sir Robert Knowles departed into Brittain to his owne callcs which he had conquered: The Lords being so divided, the frenchmen set vpon them, tooke prisoners where they liked, and due the residue.

A great part of Gascoigne fell from the pynce, because of the strange crations he laid vpon them: also sicknesse encreasing vpon him, he returned into England with his wife and his sonne Richard, and resigned into his fathers hands the gouernement of Gascoigne.

And the Parishes in the Countie of Devonshire, payd but 112. shillings, 10. d. farthing, for their great pouerty, and so was the King answered 50000. pound.

Cheshire a Countie Palantine, came not to this Parliament.

In the Citie of Chester are 10. parish Churches, and in the shire without the Citie, are 87. parish Churches, besides chappels.

The Bishops were remoued from the Offices of Chauncelloz, Treasurer, and priue seale, and lay men put in their stead.

This yere deceased the gentle knight Sir Walter de Maine in the Citie of London, wher of all the Barons of England were right soz. for the truth and god counsaile that they had alwayes seene and heard in him: he was buried with great solemnity in the Monastery of Charterhouse Spokes, which he had founded besides London, and at the day of his Obsequie, there was present the King and al his children, with the Prelates, Barons and knights of England. His lands both in England and beyond the sea fell to the Earle of Penbroke, who had to wife the Lady Anne, his daughter and heire. Also the valiant knight Sir William Molineux, who had long serued in France, and was made knight Banneret by the blake Prince, at the battell of Salars, now returning out of France died at Canterbury, about the feast of S. John Baptist. Also Sir John Mandeuille knight, a man worth the memory, bozne in S. Albons, deceased, this man from his tender yeres so addicted himselfe to study, that therein he accounted a great part of his day and felicitie to consist, for he reckoned that his worthipfull parentage little auailed, unless he enabled the same by learned skill, and literature, hauing therefore wel furnished his minde with knowledge in the Scripture, he erected his studie to Philosophie, being an Art very seemely and worthie a gentlemanlike nature, but among all other things, his desire was very great to see Asia, and Aphysica, being two mighty portions or parts of the world, furnishing himselfe therefore, he like an other Vlixe, being knowne of verie fewe of his olde acquaintance set forth.

In this his voyage he painefullly visited the Countreies of Syria the greater & the lesser, Armentia, Egypt, both the Countreies of Libya, Arabia, Syria, Media, Mesopotamia, Persia, Grecia, Illyricum, Tartaria, and other kingdomes: finally having attained the knowledge of divers tongues, left the varietie, and wonders of so many and so great things as he had sene with his eyes, and bozne away by memoize, should be bitterly drowned in oblivion, he wrote exactly in the Latine, French, and English tongues, these woakes following, viz. his Itinerarie of thre and thirtie yeeres, of the martuages of the world, and the description of Countreies: being returned into England, and noting the euill abuses of that his age and time, the godly gentleman would say, (in these our times now it may be trulier said then euer afore) that vertue is laid aside, the Church is troden downe, the Cleargie erreth, the deuill reigneth, simony beareth sway, &c.

At length he died at Leiden, the 17 of November, 1371, and was buried in the Abbey of the Williamites, thus farre Bale. To the confirmation whereof Abraham Ortelius in his Itinerarium, professing to haue sene the monument of the said Sir Iohn Mandeuill in the citie of Leiden, setteth downe the inscription thus.

Epitaph of Sir Iohn Mandeuill.

Here lieth the Noble man Sir Iohn de Mandeuille, otherwise surnamed Knight at the beard, Lord de Campdi, borne in England, a professor of Philosophie, a very deuout man in prayer, and a most bountifull bestower of his goods on the poore, who after he had traueyled almost ouer the whole world, ended his life at Leiden, the yeere of our Lord 1371, the seauenteenth of Nouember.

This is the inscription in the stone, sayeth Ortelius, in which there is grauen, the Image of an armed man, with a lion at his fete, with a two forked beard, at his head a hand blessing, with these woords in French, Thou that passe by, for charitable say prayers for me.

The shield of his armes was voyde, they said there was within it a plate, and his armes ingrauen therein, to wit, a Lion Argent, with a red crescent at his breast in a blew field, with a bozert indented Or: there was shewed his kniues, his furniture for horse, and his spurres, which he used in his traualles through the world.

Iohn Duke of Lancaster, and Edmond Earle of Cambridge, returning out of Gascoigne, brought with them two daughters of Peter late king of Spaine, whom after wards they took to be their wiues: the Duke married the elder, named Constance, and from that time wrote himselfe King of Castile.

Battell on the Sea.

The Englishmen fought a battell on the Sea with the Flemings, and tooke fise and twentie ships laden with salt.

Earle of Devon broke taken prisoner.

The Frenchmen besieged Rochell, to the remouing whereof was sente the Earle of Penbrooke, with a number of men of armes, upon whom fell the Spanishe nauie in the Hauen of Rochel, who slew and took the Englishmen, and burnt their Nauie. The Earle and many noble men were caried into Spaine, together with the Kings money. King Edward with a great nauie entred the seas towards Rochel, to haue rescued the same, but the winde being contrarie, with beaue there he returned againe, hauing spent in this preparation (as it was said) nine hundred thousand pound.

Iohn Duke of Lancaster entred France with a strong power, and passed through the Realme without battell, but in the desertes and mountaines of Auierne, for lacke of victualles, many of his armie died: from thence, he went to Burdeaur, and brought scanty forty hozes backe with him: it was commonly talked that he lost thirtie thousand hozes in that unluckie voyage. It was a great miserie to see the poore state of the men of warre, such as were Knights of great wealth in their Countrey, hauing lost men and hozes, were glad to beg from doze to doze, and found no reliefe, for the Countrey was destroyed, and not manured, by reason whereof, such dearth was in that Countrey, that victuals could scant be gotten for any money: the Duke yet wintered there. The tenth of Aprill following, a day of battell was appointed betwixt him and the Duke of Anjou at Holcoule. In the meane time, truce was taken til the twentieth of May next following, but the King of England knew nothing of it: When the day came, a great power of armed men for the french appeared, the which the Duke of Anjou had assembled, but yet that day passed without battell, to the great shame and reproch of the English, for the frenchmen said, they were ready in fiele the day appointed to looke for their comming, that came not at all, wherefore they spake many reprochfull woords against the Englishmen, calling them false cowards, and heartlesse. And such was the end of that journey.

In a Parliament it was graunted that the cathedral Churches should entoy their elections, & that from thence forth the King should not write against the elected, but should by his letters help towards their confirmation, but this statute took small effect: but the Cleargie granting a tenth, and the laitie a satten, it was paid. Iohn Thurbys Archbishop of Poike deceased, he began the new quire of the Cathedral Church of Poike, vnto the which in the laying of the first stone, he gaue 500. markes, and euery yeere after whilst he liued 200. pound to the same woike. He also adozned the Lady chapel there with a marvellous woike manshipp: he sate one and twentie yeeres, he died at Ehoize and was buried at Poike, vnto whom succeeded Alexander Neuell Canon of Poike. Also Iohn Barne Bishop of Elye deceased at Elyshops Watfeld, and was buried at Elye, vnto whom succeeded Thomas Arundell, sonne to Robert Earle of Arundell. Also William Lynce Bishop of Winchester deceased, vnto whom succeeded Henry Wakefeld.

Iohn Duke of Lancaster with all his traine of Carles, Barons, Knights, &c. returned out of Gascoigne into England in the moneth of July, after whose departure almost all Gascoigne fell from their allegiance, which they had covenanted of with the King of England, sauing Burdeaur and Bapon.

This yeere died William Wicelsey Archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth, and was buried at Canterbury: the sponkes of Canterbury, (by the Kings licence) made their election, but choosing the Cardinall of England, the King was so offended that he meant to outlaue them, and they were forced to purchase his fauour with a great price. When Simon Tibalde, alias Sudburie, (sonne to Nigellus Tibalde Gentleman of Sudburie in Suffolke) Doctor

Douour of both Lawes, Bishop of London, was from thence translated to Canterbury, and William Courcney Bishop of Hereford, was translated to London, and the Bishop of Bangor, to Hereford.

John Duke of Lancaster, William Earle of Salisbury, Reignold Lord Cobham, with Simon Sudbury and other, assembled at Bridges to treat a peace betwene the realmes of England and France, where met with them the Duke of Anjou, and many other nobles of France. This treaty continued almost two yeres, and ended without conclusion of peace, but on a truce, which feantly continued one yere.

The same time Robert Walsfield Bishop of Salisbury died, after whom succeeded Ralph Arguy, Edward le Spencer deceased in the Castle of Cardiffe, and was buried at Wobochurle. Also John Hastings Earle of Penbroke, who was taken of the Spaniards, foure yeres since was deliuered by Henry the bastard King of Spaine unto Bertram Cleyken constable of France, for a certaine summe of money, which the said Henry did owe to the said Bertram, who when he was brought to Paris, and the summe of his ransome was limited to be 6000. franks, the Lombards in Wylages became sureties therfore, and promised payment thereof, but he began to be sicke, so that the Frenchmen fearing least he should die in their hands, or ever they should get his ransome, made haste to bring him to Caleis, notwithstanding he died before he came there, and the Frenchmen were deceived of their purpose.

The Ile of Constantine was deliuered to the french King, to the great detriment of England, for which cause afterward Sir John Anley appeached Thomas Carington of treason. A great heate was in England, so that many both men and women died thereof.

A Parliament commonly called the good Parliament, was holden at Westminster, in the which, when a subsidie was demanded, answer was made by Peter de la More, Prolocutor of the Parliament, that the King needed not the substance of his poore Subiects, if he were well and faithfully gouerned, which he offered to pprove effectually, and promised that if it were found that the King had neede, his subiects should be ready most gladly to helpe him according to their power.

The knights required to haue the Lord Latimer with other, removed from about the King, whom they said did giue him euill counsell, which being done, certaine Prelates, Cardes, and other, were ordained to gouerne the King, who then was an olde man, but this endured not long. The commons also requested to haue removed out of the Kings house, a certaine proud woman called Alice Pierce, who by ouermuch familiaritie that she had with the King, was cause of much mischief in the realme, the exceeding the manner of women, take by the Kings Iustices, and sometimes by the Doctors in the Consistories, perswading and dissuading in defence of matters, and requesting things contrary to lawe and honestie, to the great dishonour of the King.

Also Richard Lions and Adam of Burie, Citizens of London, were accused by the commons, of diners fraudes and deceytes, which they had done to the King: Richard Lions for money did wisely compound and escaped, the

The eight day of June, Prince Edward departed out of this life in the Archbishops Pallace in Canterbury, who was in his time the flower of Chivalrie: he was in the scabb of S. Michael the Archangell, with great solemnitie buried at Canterbury in Chilles Church, and then King Edward created Richard sonne of Prince Edward, Earle of Chester, Duke of Cornewall, and Prince of Wales.

This yere in the moneth of June, the seruants and tenants of the Earle of Warlike maliciously rose against the Abbey and Count of Cuelham, and their tenants, doing their worst to destroy the same for ever, beating their seruants, & killing some of them, & committing to the manors of the Sponkes, they brake down the pales of their parkes & burnt them, slew their bere, they brake the hedges of the ponde & fish poles, let out the water, toke the fish, and did many other damages, minding to haue destroyed the house, and ouerthrowen the walls if the King had not sent commandement to the Earle to restrain these malefactours, and troublers of the peace, thus for feare of the King, and mediation of friends, a peace was made, but no sufficient recompence, for the damage was much more then the parties were able to make amends for: because of this presumption of the Earle, the King put him out of his counsell, & would not be gouerned by the other Lords that were appointed therunto by parliament, but he sent for the Duke of Lancaster againe to gouerne the realme, by which occasion all they that before were banished the Court, came againe, as the Lord Latimere, Alice Pierce, and other, whose counsell he followed euen to the end of his life. The forsaide Alice made so familiar with the king, as also her companions, that is to say, the Lord Latimere, and Sir Richard Scire, that at their becke, the King promised all matters of the Realme to be disposed, whereupon they being desirous to be reuenged vpon their accusers, ceased not until by the kings and Dukes authoritie they had gotten Sir Peter de la More, to the kings court, whom without any answer, against all iustice, they sent to the Castle of Newark, there to be imprisoned. The Duke now laboured against William Wicham Bishop of Winchester, taking occasion by al wayes & meanes he possibly could to indomage him, at the last amongst other things that he oblied against him, he charged him to haue been false unto the King, at what time he was Lord chancellor, & although the bishop in declaring of his innocence was ready to bring forth for himselfe both sufficient reasons and witness, yet notwithstanding he caused him to be condemned without making answer, William Skip with being Justice, and by the Kings authoritie toke from him all the tempozall goods of his Bishopricke, and that he might get the peoples fauour, he moued the King to giue the said goods to the Prince called Richard of Burdeaur, and so he used the pong Princes name for his owne helpe. Furthermore, in the Kings name, he forbad the Bishop to presume to come within xij. miles of the Kings presence.

In the meane time the Kings sicknesse increased, and Physicians began to dispayre of his recovery, although the forsaide Alice together with Isabell her daughter did lie by him euery night. The Duke now who determined all matters matters of the Realme, commanded Postimer Earle of Marche to go to Caleis, where hauing set al things in order, he should diligently view al the other Castles nere there about, but the Earle as he was a man of a good wit, considered that it was a dangerous time, and that the Duke had an olde hatred against him; more he called to remembrance, how the Duke had vniuersally imprisoned Sir Peter de la More, his steward, and had oppressed the Bishop of Winchester whom he had exempted from p'stallage of the kings pardon, and desired to doe the like to him, if he could, he chose therefore rather to lose the rod, then his life, wherefore he restored the rod of his sparrhalship vnto the Duke, saying he would not for a small commoditie wazpe himselfe into so great daunger.

The Duke reioycing that he might with some honour reward Sir Henry Percie, presently gaue vnto him the rod, and made him Marshall of England, and by this meanes Sir Henry Percie was loyded to the Duke, but incurred as much hatred of the whole communalte, as he had gotten fauour and love of the Duke.

The King kept his Christmasse at Haueking Aboure, where then for the great infirmitie of his body in his beanes he lay sicke.

The Duke vsing the kings authoritie, directed warrants to al the Lords, & Barons of the Realme, that after Christmas on Monday, 15. dayes after S.
Hilary, they should come to the Parliament at London, wherein the matters of the Realme were to be talked of. So this Parliament came Richard of Bur-deau the Prince, with a great number of Noble men, and Knights, whom the Londoners at his coming presented with siuers honourable gifts, and the Duke of Lancaster also, seemed to honor him above the rest, placing him in the Kings seate, & taught him to demaund, that they would giue the King two cenths in one p're, or els of al the merchandise sold in the realme of England for one p're xii. d. of euery pound, of euery firehouse one peny, and of euery knights for one pound of silver, & presently the Duke prosecuted the demaund, saying that of necessity one of those popnts ought to be granted, for that the enemies had now proclaimed warre, & would invade the realme. The knights of the Parliament, whom the Duke had made at his pleasure, desired respect they might deliberat: ly answer him, for all the other knights that in the last Parliament had stoutly stand with the communalte, he had caused to be remoued, except thoselue whom hee could not remoue, a day was appointed them. Of the greater part, master Hungerford was elected to deliuer their an-swere, who was a knight very familiar with the duke, and was his Steward.
Thoselue whom hee had said to haue remained, endeouored that Sir Peter de la More might deliuer their answer, and also to answer all objections that should be laid against him in presence of the Lords. And further, if he should be found faultie, to submit himselfe to the iudgement of the noble men present, but the knights prevailed nothing in their sute. For when one of the knights b'rged the matter more then other, he was willed to holde his peace, otherwise it might cost him his life. Whilste these things were in handling, a sub-ble was demaunded for the king of the whole Cleargie, They therefore treating of this matter, first made a common complaint before the Archbishop of Canterbury of the injury offered vnto their brother William Wicham Bishop of Winchester, which was also injury vnto them al, and to the whole libertie of the Church, wherefore they affirmed they would not treat of other matters, vntill all the number of the Cleargie were together, for they pityng his fall, were moued against the Archbishop, thinking him a great bited man for the Duke, and notwithstanding the Archbishop affirmed, the foresaid Bishop to be prohibited by the King, not to come nere vnto his presence, yet least he should be compelled, he sent a commandment for him, that he should come vp to the Conuocation of the Cleargie at London, who making no delay, came with a small number of seruants, that before time was thought to excell all other in multitude attending vpon him, he was joyfully receiued of his felow Bishops.

In the meane tyme the Duke ceased not with his fellows to imagine how he might bring that to passe, which he had long conceived in his minde: for he saw that it would be hard for him to obtaine his purpose, the Church standing in his full state, and herse dangerous to attempt publicly to doe those things, the lawes and customes of London being in force, wherefore he laboured first to ouerthrow, as well the liberties of the Church, as of the Citie:
for the which cause, he called vnto him a certaine diuine, who many yeres before in all his acts in the schooles, had inuaded against the Church, for that he had ben deppriued by the Archbishop of Canterbury from a certaine benefice that he vniuersally (as was said) was incumbent vpo within the Citie of Wyford, his name was John Wicliffe, who with his disciples, were of the common people called Lollards, they went bare-footed, and basely clothed, to wit, in coarse ruste garments down to the heeles, they preached, especially against monks, and other religious men that had possessions, &c. Amongst other things, he de-priued the bishop to haue authoritie to excommunicate any person, and that any Wiclit might absolue such a one as well as the Pope:

That neither the King, nor other secular Lord could giue any things perpetually to any person of the Church:

That (as he affirmed) in the time of William Rufus it was practised in England, for whom, as for other Kings of the Realme (notwithstanding he toke away the Church goods (the Church of England prayeth, which if she do lawfully, then she doth well: and to say she doth it unlawfully, were absurd.

That the temporall Lords (if they had wade) might lawfully take the goods of such religious persons, to relieue their necessities, &c. When he had taught these and many other, not onely in the Schooles at Wyford, but also had preached them publicly in London, that he might thereby get the fauour of the Duke and others, whom he had found prone to heare his opinion, not onely Lords, but also certaine Citizens of London, (for he was not onely eloquent, but also seemed to contemne temporall goods, for the loue of eternall riches, and therefore his conuersation was with those religious that had no possessions, and adioyned himselfe vnto the begging Friars, appoyning their povertie, and extolling their perfection) The Duke Ray, and Sir Henry Percy, commended highly his opinions, and endeoured to extoll his learning and honestie of life about all other. Who therefore being thus set forth with their fauour, feared not to spread his doctrine, much more then before, going from Church to Church, and preaching his opinions. Whereupon at length, the Bishops awakened their Archbishop, who sent for this John to come and answer to those things that were spoken of him. And the Duke hearing thereof, sent for foure Doctors of Diuinitie, one of euery order of the begging friars, aduertising them, that with a naturall and olde hate, he pursued the religious persons that had possessions, neither was it difficult to compell the willing friars to ayde him in this point.

Discord in
at London.

John Wickliffe was to appeare before the Bishops on Thursday the nineteenth day of february there to be conuicted, for words that he had spoken, who, after the ninth houre, the Duke, and Sir Henry Percy, and others other officers going before him, was brought forth, not only by common sergeants, but also Sir Henry Percy himselfe, who was chiefe Marshall of England being by the way animated by his fauourers, not to feare the Bishops, neither the concourse of the people, seeing that he was walled in with so many knights and other: he was brought into Saint Pauls Church, where such a multitude of people was gathered together to heare him, that it was hard for the noblemen to passe through & that he might escape death intended him by many Bishops. And first a dissension being raised betwene the noblemen & Bishops, it was thought his answer should haue been deferred. But when the people being gathered round together, stayed to giue place vnto the noblemen, Sir Henry Percy abusing his authority, picked forwarde the people, which the Bishop of London seeing, prohibited him to exercise such authority in the Church, saying, that if he had knowne he would haue used himselfe so there, he should not haue come into the Church, if he could haue letted him. Which the Duke hearing, and being offended, protested, that he would exercise such authority whether he would or not. When they were come into the Ladies Chappell, the Duke and Barons, with the Archbishop and Bishops sitting downe, the foresaid John was also sent in by Sir Henry Percy, and by him willed to sit downe, for because (said he) he hath much to answer, he hath neede of a better seate. On the other side, the Bishop of London affirmed it to be against reason, and also contrary vnto Lawe, that he should sit, who there was cited to answer before his ordinary: hereupon very contemptuous words did arise betwene Sir Henry Percy, and the Bishop, so that the whole multitude began to be troubled, and then the Duke began to reprehend the Bishop with foule words, and the Bishop to turne the like to the Duke againe: whereupon the Duke being angry that he could not in this strise preuaile, swore that he would pull downe both the pride of him, and of all the Bishops in England, and added, thou trustest (said he) in thy parents, who can profite thee nothing. The Bishop answered, I trust not in my parents, nor in the life of any man, but in God, in whom I ought to trust: then the Duke whispering in his eare, said, he had rather draw him forth of the Church by the haire of the head, then to suffer such things at his hand.

The

The Londoners hearing these words, with a loud voice cryed out swearing they would not suffer their Bishop to be thus injured, and that they would rather lose their liues then their Bishop should be dishonestly bled in his Church, or pulled out as was threatened. Their furie was the more increased against the Duke, for that the day before in the Parliament at Westminster, the Duke being president: It was requested in the Kings name that from that day forward there should be no more spaies of London, according to the ancient custome, but a Captaine should be appointed, and that the Marshall of England, as well in the citie as in other places, might arrest such as offended, with many other things, which were manifestly against the liberties of the Citie: which being once heard John Philpot a worthy Citizen arose, and answered, &c.

The morrow after, the Londoners assembling themselves together, took council vpon such deniaunds, as the day before the Lords of Woodstocke, and Sir H. Percy had had concerning the creation of a Captaine in the Citie, and of the use of the Marshalls office, &c. Besides of the iniurie that was offered to their Bishop, and other matters: and whilst there was great adoe and long talke about these things, there entered into the Citie the Lord Fitzwater, and Guido Brian, to whether to know in their minds, or for other wise cause, but the commons scarcely held their hands from beating them that came vnto them, till at the length they had sworne their coming was not for any hurt vnto them or the city. The Lord Fitzwater hauing gotten savor at the Citizens hands, began his Oratyon, the effect whereof was, that he being by ancient inheritance standard bearer to the city, was to take iniuries offered vnto them, as vnto himselfe, & therefore willing them to looke to their defence, they presently took armes, and ranne with great rage to the Marshalls Inn, they brake by the gates, and dore, brought out a prisoner gyles & al, wherein his fate were fastned, intending to burne them in the midst of the city. Sir Henry Percys fought for, the armed men ran by and downe, but all in vaine, for that day he and the Duke were to dine with one John of Eyre, but the Londoners knew it not: for they thought that he and the Duke had been at the Banquet, and therefore with all haste posted thither, but one of the Dukes knights seeing these things, in great haste came to the place where the Duke was, and after he had knocked and could not get in, he saide to Haueland the Porter, I shon loue my Lord and thy life, open the gate, with which words, he got entry, and with great feare he telles the Duke, that without the gate were infinite numbers of armed men, and vnto he took great heed, that day should bee his last. With which words, when the Duke heard them, he leapt so hastily from his officers, that he hurt both his legges against the fourme: wine was offered to his officers, but hee would not drinke for haste, he fledde with his fellowe Sir Henry Percy, no man following them, and entering the Thames neuer stinted rowing until they came to a boule nere the Spanes of Remington (besides Lambeth) where at that time the Princeesse was, with the young Prince, before whom hee made his complaint. The Princeesse hauing heard their talke, comforted them, promising sing that he would make a final ende of all those matters.

The common people of the Citie not knowing that the Duke was dead, in great fury hastened to the Banquet, and a priest chancing to meete them, asked of some what that busines meant. Whereunto he was answered, that they went to take the Duke and the Lord Percy, that they might be compelled to deliver to them, Sir Peter de la More, whom they uniusly kept in prison: the Priest said that Peter de la More was a traitour to the King, and was worthy to be hanged. With which words they all cried, this is Percy, this is the traitour of England, his speech betwixt him, though he be disguised in apparel: then ran they all upon him, striking who should give him his death wound, after they had wounded him, they carried him to prison, where he died. The Bishop of London, William Courtenay, hearing that the Citizens hastened to the Banquet, left his dinner and met with them, admonishing the to be mindful of the holy time, for it was Lent and for the love of Christ to leave off such scottish doings, affirming that he would bring all things that were done against them to good ende. And doubtlesse had not the Bishop aduised their mad mooves, the Duke and the Lord Percy had that day lost their lives, but by the Bishops means the matter was pacified for the time, and every man got him to his stone house. When were the Dukes armes hanged by reversed in signe of treason, in the most principall streets of the Citie, uncertaine by whom all that were the Dukes signe or colours, were faine to hide them, conveying them from their necks, into their bosome. The Princessse (wife to Edward late deceased) desirous to make peace, sent unto London these knights, Alber de Vere, Simon Burley, and Lewes Clifford, to perswade them, to make peace with the Duke, unto whom the Citizens made answer, that they would doe for her honor, whatsoever she had commanded, but yet they enioyned the knights, to will the Duke, that he should suffer the Bishop of Winchester to come to his answer, and to be tried by his peers, and also to permit Peter de la More to answer for himselfe, after the custome of the lawe; and as for the third, they said they would account a traitor: wheresoever he should be found. The said knights no other wise then they had heard of the Citizens, reported unto the Duke with full mouth, whereby they made the Duke very wofull, for where as they had spoken of a traitor, this (said he) they speake of me, though it be not true.

The Londoners went to the King about their liberties.

John Philpot.

The Londoners having held a council about this matter, sent of their chief Citizens, either to iustifie, or to excuse that which had hapned, who long to come to the kings presence, being kept backe by the duke, at length the duke tolde them that the King was very euill at ease, and that his sickness might be increased, if that he were mooued to anger, by their speech. But the Citizens, whose chiefe man and speaker was John Philpot answered the Duke, that they were not come, by any meane to augment the Kings sicknesse, but rather to mitigate his griefe, that he might be strong to defend them. Moreover, they said they were charged not to communicate those matters which they had in commission from the Citie unto any other then unto their Lord the King. At length having gotten access, they shewed unto the King

how it had been published in the Parliament, that it was his will, that contrary to their liberties, the Duke should be deposed, and a Captaine created, and other matters in the Parliament, which sounded against their liberties. Also they excused themselves of diuers things which had been done, during the time of the commotion of the communalitie of the Citie, saying they were not psonable to any such doing, but y amongst so great a multitude, some lewd people had done such things, neither so great a multitude could be mooued by the exhortation of the Duke, when they were once by together. The King being a little cheered up with their comming, answered, that he would not the diminishing of their liberties, no, he was rather ready, if neede were, to augment them, neither did any such resolutions euer come out of his mouth, and therefore, he willed them not to feare, but to returne and appeale the Citizens, and to keepe them in peace.

In the meane space some men ceased not to make rymes in reproch of the Duke, and to fasten them in diuers places of the Citie, whereby the greater fury of the people might be kindled, the Dukes fame blotted, and his name had in detestation. Which thing when the Duke heard, he requested the Bishops to pronounce sentence of excommunication upon all those that by such rymes maliciously did hurt his fame. The Bishop of Bangor therfore (the Aldermen of the Citie assisting him) publickly excommunicated all those that diffamed the Duke, &c.

Differences of the Duke communicated.

A few daies after the Duke went unto the Parliament, that for the causes expressed had been pretermitted: the Duke and noble men being set, they demanded an answer of the knights of the shires, of these things which had bin demanded of them: who answered, that they would to helpe their soueraigne Lord the King graunt, not of every house one penny, but of every person, man or woman above the age of fouretene yeres one groat throughout England, so that the money should be gathered into the hands of certaine Cardes and Barons untill they saw how such a summe should be spent. The cleargie also graunted the like subsidy, for helpe of the King, of every head, as well religious men as women, as secular priests one groate, if they were not promoted, but of every religious person promoted twelve pence.

A great subsidy granted.

The duke hauing obtained as he desired, the tate of all the heads of the whole realme, was not yet quiet, for the injury done against him by the Londoners: whereso he caused the king to send for the Duke, Aldermen and Shireffs of London, who being brought into the kings chamber of presence, (being then at his manour of Shene) they found the king placed in a chaire, not able well to speake, for the griefe of his sickness, & the Archbishop, with other Bishops, the Duke and the Kings sonnes with many Lords & men of honour sitting about him. Where after due reuerence made, and silence commaunded, Sir Robert Aston began an oration, perswading the Citizens to confesse their great and heinous offences against the king, and Duke, & to submit themselves to their mercy. Whereunto the Londoners answered, that they had not conspired against the Duke, neither had there been any shamefull thing spoken or done against him that they did knowe of, or consent unto, which thing they were ready to p[ro]ue before their soveraigne Lord the King, and the Duke himself. Yet notwithstanding they affirmed, that they could not stay the folly of the common people, by whom that which had chanced was committed: wherefore the said Citizens requested the King that he would not punish those that were innocent and ignorant of the fact: but they for reverence of the King, promised the Duke, that they would endeavour themselves to bring in the common people, and to compell them by lawe to make due satisfaction; and more (said they) we are not able to doe for the Duke, that may be to his honor. And at this word, with the Kings will, they were dismissed, full merry when they saluted the Court with their backs.

A procession of the Citizens of London.

After this the King sent unto them, secretly commanding them to call all the Citizens together, and to make one waire Candle or Taper with the armes of the Duke his sonne, in the same Taper, and carry the same in a solemn procession to Saint Pauls Church, there continually to burne before the Image of our Lady, continued at the charges of the citie. The waire Taper therfore being made, the Citizens by voyce of the crier, are generally called together, at which call, they come to heare the cause of their calling, but the communalitie and those of the poorer sort contemned to be present at such a procession, and therefore with indignation every one departed home to his house, only the worshipful and best sorte of the Citizens make the procession, placing the Taper of waire where they were commanded. But the Duke not contented with this satisfaction, he threatened the Citizens, and said, that that which they had done was nothing gratefull unto him, nay said he, it rather reboundeth to my great shame, chiefly, for that while he was alive and well in health, they had in such sort offered his armes wrought in a waire Taper.

On the other side, the Citizens affirmed that they had exp[re]ssely done that which his father had commanded them, and would have done any thing that might have pleased him. To whome the Duke answered, that they knewe his minde, and were not ignorant howe to make satisfaction: with which wordes the Citizens were much troubled, for (quoth they) amongst themselves, he would have us to proclaim him King: but this shall never be done, and so they departed, wofull friends the they were before. And the Duke ceased not till he had put downe Adam Seaple M[ay]or, in whose place Nicholas Brembor was elected, and on the nine and twentieth of March toke his oth at the Tower of London. Also the Aldermen were deposed and other set in their places.

marking, providing not onely for himselfe, but also for the oppression and losses of his Church. Wherefore, knowing that Alice Pierce could do all things that she would, and there was not any man y<sup>e</sup> would in any thing resist her will, he requested her helpe, he offered her money, he promised her great friendship, if she could helpe his Bishopricke forth of such troubles: she promised easily to dispatch his cause, and not refusing that which was offered, went to trie if any sparke of love yet remained in the King. He therfore that long had been taken with her love, enticed with her speech, supposed nothing to be denied her now that she asked: against the Dukes will, he commanded his temporallities to be given unto him againe, and so the Bishop by right and wrong, recovered that which was lost.

The fourteenth of Aprill died the Lady Mary of Saint Paul, Countesse of Penbroke, a woman of singular example, for living to the honor of God, and gloze of her house, in relieving poore mens necessities, she spent her goods, that to the Dukes and Princes she shewed examples of good workes: and bying, she gave all her substance, either to her servants, or to divers Churches, but especially to poore people: she founded Penbroke Hall in Cambridge, and named it Anla Maria de Valence in Anno. 1343.

About the same time the Earle of Salisburie, and Sir Richard Anglisson a Porton, the Bishop of Saint Davids, the Bishop of Hereford, Geoffrey Chaucer, (the famous Poet of England,) and other, were sent into Fraunce to treat a peace, or at the least a truce for this yere or more, but they could not obtaine any longer truce, then for one moneth, which they utterly refused. Whereupon they stayed in Fraunce about these things, and some thinking they might safely have passed betwixt Caleis and Douer, about fiftie taking ship, were forthwith intercepted by the Walleses, and were all slain, two men and two women onely excepted, even in the very sight of the Colonell-men of Caleis, they being not able to give them any ayde: Sir Hugh Calveley being at that present time Capitaine of Caleis, toke this so great an iniurie in very enill part, especially for that it was done, whilest they were yet treating of peace, but he could not helpe it, wherefore forthwith he toke with him a number of the best and chosen out men, and purposing to requite this iniurie, made a roade into France, killing a great number of men, and brought backe with him a great boote of artillery and cattell, the messengers returned into England, and brought nothing backe with them, but rumour and waire.

King Edward foddren (as it were) with the disease of the Annuli (which time Alice Pierce was given him of God to the ble of penitence) had almost sodainly died, neglecting the benefite of time that God had given him, like as he should never have died: trusting the fond fables of the ofte named Alice, when she affirmed, he should recover his health, so that at that time he talked rather of hawking and hunting, then of any thing that pertained to the saving of his soule, onely he granted pardon of death for offences, throughout his Kingdome to the inhabitants. Being now sodainly taken with the day of his death, he began to have manifest signes thereof: what Alice Pierce then did, any man may judge,

Thus parding him such thanks for his benefites, she bade him adieu, and so withiove w her selfe from him.

Death of King
third.

The King being thus at the point of death, was left not onely of her the said Alice Piers, but of other the Knights and Esquires, who had serued him, allured more with his gifts then his loue. Amongst a thousand there was onely present at that time a certaine Priest, of other of his folkes applying the spoile of what they could lay hands on) who lamenting the Kings misery, and inwardly touched with griefe of heart, for that amongst so many Counsellors which he had, there was none that would minister to him the word of life, came holdely vnto him, and aduonished him to lift vp the eyes, as well of his body as of his heart vnto God, and with sighes to aske mercy of him, whose maistie he well knew he had grievously offended, whereupon the King listning to the wordes of the priest, although he had a little before wanted the vse of his tongue, yet then taking strength to him, seemed to speake what was in his mind, and then what for weaknesse of his body, contrition of his heart, and sobbing for his sins, his voyce and spech fayled him, and scarce halfe pronouncing this word Iesu, he with this last word made an ende of his spech, and pailed by the Ghost at his pamos of shine, (now Richmond) on the 21. day of June, in the yere of our Lord 1377. and the 65. yere of his age, when he had reigned 50. yeres, 4. moneths and odde dayes, whose body was after wards sollemnely buried at Westminster.

This King surpassed al his predecessours, through vertue graunted to him from above, in a certaine excellency of magnanimitie of heart, for he neuer feared any thing, or changed countenance for any misfortunate chancas when they happened, a noble wartier, and fortunate, for as well by land as by sea, in warlike condias he obtained the victorie, gentle, familiar, & courteous as well toward strangers, as his owne countrey men and subiects, deuoute in Gods seruice, for he had the Church and ministers thereof in great reuerence. In worldly cares tractable, prouident in counsel, and discret, in swaite of language affable and meeke, in gesture and manners wel ordered and ripe, hauing compasio of the afflicted: in bestowing of benefites very liberal, in abundance of twentih modest enough, in erecting of buildings marvellous curious, bearing losses patiently, great much to hauing & hunting, to the which, whilst he had time, as the season of the yere gaue, he applied himselfe greatly, he was liberrall in gifts, and prodigall in expences, proper of person, in stature neither such as excelled the meane bygnes of men, nor yet of the tallest sort, hauing a countenance more reuerent, then was commonly in men, but rather like an Angel, in which did shine such a marvellous grace, that such as beamed of him, hoped the day folloving for good lucke, he gouerned his kingdome euentill his old yeres valiantly, wisely, and royally. But yet he did not refraine riotous lust, carnall concupiscence, nor motions, of the flesh, euen in his extream age, and so (as was thought) for his intemperancie ended his life the soner.

He had issue by the Lady Philip his wife, seven sonnes, Edward the blacke Prince, William of Hatfield that died yong, Leonel Duke of Clarence, Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Edmond of Langley Carle of Cambridg, and Duke of York, William of Windsor, y died without issue, Thomas of Woodstocke Carle of Buckingham, and Duke of Gloucester: and five daughters, Isabel married to the Lord Coucy, Carle of Bedford, Ioane Quene of Spaine, Blanch that died yong, Mary married to Iohn Mountfort Duke of Byptaine, and Margaret Countesse of Pembroke. He founded Westminster, commonly called new abbey here vnto the tower of London, wherein he placed white monks of the order Cisteraux, to the honour of God, and our Lady of grace, according to a vow by him made, being on the seas in great perill, by meanes of a tempest: he founded an abbey for Nunnes at Wertsford in Kent, he founded the kings hall in Cambridg for yonge schollers, (which hall with others was suppressed by K. Henry the 8. for the foundation of Trinities Colledge there) he also founded an Hospitall for the poore, and named it Maison de Dieu, or Gods house, in the town of Caleis, he redified or newly builded St. Steuens Chappell at Westminster, altering the same into a colledge of a Deane, 12. secular Chanons, 12. Vicars, and other ministers & seruants, and indeed it with revenues to the value of 500. pounde by yere. He also redified or almost newly builded the Castle of Winderloz. He also augmenting the Chappell there, which his progenitors kings of Englañd, had before erected of 8. Chanons, he added to them a Deane and 15. Chanons, 24. yonge & impotent knights and other ministers. Quene Mary was the first that brought water to that castle by Conduite, which before was watered by welles. It remaineth of recorde which I haue seene, that tithe hath been paid at Windsor for wine pressed out of grapes, that were wonted to grow in the little parke there.

Richard of Burdeaux.

Richard the 2. borne at Burdeaur, the sonne of Prince Edward, being but eleuen yeres old, began his reigne the 21. day of June, in the yere of our Lord God 1377. In beauty, bounty, and liberrallty, he far passed all his progenitors, but was overmuch giuen to rest and quietnes, louing little dedes of armes, and for that he was yong, was much ruled by yong counsell, and regarded nothing the counsels of the sage and wise men of the Realme, which thing turned this land to great trouble, and himselfe to extreme miserie, as is by these verses declared. When this King first began to raigne, the Lawes neglected were, Wherefore good fortune him forlooke, and the earth did quake for feare, The people also whom he polde, against him did rebell. The time doth yet bewaile the woes, that Chronicles doe tell.

And graue aduice of aged heads he did reiect and leaue,
And then for greedy thurt of Coyne, some subiects he accused,
To gaine their goods into his hands, thus he the realme abused.

On the foresaid 21. of June, before the old King was departed, the Londoners hauing certaine knowledge, yf he could not liue any season, sent the chiefest and most worthy citizens of their citie, vnto Kennington, where the prince and his mother remained, to declare vnto the said prince their ready minds, & good will to accept him for their true and lawfull King and Governour, John Philpote being especially appointed to do the message, began his Oracion thus.

John Philpote
the Prince.

We bring newes, most excellent Prince (which without great sorrow we cannot rehearse) of the vndoubted death of our most inuincible King Edward your Grandfather, who hath kept and gouerned vs, and this kingdom (as I may say) a long time in quiet peace; and now by the manifest tokens of death in him, he hath ceased to be our Governour: wherefore we beseech you, on the behalfe of the Citizens, and City of London, that you will haue recommended to your good grace, the City your chamber, whom we knoweledge shortly to be our King, to whose rule we onely submit our selues, and bow to your will and pleasure vnder your dominion to serue in word and dede. And that we recite further our message, your reuerence knoweth, your City to be vnspcakably troubled, for that you haue withdrawne your presence from it, which is knowne to be so much at your deuotion, that the Citizens are not onely ready to spend their goods for your sake, but also to leopord their liues. Wherefore we come to your presence, to beseech you that it may please you to remaine there, both to the comfort of vs your citizens, and also to the surety and solace of your selfe. We further beseech you most noble Prince, that you would vouchsafe to make some good and profitable end of the discord, which lately hath risen throughe the malice of some, and not to the commodity of any, but to the hindrance and discomfort of many, betwixt our Citizens, and the Duke of Lancaster. To these and other like words uttered by the said John Philpote, it was answered by the Prince, and his counsell, that he would doe his endeour to satisfie their desire in all things, and so being sent away, they returned bringing glad tidings to their fellow Citizens.

The next morrow there was sent to London, on the Kings behalfe, the Lord Latimer, Sir Nicholas Bond, Sir Simon Burley, & Sir Richard Adderbery, which in name of the new King saluted the citizens with their message of the new King to wardens, who promised to loue them and their city, & to come to them as they had requested: they also told the citizens, how the King had spoken to the Duke for them, and how the Duke in all things had submitted himselfe to the Kings will, that they also should submit themselves in the same maner; and then the King would endeour himselfe that peace should concluded, to the honor and commodity of the citizens: but the citizens fearing such forme of peace as might happen, answered, that they would not in any wise so doe, especially because they knewe the King to be but yong, and weak to helpe them in such a troublesome businesse, & that their cause should not be discussed by him, but by their deadly enemies, & so they should be punished at their pleasure, if they consented to the Kings request in that article. At length after talke had vpon this businesse, sixe houres together or more, they light vpon this point, that if the said knights would be bound to the citizens, that their submission should not redound to the temporal loss, or bodily harine of any Citizen, or preiudice of their Citie, they would gladly obey the Kings commaundment. The knights desirous to satisfie the Kings desire, and to prouide for the quietnes of the Citizens, undertooke by othe of fidelitie, and their knighthood, that it should not be to their preiudice, but to their commodity, if they would submit themselves. This surety receiued, the Citizens toke their iourney towards Shene, where they found the new King with his mother, the Duke and the Dukes brethren; there were also many Bishops gathered about the dead bodie of the late King: The coming of the Citizens being knowne to the King, he straight commaunded them to be called before him, the which Citizens as before besought him to restore the peace betwixt the Duke and them, affirming that they were ready in all things to submit themselves vnto his will and pleasure, not as though they confessed they had made any fault against the Duke, but as men that came at this time for the benefit of peace, and honour, alway to the King, as the Duke, to pacifie the hearts, and mitigate the displeasure of both.

The Duke seeing them in this manner to haue submitted themselves to the King, though (as it was said) he had other matters in his head, yet fearing that he should not after ward come to so honorable conditions, if he refused this forme of peace, fell down at the Kings feet, and beseeched him to take the cause in hand vnder the forme that the Londoners had expressed, desiring therewith that they which had been imprisoned for any dishonour offered him, might be with the Kings fauour released and set at libertie: And so he did forgive the Citizens whatsoeuer they had committed against him, and receiued them into his full fauour, in the presence of the King, affirming with an oth that he would be their friend, and as carefull for their commodities as for his owne, and in token of an vnfaigned peace, he kissed every one of them before the King, and so with quietnes, the Citizens returned home praising God, that had brought the Duke to such humilitie, who a little before had demanded in great pride, of the Citizens for his fauour, one hundred hogheads of wine, & an infinite number of precious stones. The Friday next following the Duke and Citizens came to Westminster, where was proclaimed the union and agreement betwixen them.

The yong King desirous at his entring to the kingdom to haue an vnlike amongst his subiects in every place, brought the Duke and the Bishoppe of Winchester to be at one, and wheresoeuer in his Realme he knew any discord and variance to be risen, he toke the quarrels into his hands, promising to make a good and sensfull end for both parties. He also deliuered Peter de la More, (a knight of Herefordshire) out of the Castell of Nottingham, where he had bene long imprisoned, and by his letters patents released him of all things whatsoeuer, in the name of the King might be laid vnto him.

men take the towne of Rye and burn it.

Upon the feast day of Saint Peter and Paul the Apostles in the morning, the Frenchmen with fine vessels, great and small, invaded the towne of Rye, and with small labour took the towne, albeit the towne dwellers upon confidence of strength, had taken order that none should remove their goods from the towne, that at the least wise, for love of their goods, they might with more courage abide the conflicts: yet notwithstanding they turne their backs in the time of battell, whereupon it came to passe, that by their want of heart and courage, the towne was taken with all their goods.

with fire.

The Abbot of Battale hearing of so lamentable a report, put his men in armor to defend the villages nigh adjoining, & one of the enemies going forth for forage, being taken by one of the Abbots men, declared that the French men purposed to keepe the said towne for ten daies, whereupon the Abbot remoured with his power to the towne of Winchelsey, which towne (as the prisoner reported) the French purposed to assault, but when they saw the Abbot and his men armed in that towne, dispying of further entrance into that Countrey, they begin to set fire on the towne of Rye, and within five houres brought it wholly into ashes, with the Church that then was there of a wonderful beaultie, conveying away foure of the richest of that towne prisoners, and slaying 66. left not about eight in the towne: 42. hodgheads of wine they caried from thence to their ships, with the rest of their bottie, and left the towne desolate.

King Richard
crowned.
Charles created knights made.

King Richard was crowned with great solemnity at Westmister by the hands of Simon Sudbury Archbishop of Canterbury, on the 16. day of July. At this coronation K. Richard created foure new Charles, Thomas of Woodstocke, K. Edwards yongest sonne Earle of Buckingham and Northampton, to whom he gaue 1000. markes yearly out of his treasury, till he had provided him land to that value. Thomas Mowbray of Arphelme, earle of Nottingham, Guisard of Gifford Angolme knight of Calcoigne, and master to the king, Earle of Huntington, to whom he likewise gaue 1000. markes yearly out of his treasury, till he had provided him lands to that value. And Henry Percy, Earle of Northumberland. He also made nine knights, to wit, Edward sonne to Edmond Earle of Kent, John sonne to Thomas Roos of Hamelake, Robert de Gray of Rotherfield, Richard sonne to Gilbert Talbot, Gerard sonne to Warine de Lisse, Michael sonne to Michael de la Pole, Richard de Poynings, Robert de Harrington, and Thomas de la More.

Michael sonne
to Michell.

Sir John Burleigh knight, the kings Chamberlaine, Custos of Pottingham castle, was also for terme of life by patent, made keeper of the Forrest of Sherwood. And Simon Burleigh knight his brother, was made Constable of Winchester castle, Wigmore, Gutford, and the Manor of Benington, and also master of the kings shalcons at his Spues, nere Charing-crosse by Westmister, this Sir Simon Burleigh had his house in London in Thames Strate betwixt Barnards castle & Pauls wharfe, which house sometime belonged to the abbe of Fylcamp, & by reason of the wars in France came to the kings hands.

About the same time, Henry Percy marshall of England, and Earle of Northumberland, resigned the rodde of his office, and went home to his countrey, in whose place John of Arundale, brother to the Earle of Arundale was sent, John balliantly resisted the Frenchmen, when they assailed the towne of South-hampton, and manfully kept them off from entering the towne, being chased to the sea.

About the same time, of a small cause discord rose in the sayde of Rochester, betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, and certaine on both sides being slain, the Scots were put to the worse. Whereupon being turned into a surp, thostly returning to the towne with the Earle of Dunbarre, they entered in the night, due to the townsmen, spoiled their goods, & committed the towne to the fire: which thing being known, the new Earle of Northumberland forsooking inwardly euen at the heart for the death of the slaine townsmen, determined to reuenge their death upon the enemies, & entering into Scotland with 10000 men, he took prizes in the land of the Earle of Dunbarre, for the space of thre daies together, burning vp all that came in his way, & returned with his people.

The one and twentieth of August, the French men took the vnbinnable (that I may so call it) Isle of Wight, more by craft, then by force, which Ile had not been taken by any men, if the same had been wel kept with diligent watch, but the euer assured security of the Island men, brought on them their destruction, and to the French vnhoped for victory. In deed the Frenchmen being dyuen on the shore by tempest, attempted to enter the Ile, supposing the Island men had not been aware of their coming: but the purpose of the french was not known to the watchmen, and therefore they suffered them to enter on the land, to the ende, that after so many were come on land, as they supposed they might deale with, the residue should be kept off, but it chanced otherwise then they thought, for as we said, some being entred, when the Wightmen would haue stopped the other, the Frenchmen pressed forward with such force, that they repulsed the Island men from their ground, so that they were dyuen to seeke refuge by hiding themselves.

French men
took the Isle of Wight.

The French therefore hauing thus gotten the Island, did much hurt in slaying the inhabitants, burning certaine townes, and taking the substance from the people: at length comming to the castle, and thinking to haue wonne it with final adoe, they finde there a picke of incredible sharpnes, for Sir Hugh Tirl kaper of the said castle, boldly comming to encounter them, made great slaughter among them, by reason whereof they left from assailing that castle, and from thenceforth thinking it not good to dwell on nere a Serpent, they gathered together what spoyle they might of the Ile, and constrained the Islanders to get of their friends without the Ile, a thousand marks of silver for the sauing of their houses from burning, and for the residue of their goods. Moreover, taking of them an oath of fidelitie, not to resist the for the space of one yere, whensoever it should please the to land there, they departed thence to their galleies, and againe coasted the shore about till they came to the towne of Winchester, where vnderstanding the abbot of Battal was come to defend it, they sent him word to redeme the towne, vnto whom the abbot answered, he needed not to redeme the thing that was not lost, but willed the to desist from molesting the towne vpon paine of that which might follow. The French exasperated asperated with this answer, requested him that if he would not have peace, he would send forth to fight man to man, or more in number if he would to try the matter in view of armes: but neither would the Abbot admit the one request, or the other, saying, he was a religious man, and therefore not to admit such petitions, and that he came not thither to fight, but to defend & preserve the peace of the countrey. These things being heard, the Frenchmen supposing that the Abbot and his people wanted courage, they assaulted the towne with such instruments of warre, as cast forth stones farre off, not ceasing from none till evening, but by the laudable pproves of the Abbot, and such as were with him, the French prevailed nothing, but left it as they founde it.

In the meane time whilst they were busie thus at Winchelsey, they sent part of their company unto Hastings, where finding the towne almost empty, they burnt it.

The same yere the Frenchmen coming by at Raitingdon in Sussex, nere to the towne of Lewes, the Prior of Lewes with a small company met them, and was taken by the Frenchmen, that came upon him, and caried to their ships, with two knights, to wit, Sir Iohn Fallesbey, and Sir Thomas Cheyne, and an Esquier called Iohn Brokas, amongst other a certaine Esquier that had ben long in service with the Prior of Lewes, a Frenchman by nation, fought so manfully against the Frenchmen, that his bowels falling from him to his seate, he yet pursued them. Where was slain in this battell about one hundred of the Englishmen, and the Frenchmen returned home with all their Galleies, which was 37. Galleies, and 8. Caruels of Spaine, and certaine Barkes: straightwaies therefore as they came to land, some of them went unto the sieg, that was about Arde, & by treason which alwaies is familiar to them, the keeper of that castle being an Almaine, to wit, the Lord of Sunney delivered to them the towne, they straight got the castell also, for the which the same keeper being taken by Sir Hugh Calueley keeper of Calais, was sent into England, and committed to prison.

The same time a Parliament was assembled at London, which continued from Michaelmas til St. Andrewes tide. In the which Parliament were almost all those knights, with the said Peter dela More, which so nobly had stood forth in the Parliament, which rightly was called the good Parliament, for the increase of their Countrey, and profit of their kingdom. Thus therefore taking in hand againe the petitions in the same place, as they left them, they earnestly stood in the matter, to have Alice Pierce banished, who contemning the statute of Parliament, and the oath which she had taken, durst take on her to enter the kings court to compell him, and to have of him what pleased her, who although she had corrupted many of the Lords, and all the lawes with money, the which not onely secretly but openly pleaded for her; yet by the diligence and wisdome of the said knights, she being consta by her owne mouth, was banished, and her moveable goods confiscate to the kings use: but in the yere next following, to wit, the second yere of king Richard, the said Alice Pierce then wife to William Windfore knight, was pardoned, and in the uenth yere of the same king, her goods before confiscate by Parliament, were againe restored and recompenced.

Where was granted to the king of the Cleargie two tenths to be paid that yere, with condition, that from henceforth the king should not extort from his Subjects by such petitions or demands but line of his owne, and continue his warre, for as it was answered there, his owne goods pertaining to the crowne, sufficed both to the finding of his house, and maintaining of his warres, if the same were bestowed by fit ministers, and for the keeping of the money, two Citizens of London were appointed, William Walworth, and John Philpot. The Englishmen hearing of a number of Spanish shippes to remaine at Huce for want of wind, assembling a great companie of armed men, and a great shawe, meant to take the seas: their chiefe Captaines were Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, the Duke of Bzptayne, the Lord Latimer, the Lord Robert Fitz Walter, Sir Robert Knowles, and many other valiant personages, who being entred the Sea, tasted fortune disfavouable, for by a tempestuous wind that rose, their shippes were scattered in sundry, their masts were broken downe, their sailes rent, and many of the small vessels that were victuallers were drowned; at length the ships got together againe, and arrived in England, and being now rigged are efflonies fraught with men, and to they sea they goe. About the same time, Sir Hugh Calueley making a journey towards Bulloigne, found a barge in the haven of the towne, that bare the name of the towne, and another that was the French kings, & xxvi. other vessels more and lesse, all the which with a great part of the suburbs of Bulloigne, he caused to be dispoiled, taking with him what soever was there to be desired, with certaine prisoners: he dyone afoze him a great bottie of shepe and beasts, which he found pasturing nere the towne, which might well serve to victuall Calais for a great time: he recovered the same day the Castell of Marke, which through negligence before had ben lost. King Richard kept his Christmas at Windlesore.

The English flote whereof we spake, returned without any great good successe, they toke an eight Spanish ships in the Bizitish coasts nere to Bzest, and more had taken if their busines had ben so well done, as was pretended: and therefore the flote returned home, so tossed with stormes and contrarie weather, and after with intestine discorde, that it seemed there wanted among them Gods favour. The Lord Percy (this flote remaining for the mending of his ships, whilst the other were abroad) went now to the sea, with a great ship and some smaller vessels, and meeting with fiftie ships laden with French wares and merchandize, of which some were of Flaunders, some of Spayne, he set on them all, who beholding his bold enterpryse, and thinking that he had some aide at hand gave over to make resistance, and so xxviii. escaping by flight, xvii. yielded themselves to the said Thomas Lord Percy. Sir Hugh Calueley with a power secretly armed, went to the towne of Staple, where the sayre was then, to the which were come many Merchantmen from Bulloigne, Antwerp, Amiens, and Paris, where he falling on them that were unarmed, slew many, toke many to be put to their ransomes, sacked all the goods, and set fire in the towne, so that it was wholy consumed, fewe places excepted. This done, he returned to Calais with his men in safety, bringing from that payre wares which returned to the great profite of the Calissians many payres after.

The men of Winchelsey & Rye, gathered a great number of people together, and imbarcked themselves towards Normandy, desirous to requite the losses which befoze they had received, and so in the night arriving in a towne called Peters Hauen, entered the same, slaying so many as they met, and those whom they thinke able to pay ranfome, they carry to their ships: they spoiled the houses with the Churches, where they found many rich spoiles which sometime had ben by the frenchmen fet from Rye, and especially the belles and such like, which they shipped, set the rest on fire, & then they land at Winchelsey, not farre from thence, where they practised the like cheuance, and so with their rich spoyle returned home.

About the same time John Duke of Lancaster requested that the mony granted to the king by the cleargy and laity, might be committed to his custody, affirming that he would keepe the enemies off from the coastes of England, by the space of one yere with that mony, and moreover bying to passe some further great commodity, to whose impoztunate petition the Loyds although against their willes agreed. They appoint therfoze the first day of March to meet in counsell, in which euery of those should goe forth on this iourney: and least the sea should in the meane time want those that should keepe it, there were nine ships hired of them of Salon, to defend the sea and land from incurfions of the french and others. These ships being furnished with sufficient numbers of armed men, within a short time coasting the seas, met the paup and merchandise of the Spanyards, and entring battell with them, in short time toke fourteen of their ships laden with wines and other merchandise, and returned into England topfully: unto sir Robert Knowles Captaine of Wexel, they gaue the first fruits of their pray, 100. tunne of their best wines as they passed by him home wards.

In the meane time Henry the bastard, calling himselfe king of Spaine, hearing that they of Bayon had done such harme unto his people, and that the D. of Lancaster had prepared a great number to enter the sea, he was sore afraid, thinking that hee minded not onely to defend the Sea, but rather to seke his kingdom, which by right of his wife the lawfull inheritor of Spaine, he meant to challenge: wherefoze the said Henry commaunded a paup to be prepared of all his land that he might stay the said Duke from entering his countrey, and if he might, to take him prisoner, which happily they had done, if the king of Portugale with almost an innumerable number had not entred the kingdom of Spaine, the selfe same time that the bastard Henry prepared himselfe against the Duke, deferring his iourney from day to day: they that were appointed Captaines ouer the paule with certaine men of warre, got them to the sea, there to stay for the Dukes comming, esteeming it more glorious to lue on the sea by prayes, taking from the enemies, then to lue by spoyle of their owne countreimen at home.

When

When they had certaine daies wasted by and down the seas, the Spanyards met them with an armed company, so that either part in hope of pray loyned together in fight, but our men hauing the wind and weather contrary to them, lost the victory to their enemies, some escaping by flight, & some being taken, amongst the which sir Hugh Courtney a noble knight was one.

About the same time John Mercer a Scot, gathering together no small number of frenchmen, Scots and Spanyards, set vpon certaine ships of Scarbojow, toke them and led them into Scotland, this he did in reuenge of his fathers insurp, who was befoze taken by the Englishmen, and kept prisoner in the castle of Scarbojow.

John Philpot a Cittizen of London, a man of folly wise, and very rich in substance, considering the want of the Duke of Lancaster & other Loydes that ought to haue defended the realme, & lamenting the oppreffions of the inhabitants, hired with his own money, to the number of a thousand souldiers, the which might take from the said John Mercer both his ships and goods, which he had by roving taken, and defend the realme of England from such incurfions: and it came to passe within a small time, that his hired men toke the said John Mercer with all his ships, which he had violently taken from Scarbojow and fiftene Spanish ships that were laden with much riches, and were with him in ayde at that present. There was great soy made among the people, all men passing that worthy mans bountyfulness & loue to wards the king. The Carles & Barons seeing so laudable an act, atchiewed by John Philpot, toke it grievously, although they knew themselves guilty: first they secretly lie in wait, to do him some displeasure, and after they spake against him openly, saying, it was not lawfull for him to do such things without the counsell of the king and realme: certaine of the Loyds, but the chiefe being Hugh Earle of Stafford, that rehearsed these things thus against him, were answered by the same John Philpot: Sir, know (saith hee) that I neither sent my money nor men to the danger of the seas, that I should take from you, or your fellows, the good renoume of Chivalry, and winne it to me, but being forrowfull to see the peoples misery, in my countrey, which now through your foolishness, of the most noble Lady of Passions, is brought to lie open to the spoiling of euery vilest passion, when there is not one of you that both put his hand to the defence therof. I haue therfoze set forth my selfe and mine, so; the sauing of my passion and Countrey: the Earle had not to answer.

The eleuenth day of August, certaine wicked persons of the kings house being armed, at high passe time entered the Church of Westminster Abbey, and there set vpon two vallant Esquiers, John Schakell and Robert Hawley, which had escaped out of the Tower of London, to the said Abbey, for refuge of Sanctuary: they slew the said Robert Hawley in the quire befoze the Wynds stail, and slew a sponke which intreated them to spare the saide Robert in that place. Sir Ralph Ferreis, and sir Alan Buxle, Captayne of the Tower (some say the Lord Lacimer) were the Captaines of this mischief.

battell of Payers in Spain toke the Carle of Dene prisoner, who delivered unto them his sonne for a pledge: and because they would not present the said Charles sonne to the king, who would give them little or nothing for him, the foresaid Alan Buxule, with other were sent to do this mischief, who slew the one, and cast the other in prison.

The Scots began to rebell, and a squire of theirs, called Alexander Ramsay, with fortie persons, in a night toke the Castell of Berwicke, but the ninth day following, the Carle of Northumberland reconerred it, & slew the Scots that were therein.

The Merchants of London wickedly slew a rich merchant of Genoa, for that he would carry to a better market spices that he had promised to bring into this Countrey, the doers whereof were after apprehended, and some for that fact executed, as after shall appeare.

So great a mortallitie of men happened in the North parts of England, as neuer had bene seene before, which the Scots seeing, raunged through and slew with the sword them that were sicke of the plague, and so pursued them that had not the plague, that they dyone out of the Countrey, almost all the able men.

In a Parliament at London, it was decreed, that every Duke should pay tenn markes to the king, the Archbishops the like, Carles, Bishops, and mittered Abbots should give fire markes, and every Monke fortie pence, no religious person, man or woman, Parson, Wicar, or Chapleine escaped this taxe. John Mountfort Duke of Britanie, returned to his countrey, where he was received with great honour.

A bushell of wheat was sold for fire pence: a gallon of white wine six pence, and a gallon of red wine for foure pence.

John of Arundale brother to the Carle of Arundale, was sent to helpe the Duke of Bytaine, with many other noble Knights and Esquires, who beginning their voyage from Wilmington with spoiling their owne Countrey, smothering widowes, and virgins, and robbing of Churches, were by tempest driven on the rocks of a certaine Iland in Ireland, where they were all most miserably drowned, with their treasure and provisions which was of inestimable value. Sir Thomas Banister, Sir Roger Trumpington, Sir Nicholas Kiriell, Sir Thomas Dale, Sir John Sentele and fire other knights and many other perished there, besides thre score women, whom they had throwne into the sea to lighten their shippe, and this was done on the vii. of December.

In a Parliament at London was granted to the king a tenth of the Ecclesiastical persons, and a fiftenth of the secular, upon condition that no other Parliament should be holden from the Calends of March till Michaelmasse.

A combat was fought at Westminster in the *king*s presence, between John Anley knight, & Thomas Carlington Esquier, whom the foresaid knight had appealed of treason, for selling the castle of Saint Saviours, which the Lord Chandos had builded in the Ile of Constantine in France, and the knight ouercame the Esquier.

Thomas

Thomas of Woodstocke Carle of Buckingham, Thomas Percy, Hugh Calueley, Robert Knowles, Lord Basset, Sir John Harleston, William of Winmore, appeared and tried knights, were sent with a great power to appe the Duke of Bytaine, who were conueyed to Caleis, and from thence rode about through France, spoiling the countrey, and slaying the people to the borders of Bytaine, and entered the same without lode, eyther of man or beast.

In this journey Sir John Philpot, Citizen of London deserued great commendations, who hyred ships for them of his owne charges, & with his owne money released the armour which the souldiours had gaged for their victuals, more then a thousand in number.

The Scots entered Cumberland, Westmerland, and the Forrest of Engelwood, slew the inhabitants, dyone away the Cattell, and robbed the Parbet and Towne of Pereth, and whiles the Carle of Northumberland prepared to haue bene reuenged, the king sent letters to the contrary. John Vian knight with the French knights Calles toke the Towne of Winchelsea, put the Abbot of Bataile to flight, and toke one of his ponkes that came thither armed.

He also burnt the Townes of Apledox and Kye, Hastings and Doxtesmouth, about the feast of Saint Laurence.

The eight of September foure Calles of France came to Gravelende, and burnt a great part of the Towne, returned with great spoiles, not relating any hurt.

About this time saith Polidor, the making of *Gunn*s was found, by a certaine Almaine, who hauing the powder of Blunkone in a mortar which he had beaten for a medicine, and covered with a stone, as he stroke fire, a sparke chanced to fall into the powder, whereby a flame out of the mortar raised the stone a great height, which after he had perceived, he made a pipe of pyon, and tempered the powder with other, and so finished that deadly engine, as repository Blondus and R. Volateranus. The first that used shot, to their chafse and profit, were the Venetians against the inhabitants of Genoa: but sure it was long before this time, as that be shewed in my larger Chronicle.

During the Parliament at Northampton, beginning the first of November, was hanged John Kirby, that slew the merchant of Genoa, whom we spake of before.

In this Parliament an exceeding great Taxe was demanded, which afterwards was cause of great discurbance: of all religious persons men and women fire shillings eight pence, secular Wicettes as much, and every person, man or woman foure pence to the king, which was paid. It was also ordained, that every couple wedded should pay two shillings for every score of beast, and also home tilde, but this was neuer asked.

After the feast of Christmas a Councell was holden at London, in the which Sir Thomas Brantingham Bishoppe of Exeter was discharged of the Office of Lord Treasurer, and Sir Robert Hales Bypo of Saint Johns

Johns Hospital of Jerusalem in England was placed in his robe, a noble and ballant knight & a hardy person, but such an one as pleased not the commons.

About the same time came vessels called Caricks, to South Hampton, fraught with all kinds of spices, wines, and other Marchandizes, which greatly enriched the inhabitants of the whole realme, but especially of them that inhabited thereabout.

The same time John Wickliffe parson of Lutterworth in Leicester-shire, laboured in his preaching to proue that after the consecration in the masse made by the Priest, very bread and wine were there present as before, Christ being there assistant, as in euery place, but more specially, & the same bread not to be more worth then other bread, except onely for the blessing of the Priest, and therefore he affirmed that Christians were deceived in honouring of the said bread, which was a thing without life, for any thing that had life, was better then that which lacked life.

A great army was assembled and sent to the aid of the Duke of Lancaster, against the king of Spayne, for the said Duke affirmed, that it was expedient for this realme, that an host of men, with abundance of money should be sent to the king of Portugale, that he might thereby be bound to aide the king of England, and stop the passage of the straites of Gibraltare, of which the Gallies, that must of necessitie passe by the same straites, to come to infect the Britith, or English Ocean, for so should England be safe, and Fraunce should be deceived: Captaines appointed to this army, were Edmond of Langley, Earle of Cambridge, William Lord Beauchampe, the Lord Botetox, sir Mathew Courney, and many other knights, the which passed the seas, and prosperously came to Lyfhone, and were thankfully receiued of the king, but these were not able to assaile the king of Spayne, yet greatly profiting Portugale, they defended the confines, and stayed the Spaniards that they could not enter the countrey as enemies: our men oft times invaded the Spaniards, and boldly abode in that land untill a greater number of warriors might be sent vnto them out of England.

In this meane time, the realme of England, appointed to be punished for her finnes, was sodainly plagued in such sort, that if God had not sooner suppressed the same, both the gouernment had bene utterly destroyed, and the whole realme made a laughing stocke and scoorne to all nations.

In the last yere (as is afore said) was granted to the king a grieuous tax or tallage of his subiects, both spiritual and tempo: all, through the which was raised in England, a shipwacke of great troubles: for diuers Courtiers desirous to enrich themselves with other mens goods, informed the king & his court, that the tallage was not gathered vp faithfully to the kings vse by the Collectors: whereupon they offered to the king, that they would pay a great summe of money for the farme of that which they would gather ouer and besides that which had bene paid, if they might be by the king thereunto authorized. And some of them getting the kings letters and authority, late in diuers places of Kent and Essex, and handled the people very sore and vncourteously, almost not to be spoken, for the leaping of the said summe of money, which some of the people taking in euill part, they secretly toke counsell together, gathered assistants, and resisted the exactors, rising against them, of whom some they slew, some they wounded, and the rest fled.

The king therefore ordained certaine Commissioners to enquire, howe they were leued, amongst the which, one was sent into Essex to Thomas de Bampton, he sitting one day before Whistontide, at Wentwood, enquiring how the Collectors had leued the subsidy before said, all the people of Fobbing answered, they would not pay one penny more then they had done, whereof they had his acquittance, whereupon the said T. de Bampton, whereupon them, hauing with him two Sergeants at Armes of the kings, whereupon they of Fobbing, of Curringham, and of Samford, assembled to the number of more then one hundred, went to T. Bampton and gave him flat answer that they would neither treat with him, or pay any such money as was demanded: wherefore the said Bampton commaunded the Sergeants to arrest and put them in prison, but the townsmen made them all to fly to wards London to the kings counsell. Whereupon sir Robert Belknap chiefe Justice of the common Pleas was sent downe with commission of Trarphallion, and before him sundry inditeiments of those men; who comming before him called him traitor to the king, and realme, and furthermore compelled him to sweare vpon a booke, that he should no more sit in any such Sessions, and to declare to the names of the Iurers, whose heads they chopped off as they found them, and destroyed their houses, which made sir Robert Belknap in haste to fly his house. This done the Commons assembled before Whistontide to a great number: those toke all the Clearkes of the said T. Bampton and chopped off their heads, which they caried before them on poles. At the same time the great Priore of Saint Iohn of Jerusalem by London, hauing a godly and delectable Manor in Essex, wherein was ordained victuals and other necessities, for the vse of a Chapter Generall, and great abundance of fayne stuffe, of Wines, Arras cloathes, and other prouision for the knights brethren: The Commons entred this Manor, cate by the victuals and prouision of Wine, three tunnes, and spoiled the Manor; and the ground with great damage: then they sent diuers letters into Kent, Suffolk, and Northfolke to rise with them, and departing themselves into diuers companies, committed many outrages: shortly after, to wit, on Monday after Whistunday, a knight of the kings house, named sir Simon Burley, hauing in his company two Sericants at Armes of the kings, came to Grauesend, where he challenged one to be his bondman, for whom, men of the towne did gently intreat him to the wth favour, but sir Simon would not take lesse then 300. pound of silver for his manumission, & therefore arrested him, and sent him to Rochester Castell, whereupon the Commons of Kent began to rise, for the which the king sent a Justice of Trarphallion, with Iohn Legge a Sericant of Armes, there to sit, hauing with them many inditeiments, but as they would haue late at Canterbury vpon their committie, they were resisted by the commons, who daily grew to a great multitude, & being without a captain, came to Darford, where they toke counsaile, and appointed that none which were dwelling within twelue miles of the sea, should goe with them, but keepe the coast of the sea from enemies, saying there were more hinges then one, which they would not suffer, nor haue any other but king Richard. On the Friday after, they came to Rochester, and there toynd with the Essex rebels, who together strongly besieged the Castle, and deliuered the man of Grauesend with other: then they made Wat Tighler of Spaldstone their Captaine, who with his company on Monday after Trinity Sunday, came to Canterbury, where they commaunded the Bonkes to chuse them an Archbishop, for he that now is, (quoth they) is a traitor, & shal be beheaded. When they swore the Mayor, Bailiffes, and Commons of the towne to be true to king Richard and the lawfull Commons of England. They beheaded thre men of that towne, and then taking with them 500. men of that towne toward London, left the rest to keepe the said towne. This tumult thus begun in Kent, by meane of Sir Simon Burley, was also increased by diuers other actions in other places, amongst the which, as I finde noted in a Chronicle sometimes belonging to the Monastery of Saint Albons one of the collectors of the groates, or polle money, comming to the house of one Iohn Tylar, in the towne of Dartford in Kent, demanded of the Tylars wife, for her husband, her selfe, her seruants, and for their daughter (a young mayden) euery one of them a groate: which the Tylars wiffe denied not to pay, sauing for her daughter, whom she said was but a child, not to be counted a woman: quoth the collector, that will I some wit, and taking the mayden, and turned her by to search whether she were vnder growne with baire or not, (for in many places they made the like triall) whereupon her mother cried out, neighbours came running in: and her husband being at worke in the same towne, tyling of an house, when he heard thereof, caught his lathing staffe in his hand, and came reaking home, where reasoning with the Collector, who made him so bold, the Collector answered with stout wordes, and strake at the Tylar, whereupon the Tylar auoiding the blow, smote the Collector with his lathing staffe, that the baines flew out of his head, wherethrough great noyse arose in the streets, and the poore people being glad, euery one prepared to support the said Iohn Tylar. Thus the Commons being drawne together, went to Spaldstone, and from thence backe againe to Blache heath, and so in short time they stirred all the Countrey, in a manner to the like commotion, and forthwith besetting the waies that lead to Canterbury, arrest all passengers, compelling them to swear: first, that they should keepe their allegiance vnto king Richard, and to the Commons, and that they should accept no king that was named Iohn, for enny they bare vnto Iohn Duke of Lancaster, who named himselfe king of Castile, and that they should be ready whensoever they were called, and that they should agree to no Tare to be leuied from thenceforth in the kingdome, nor consent to any except it were a fiftene.

The same of these doings spread into Sussex, Hertford, Essex, and Cambridgshires, Dorseth, Suffolke, &c. and when such assembling of the common people daily took increase, and that their number was now made almost infinite, so that they feared no man to resist them, they beganne to Helpe some such Ades as they had considered in their mindes, and tooke in hande to behead all men of Lawe, as well Apprentices, as Justice, Lawyers and Jurors beheaded. Utter-bariffers and old Justices, with all the Iurers of the countrey, whom they might get into their hands, they spared none whom they thought to be learned, especially if they found any to haue pen and inke, they pulled off his hode, and all with one voice of crying, hale him out, and cut off his head.

They also determined to burne all Court rolles and olde monuments that the memory of antiquities being taken away, their Lordes should not be able to challenge any right on them, from that time forth. These Commons had to their Chapleine or Preacher a wicked Priest, called Sir Iohn Ball, who counsailed them to destroy all the Nobility, and Clergy, so that there should be no Bishop in England, but one Archbishoppe, which should be himselfe, and that there should not be about two religious persons in one house, and their possessions should be deuoted among the laye men, for the which doctrine they held him as a prophet. They going to wardes London met diuers Lawyers, and twelue knights of that countrey, whom they forced to swear to maintaine them, or else to be beheaded: this being knowne to the king, on Wednesday following he sent messengers to demand the cause of their rising. Who answered, that they were gathered together for his safety, to destroy those that were traitors to him and his kingdome: the king by messengers replied, that they should cease their assemblies untill he mought speake with them, and all matters should be amended. Whereupon the Commons requested the king to come and see them on the Blache heath, and the king the third time sent word that he would willingly come to them the next day. At what time the king being at Windsor removed in all haste to London, whom the Mayor met, and safely brought to the Tower, whither the Archbishoppe of Canterbury Chancellor, the Bishoppe of London, the Bishop of Saint Iohn Treasurer, the Earles of Buckingham, Kent, Arundale, Warwick, Suffolke, Dorset, and Salisbury, and other of the Nobility, and Gentlemen to the number of ffe hundred did come, and on Corpus Christi eue the Commons of Kent came to blache heath, thre miles from London, to meete with the king, hauing displayed before them two Banners of Saint George, and therefore Penons. The Commons of Essex came on the other parte of the river Thames, to haue also answer from the king, at what time the king being in the Tower, commaunded barges to be made ready, and taking with him his Counsell, and foure barges for his retinue, was rowed to Greenwich, where the Chancellor and Treasurer perswaded the king that it were great follie to goe to a number of men without reason, and thereupon he staid. The Commons therefore sent to him, requiring to haue the heades of Iohn Duke of Lancaster, and fiftene other Lordes, wherof fourtene were present with him in the Tower, to wit, Simon Sudburie Chancellor, Sir Robert Hales Treasurer, sur, the Bishoppe of London, John Fordham Clarke of the priule Seale, Robert Belknap, chiefe Justice, Sir Ralph Perers, Sir Robert Plesington chiefe Baron of the Erchequer, John Legge Sergeant at armes, Thomas Bampton and others, whereunto the king would not assent, but willed them to come to him to Windsor, on Monday next, where they should have sufficient answer to all their demands. The Commons had a watch-word, which was this: With whom should you and the answer was, with King Richard, and the true Commons, and who could not that watch-word, off went his head. The king being warned that if he came to the Commons, he should be carried about by them, & forced to grant them their requests whatsoever, he returned toward London and entered the Tower, about three of the clock: The Commons being certified that the king was gone, they on the same day toward evening came to Southwarke, where they brake down the houses of the Marshalsey, and loosed the prisoners, amongst other they brake down the house of John Inworth then Marshal of the Marshalsey, the Kings Bench, & all the houses of Lawyers, & Duck-mongers, continuing that outrage all the night: At what time the Commons of Essex went to Lambeth a Pannoy of the Archbishop of Canterbury, entered the house, spoiled and burnt all the goods with the books, registers, and remembrances of the Chancery. The next day being Thursday, and the feast of Corpus Christi, or the 13. of June, the Commons of Essex in the morning went to the Pannoy of Highbury two miles from London north, this Pannoy belonging to the Bishop of Saint John of Jerusalem, they wholly consumed with fire. On which day also in the morning the Commons of Kent brake downe the Ale-houses nere London bridge, at that time in the hands of the frowes of Flanders, who had farmed them of the Mayor of London. After which they went to London bridge, in hope to have entered the Citie: but the Mayor, coming thither before, fortified the place, caused the bridge to be drawn up, and fastened a great chaine of yron a crosse, to restraine their entrie. When the Commons of Surrey, who were risen with the other, cried to the wardens of the bridge to let it downe, whereby they might passe, or else they would destroy them all, whereby they were constrained for feare to let it downe, & give them entry, at which time the religious persons were earnest in procession, and prayer for peace: the Commons passed through the Citie, and did no hurt, they take nothing from any man, but bought all things at a full price: and if they found any man with theft, they beheaded him. Now talking with the simple Commons, of procuring them liberty, and apprehending traitors (as they termed them) especially the Duke of Lancaster, they shortly got all the poye Citizens to conspire with them: and the same day, after the sunne was got on some height that it waxed warme, and that they had tasted at their pleasures of diuers wines, whereby they were become as madde, as drunken (for the rich Citizens had let open their cellars to enter at their pleasure) they began to take of many things, amongst the which they exhorted each other, that going to the Savoy, the Duke of Lancasters house, to the which there was none in the Realme to be compared in beauty and stateliness, they might set fire on it, and burne it; this talke pleasing the Commons of the Citie, they straight ranne thither, and setting fire on it round about applied their travaile, to destroy that place: and that it might appeare to the communality of the realme, that they did not any thing for covetise, they caused Proclamation to be made, that none on paine to lose his head, should presume to convert to his owne use any thing that there was, or might be found, but that they should brake such plate and vessel of gold and silver, as were in that house in great plenty, into small peeces, and throw the same into the Thames, or into some privies; clothes of gold, silver, silk, & velvet, they should tear; rings, and Jewels set with precious stones, they should use in mortars, that the same might be to no use, &c. And so was it done. Henry Knighton writeth, that when the rebelles burnt the Savoy, one of them (contrary to the Proclamation) took a goodly silver peece and hid it in his bosom, but an other that espied him, tolde his fellows, who forthwith hurled him and the peece of plate into the fire, saying, we be zealous of truth and iustice, and not thieves, or robbers. After this they getting a rich garment of the Dukes (commonly called a Jacke, or Jackquit) setting it on a speares point, for a marke, they shot at it with their bowes and arrows, but when they coule that way doe it little hurte, they took it downe, and laying it on the ground, with their swordes and axes they all toke it. So the number of two and thirtie of those rebels entered a feller of the Savoy, where they dranke so much of sweet wines, that they were not able to come out in time, but were shut in with wood and stones that mured by the doze, where they were heard crying and calling seven daies after, but none came to helpe them out till they were dead.

Where then the rebels mured up in a feller.

In this meane time the Commons of Kent brake by the Fleet, and let the prisoners goe where they would: they destroyed and burnt many houses, and defaced the beauty of Fleetstrate: from thence they went to the Temple to destroy it, and plucked downe the houses, tooke off the tyles of the other buildings left, went to the Church, took out all the books, and remembrances that were in butches of the prentises of the Lawe, carried them into the high strate, and there burnt them: this house they spoiled for what they bare to the Bishop of Saint Johns, unto whom it belonged: after a number of them had sacked this Temple, what with labour, and what with wine, being overcome, they lay downe under the walles, and housing, and were layne like swine, one of them killing an other for olde grudge and hatred, and others also made quicke dispatch of them. A number of them that burnt the Temple, went from thence toward the Savoy, destroying all the houses that belonged to the Hospitall of Saint John: and after they went to the place of the Bishop of Chester, by the Strand, where John Fordham remained elect of Durham, they entered his feller, ransacking out the tunnes of wine, drinking exceedingly, not dooing any more harme. Then they wente towards the Sauoy, burning many houses of questmongers. At the last they came to the Sauoy, brake the gates, entered the house, came to the warre, took out all the torches they could finde, which they set a fire, and with them bent all the feather beddes, couerlets (whereof one with armes was esteemed worth 1000. markes) and all other goods that they might finde, with the houses, and buildings belonging therunto, which were left by the Commons of the Citie of London. And (as it was saide) they found thre barrels of gunne powder, which they thought had bene golde, or silver, those they cast into the fire, which moze sodainly then they thought, blew by the Hall, destroyed the houses and almost themselves: from thence they went to Westminster, burned diuers houses, and amongst other the house of John Buterwike vnder Shire of Middlesex, they broke the prison at Westminster, and returned to London by Holborne, and before the Church of Saint Sepulchre, burnt the house of Simon the Hostiler and others, they brake the prison of Fleetgate, let forth the prisoners, &c.

The same Thursday, the said Commons went to Saint Martins le Grand in London, and took from the high Altar in that Church one Roger Legat chiefe sizar (or questmonger) led him into Cheape, and cut off his head: at that time also they beheaded vniu. in diuers places of the Citie. During which time diuers of the Commons went vnto the Tower, there to haue spoken with the king, but could not be heard, wherefore they besieged the Tower on that side towards Saint Bathelines. The other Commons that were in the Citie went to the Hospital of Saint Iohn, and by the way burnt the house of Roger Legat lately beheaded, they burnt all the houses belonging to Saint Iohns. and then bent the saye Prison of the Hospital of Saint Iohn, causing the same to burne by the space of seuen daies after. At what time the king being in a Turret of the Tower, and seeing the mannours of Sauoy, the Prison of Saint Iohns Hospital, and other houses on fire, he demaunded of his counsell what was best to doe in that extremitie, but none of them could counsaile in that case. The king there in a Tower towards Saint Bathelines made Proclamation that all people should depart to their homes peaceably, and he would pardon them all their trespasses: but they with one voice cried, they would not goe before they had the traitors within the Tower, and charters to free them from all seruice, and of other matters which they would demaund: this the king granted, and caused a Clarke to write in their presence as followeth.

Richard King of England and of France, doth greatly thanke his good Commons, because they to greatly desire to see and hold him for their king, and doth pardon to them all manner of trespasses, misprisions, and felonies done before this time, and willetth and commaundeth from hence forth, that euery one hasten to his owne dwelling, and set downe all his gréuances in writing, and send it vnto him, and he will by aduise of his lawfull Lozdes, and good counsell provide such remedy as shall be possible to him, to them, and to the whole Realme. Whereunto he set his signes in their presence, and sent it vnto them by two knights, one of them standing up in a chaire above the rest, that euery one might heare. During which time the king remained in the Tower, to his great griefe, for when the Commons heard the writing, they said it was but a mockery, and therefore returned to London, proclaiming through the Citie, that all the men of Lawe, all they of the Chancery, and of the Exchequer, and all that could make any writ, or letter, should be beheaded wherefore they might be found. The whole number of the common people, were at that time deuised into three parts, of the which one part was attending to destroy the manors of Wighbery, and other places belonging to the Priory of Saint Iohn: Another company lay at the Piles ende East of the Citie: The third kept at the Tower hill, there to spoyle the king of such victuals as were brought towards him. The company ascended on the Piles end, sent to commaund the king, that he should come to them without delay, unarmed, or without any force, which if he refused to doe, they would surely pull downe the Tower, neither should he escape alive; who taking counsell of a few, by leuen of the Locke the king rode to the Piles end, with his mother in a whirlicote or chariot as we now terme it, & the Carles of Buckingham, Kent, Warwicke, and Driford, Sir Thomas Percie, Sir Robert Knolles, and the Priory of London, with diuers other knights, and Esquires, Sir Aubery de Vere bare the kings sword. Thus with a few unarmed, the king went towards the rebels in great feare: and to the gates of the Tower being let open, a great multitude of them entered the same. There was the same time in the Tower 600. warlike men furnished with armour and weapon, expert men in armes, and 600. archers, all which did quail in stomache. For the basest of the rustickes, not many together, but euery one by himselfe, durst presume to enter the kings chamber, or his mothers, with their weapons, to put in feare each of the men of warre, knights or other: many of them came into the kings priuy chamber, and plaid the wantons, in sitting, lying and sporting them on the kings bed: and that moze is, insulted the kings mother to kisse with them, yet durst none of those men of warre (strange to be said) once withstand them: they came in and out like masters, that in times past were slaues of most vile conditio. Whilste therefore these rustickes sought the Archbishop with terrible noise and fury running by and downe, at length finding one of his seruants, they charge him to bring them where his master was, whom they named traitor, which seruant darning do none other, brought them to the Chappell; where, after Masse had bene said, and hauing receiued the communion, the Archbishop was busie in his prayers, for not knowing of their coming and purpose, he had passed the last night in confessing of his sinnes, and in deuout prayers. When therefore he heard they were come, with great constancie he said to his men, Let vs now goe, surely it is best to die, when it is no pleasure to liue, and with that the tormentors entering, cried, Where is the traitor? The Archbishop answered, behold, I am the Archbishop whom you seeke, not a traitor. They therefore laid handes on him, and drew him out of the Chappell, they drew him out of the Tower gates, to the Tower hill, where being compassed about with many thousands, and being woords about his head done in excessive number, threatening to him death, he said unto them thus: what is it here brethren you purpose to doe, what is mine offence committed against you, for which ye will kill me, you were best to take heed, that if I be killed, who am your pastor, there come not on you, the indignation of the iust reuenger, or at the least, for such a fact all England be put under interdictio: he could vnneth pronounce these woords, before they cryed out with an horrible noise, that they neither feared the interdictio, nor the Pope to be aboue them. The Archbishop seeing death at hand, with comfortable woords, as he was an eloquent man, and wise, beyond all wise men of the realme; lastly, after forgiveness graunted to the executioner that should behead him, he kneeling downe offered his necke to him that should strike it off, being striken in the necke, but not deadly, he putting his hand to his necke, said thus, a ha, it is the hand of God, he had not remoued his hand from the place, where the payne was, but that being sodainly striken, his fingers ends being cut off, and part of the arteries, he fell downe, but yet he died not, till being mangled with 8. strokes in the necke, and in the head, he fulfilled most worthy martyrdom. There lay his body vnburied all that Friday, and the morrow till afternone, none daring to deliuer his body to the sepulture, his head these wicked towe, and naples thereon his hwe, they fire it on a pole, and set it on London Bridge, in place where before stood the head of Sir John Minstworth. This Archbishop Simon Tibald alias Sudbury, sonne to Nicholas Tibald gentleman, borne in the towne of Sudbury in Suffolke, Doctor of both lawes, was 18. yeres Bishop of London, in the which time he builded a goodly Colledge, in place where his fathers house stode, and indued it with great possessions, and furnished the same with secular Clerkes and other ministers, valued at the suppression 122. pound. 18. shillings in lands by yere. He builded the upper end of S. Gregories Church at Sudbury. After being translated to the Archbishopricke of Canterbury, in An. 1375. he reuised the walles of that Citie, from the West gate (which he builded) to the North gate, which had been destroyed by the Danes before the conquest of William the bastard. He was slaine as ye haue heard, and afterwards buried in the Cathedral Church of Canterbury. There died with him Sir Robert Hales a most valiant knight, Lord of S. Johns and treasurer of England, and John Legge one of the Kings sericants at armes, and a Franciscan frier, named William Apledore the King's Confessor. Richard Lions also a famous lapidary or goldsmith, late one of the Sheriffs of London, was done out of his house and beheaded in Cheape. There were that day beheaded manie as well Flemings as Englishmen for no cause, but to fulfill the crueltie of the rude Commons: for it was a solemne pastime to them, if they could take any that was not twome to them, to take from such a one his hode with their accustomed clamour, and forthwith to behead him: neither did they shew any reuerence vnto sacred places, for in the very Churches did they kill whom they had in hatred, they fetcht 13. Flemings out of the Augustine Friers church in London, and 17. out of another church, and 32. in the Mintre, and so forth in other places of the Citie, & in Southwarke, al which they beheaded, except they could plainly pronounce bread and cheefe, for if their speech sounded any thing on by, or cable, off went their heads, as a sure mark they were Flemings.

The King coming to the Spiles end, the place before rected, was soze a strafe, beholding the wood commons, who with scoward countenance required many things which they before had put in writings to be confirmed by the Kings letters patents.

The 1. that all men should be free from seruitude and bondage, so as from thenceforth there should be no bondmen.

The 2. that he should pardon all men of what estate soeuer, all maner actions and insurrections committed, and all maner treasons, felonies, transgressions and extortions, by any of them done, and to graunt them peace.

The 3. that al men from thenceforth might be enfranchised to buy and sell in every Countie, Citie, borough, town, faire, market, and other place within the Realme of England.

The 4. that no acre of land holden in bondage or seruice, should be holden, but for 4. pence, and if it had been holden for lesse aforesaid, it should not hereafter be inhaunfed.

These and many other things they required: moreover they tolde him, he had been euilly gouerned till that day, but from that time he must be gouerned other wise.

The King perceiving he could not escape except he graunted to their request, yielded to the same. And because the Chancelor was beheaded, the King made the Earle of Arundale for the time Chancelor, and keeper of the great seale, and also made diuers Clerkes to write Charters, patents, and protections graunted to the Commons, for the foresaid matters, without taking fine, for the seale, or writing thereof, and so toward euen, the King crawling licence departed from them. The next day being Saturday and the 15. of June, a great number of the Commons came to the abbey of Westminster, and there found John Inworth Sparthall of the Sparthall, and master of the prisoners there, embracing a marble pillar of Saint Edwards shrine for his defence, against his enemies, they plucked his armes from the pillar, and led him into cheape, where they cut off his head. In which time they took out of Bedestre one John Greenfield, led him into cheape, & cut off his head, notwithstanding that the King had at this time made proclamation through the Citie, that euery one should peaceably goe into his countrey, without doing further euill, whereunto they would not assent. The same day after dinner, about two of the clocke, the King went from the wardrobe, called the Royall in London toward Westminster, attended on by the number of 200. persons, to visit Saint Edwards shrine, and to see if the Commons had done any mischiefe there: The Abbot and couent of that abbey, with the Chanons and vicars of Saint Stephens Chappell, met him in rich Copes, with procession, and led him by the charnell house into the abbey, then to the Church, and to the high altar, where hee deuoutely prayed, and offered. to the Chapell called our Lady in the pewe, where he made his prayers: Which being done, the King made proclamation, that all the commons of the countrey, that were in London shoulde mete him in Smithfield, which was done accordingly, and when the King was come with his people, he stode towards the Cast, nere to Saint Bartilmewes priory, and the commons towards the West in foyme of battayle. The King therefore sent to them, to shew them that their fellows the Cler men were gone from thenceforth to live in peace, and that he would graunt to them the like foyme of peace, if it would please them to accept thereof. Their chiefe Captaine named Wat Tyler of Spadestone, he I say being a crafty fellow, of an excellent wit, but lacking grace, answered, that peace he desired, but with conditions to his liking, minding to fede the King with false wordes, till the next day, that he might in y night have compassed his peruerse purpose, for they thought y same night to have spoiled the Citie, the King first being aslaine, and the great Lordes that cleaved to him, and to have burnt the Citie, by setting fire in foure parts thereof, but God that resisteth the proude, did suddenly disappoint him. For where the foyme of peace was in thre feuerall Charters written, and thre sent to him, none of them could please him: wherefore at length the King sent to him one of his Knights called Sir Iohn Newton, not so much to command as to intreate him (for his pride was well nough knownen) to come and talke with him about his owne demands, to haue them put in his charter, of the which demands, I will put one in this Chronicle, that it may the moze plainly appeare, the other to be contrary to reason. First, he would haue a commision for him and his, to behead all Lawyers, elcheters, and other whatsoeuer, that were learned in the law, or communicated with the law, by reason of their office, for he had conceiued in his mind that this being brought to passe, all things after ward shoulde be ordered according to the fancy of the common people: and in dede it was said, that with great pride, he bad but the day before said, putting his hand to his lips, that before 4. dayes came to end, all the lawes of England shoulde procede from his mouth. When Sir Iohn Newton was in hand with him for hispatch, he answered with indignation, if thou art so hasty, thou maist get thee bicker againe to thy master, I will come when it pleaseth me: notwithstanding he followed on horsebacke a slow pace, and by the way there came to him a dublet maker of London, named Iohn Tiler, who had brought to the commons 60. dublets which they bought and warr, for the which dublets he demanded 30. markes, but could haue no payment, Wat Tiler answered him, friend appeale thy selfe, thou shalt be well paid on this day be ended, kepe thy nere me, I will be thy creditor: And therewith he spurred his horse, departed from his company, and came so nere the King, that his horse head touched the crope of the Kings horse, and the first word he said was this, Sir King, sett thou all ponder people: pea trulye gnoth the King, wherefore saist thou so: because said he, they be all at my commaundement, and haue sworn to me faith and truth, to doe all that I will haue them. In god time said the King, I will well it be so. Then said Wat Tiler belouest thou King, that these people, and as many moe as be in London at my commaundement, maundement, shall depart from the thus, without hauing thy letters: no said the King, yet shall haue them, they be ordeyned for you, and shall be belivered to every each of them, with which wordes, Wat Tiler seeing the Knight Sir Iohn Newton nere to him on horsebacke, bearing the Kings sword, was offended and said, it had become him better to be on fete in his presence. The Knight (not hauing forgot his old accustomed manhood) answered, that it was no harme, seeing himselfe was also on horsebacke: which wordes so offended Wat, that he drew his dagger, and offered to strike at the Knight, calling him traitor: the Knight answered, that he lyeed, and drew his dagger likewise. Wat Tiler not suffering such a contumely done to him before his rustiches, made as if he would haue runne on the Knight. The King therefore seeing the Knight in danger, to asswage the rigor of War, for the time, commaunded the Knight to light on fote, and to deliuer his dagger vnto the said Walter, and when his proude minde could not so be pacified, but he would also haue his sword, the Knight answered, it was the Kings sword, and quoth he, thou art not worthy to haue it, nor thou durst aske it of me, if here were no moze but thou and I. My faith said Wat Tiler, I shall neuer eate till I haue thy head, and would haue run on the Knight: and with that came to the King, William Walworth, Mayor of London, and many Knights and Esquires on the Kings side, affirming that it were great shame, such as had not been heard of, if in their presence, they shoulde permit a noble Knight so shamefully to be murdered before his face, wherefore he ought to be rescued speedily, and Tiler to be arrested. Which thing being heard, the King, although he were but tender of pères, taking boldnesse vnto him, commaunded the Mayor of London to set hand on him. The Mayor being of an incomparable boldnesse and manhood, without any doubting, straight arrested him on y head, Wat Tiler furiously strake the Mayor with his dagger, but hurte him not by meane he was armed, then the Mayor drew his bacelar, and greuously wounded Wat in the necke, and gaue him a great blow on the head, in which confusie, an esquire of the Kings house, called Iohn Cavendish, drew his sword and wounded him twise or thise, euen vnto death, and Wat spurting his horse, cried to the commons to reuenge him, his horse bare him about foure score fote from thence where he fell downe halfe dead, and by and by they which attended on the King, inuironed him all about, where by he was not fene of his company, and other thrust him in with their weapons in diuers places of his body, and then they drew him from amongst the peoples fete into the hospitall of Saint Bartilmew: which when the commons perceived, they cryed out that their Captaine was traiterously slaine, and hartening one another to reuenge his death, bending their bowes, the King, shewing both wisdomme and courage, picking his horse with the spurs, rode to them, and said: What a work is this my men, what meane you to do, will you shote at your King: be not quarrelous, nor so y for the death of a traitor and rebel: I will be your King, I am your Captaine and leader, follow me into the field, there to haue whatsoeuer you will require.

Should set fire on the houses in Smithfield, where their Captaine was staine. They therefore followed him into the open felde, and the soldiers that were with him, as yet not knowing whether they would kill the King, or be in rest and depart home with the Kings Charter.

The Spaior of London rayfeth a power, and returne to the King.

In the meane time the Spaior of London onely with one servant, riding speedily into the Citie, began to cry, ye good Citizens helpe pour King, that is to be murdered, and succour me your Spaior that am in the like danger, or if you will not succour me, yet leaue not pour King destitute, when the Citizens had heard this, in those hearts the love of the King was ingrafted, so dauncely, faimely arrayed, to the number of a thousand men fariied in the streets so; some one of the Knights to lead them to the King, and by fortune Sir Robert Knowles, came in that instant, whom they all requested to be their leader, least coming out of order, and not in god aray they might easely be beaten: who gladly brought part of them, Sir Parducafe Daibart, and other Knights brought the rest to the Kings presence. When the Spaior came to Smithfield and did not finde War Tygular, (as he left him wounded) he greatly maruailed, demanding where the traytor was, and it was tolde him that he was carried into the Hospitall of Saint Bartilmewe, and laid in the Masters Chamber, the Spaior went straight thither and made him to be carried into Smithfield, and there caused him to be beheaded, his head to bee set on a pole, and boyme before him to the King then remayning in the field, and the King caused it to be boyme nere unto him, therewith to abash the Commons, greatly thanking the Spaior for that acte.

Record. R. 2.

That Tiler beheaded by commandement of the Spaior.

The King, and those that were with him, Knights and Esquiers, reioycing of the unhoped for, comming of the Spaior, and those armed men, sobainly compassed all the multitude of the Commons.

There might a man haue sene a wonderfull change of Gods right hand, how the Commons did now throw downe their weapons, and fall to the ground, beseeching pardon, which lately before did glory that they had the Kings life in their power, now they gve themselves in canes, ditches, cornefields, &c. The Knights therefore cōueting to be reuenged, besought the King to permit them to take off the heads of an hundred or two of them, but the King not condescending to their request, commanded the charter which they had beheaded, written and sealed, to be deliuered vnto them for the time, to auoyde more mischief, knowing that Essex was not as yet pacified, nor heat stayed, the commons and rusticks of which Countreys were ready to rife agayne, if he satisfied not their pleasure the sooner. The tenour of which Charter, in my larger Chronicle is set downe. The Commons hauing got this Charter departed home, but ceased not from their former cruell doings.

William Walworth of London knighted, the next day.

The rude people being thus dispersed and gone, the King commaunded William Walworth to put a balnet on his head, for feare of that which might follow, and the Spaior requested to know for what cause he should do so, sith all was quieted, the King answered, that he was much bound to him, and therefore therefore, he should be made knight, the Spaior againe answered, that he was not worthy, neither able to take such estate upon him, for he was but a Merchant, and to liue by his merchandise, not (withstanding at the last, the King made him put on his balnet, and then take a swozd with both his hands, and throngly with a good will strake him on the necke, and the same day he made three other Citizens Knights for his sake in the same place, which were Iohn Philpor, Nicholas Brembar, and Robert Laund Aldermen, and Sir Iohn Candish in Smithfield was knighted. The King gaue to Sir William Walworth 100. pound land, and to the other 40. pound land, to them and their heires for ever: vpon the sand-hill towards Tieldonne were created the Carls Marshall, and Pembroke, and shortly after Nickolas Twiford, and Adam Francis Aldermen, were also made knights. Sir Robert Knowles, for his good seruice in the Citie, was by the Kings commaundement made a free man of the Citie.

The King with his Lords and all his company, orderly entred into the Citie of London with great toy. The King went to the Lady Princesse his mother, who was then lodged in the Towre of Wall called the Quenes Tower, and there she had remayned two dayes and two nights right soze abashed, but when she saw the King her sonne, she was greatly reioyced, and said, As happy sonne, what great sorrow haue I suffered for you this day: The King answered, and said, certainly Madame, I know it well, but now reioyce and thanke God, for I haue this day recovered mine heritage, and the Realme of England, which I had nere hand lost.

The Archbishopps head was taken downe off the Wydge, and War Tilers head was set in that place.

Querlong it were in this booke to set downe the troubles at Saint Albons, by the bond men there against the Abbot, and other, for liberties which they claymed, as the like did in other places, committing many abominable actes, but somewhat to speake of them within the parts of Suffolke and Norfolke.

The Saturday wherof we haue before spoken, that the tempest might seme to be generall, God sent his wrath into the partes of Suffolke and Norfolke, by sending Essex men to moue the people that liued in quietnesse, to raise like commotions, and to turne the hearts of the bondemen or seruants against their Lords. The which making to their Captaine a most vngratious priefe named Iohn Wraw, who had ben at London the day before, and was intruded by War Tiler, easily assembled a multitude of those common people. The which according to the manner of them at London, ouerthrew houses and manors of great men and of Lawyers, slew the Students of the Lawe, and catching Sir Iohn Cauendish a Iustice of the Realme, some say Lord chief Iustice, beheaded him, and set his head on the pilloz in the towne of Bury, Sir Iohn of Cambridge, Bpior of Bury, they caught and stroke off his head, his body was left naked in the field the space of five dayes, none presuming to burie it, for feare of the Iustices, his head was set on the pilloz by the head of Sir Iohn Cauendish. Will. Arden

fokke, lackey to Sir Roger de Boys.

So small multitude of Commons being gotte together under the leading of a certaine Dyer of Norwich, called John Litstar, beganne to worke such mallice as in other places had been put in practise, putting their hands into robbery, so that no place might be free from them: they thought to haue got to them William de Vffard Earle of Suffolke, that they might doe their business vnder colour of his authoritie, but the Earle being warned of their coming, sobainely rose from Supper, and taking his journey through Woodes and deserts came to Saint Albons, and from thence to the King, saying himselfe to bee the lackey of Sir Roger de Boys, and bearing a Mallet behinde him. The Commons thus deceived, forthwith sealed upon the houses of other Knights, and finding them, compelled them to be faine to ride through the Countrey with them, which if they had denied they had died for it.

The Knights that were thus compelled, were the Lord Schales, Sir William Morley, Sir Iohn de Brues, Sir Steuen de Hales, Sir Robert de Sale, which Sir Robert blaming their doings, was smitten into the chayne by one of his bondmen. The other percelusing that they must dissemble, or dye a shamefull death, determined to say all things was well. Whereupon being brought in fauour with Litstar, (who named himselfe King of the Commons) chose Sir Steuen Hales (because hee was a comely Knight) to carue before him, and to take the assay of his meates, and to the other he appoynted other of fices.

Now the Commons sent two Knights, Sir William de Morley, and Sir Iohn Brewes with three of the Commons in whom they especially trusted, vnto the King at London, or els where, for to purchase of him a Charter of manumission and pardon, the which that it might be more speciall then other, they deliuered vnto the said messengers a great summe of money, which they had receiued of the Citizens of Norwich vnder pretext to saue their citie from burning and murder. The Knights with their companions, when they came to a Towne named Ignigham, not farre distant from Newmarket, they met with the Bishop of Norwich Sir Henry Spencer well armed, so as he was at his manor of Burley, nere to Wcham Castle, not farre from Stamford, he heard of the Norfolke men, and determined to goe against them, he had not at that time past an 8. speares, and a small number of archers, yet beholding the Knights, and some of the Commons, he commaunded them vpon their allegiance to tel him, if there were any of the Kings traytors. The Knights for feare of the Commons, dissembled to answer, the Bishop willed them boldly to goe to, and if there were any of the Kings traytors, to deliuer them to him: the Knights taking courage, answered that two of the chiefe stirrers among the whole company were present, and that the third was gone forth to prouide their dinner, & herewith they shewed the cause of their journey.

journey. The Bishop straightwayes commaunded these two to lose their heads, and the third he himselfe went to seeke, whose head also he caused to be cut off, & their heads were set vp at Newmarket. When the Bishop with the Knights hasted towards Norfolke, meaning to come to a place called South-walsham, where the Commons were determined to stay for the Kings answer.

In passing the countrey the Bishops number increased, for diuers Knights and many gentlemen of the countrey that lay hid for feare of the Commons, seeing the Bishop in armour, they ranne forth and toynd with him. The Bishop therfore when he came to the said place, hauing about him a fowely company, he found that the Commons had entrenched themselves after the manner of warre, and had set vpon the rampier of their trench, windowes, doores, tables, bordes, with pales for their defence: behind them, they had placed their carts, as if they meant not to flee, and forthwith the spartiall Bishop commaunded his trumpets to sound and taking a speare in his hand, set spurs to his horse, and is caried forth vpon them with such a courage, that with swift race he gafe the trench of them, and as he had bin a foming boze robe amongst his enemies where they were thickest, striking this man through, and felling that man downe, and ceased not till the company following hauing got the trench were ready to fight, those of the Bishops retinue therfore fought very sharply, and so likewise did the Commons, till at length the Commons fled, but the Bishop stopped them, knocking them downe, till the chiefe stirrers of the tumult being taken with their King Iohn Litstar, (so many as pleased him being saued alive) he got the full victorie. The Bishop brought the said John Litstar vnto Dyalwing, hanging, and beheading: and so the countrey was in peace.

John Litstar.

Thus hauing shewed a few things which were done in Norfolke, I passe ouer to write of the rest done in that and other countries, but what they ment against the King, the confession of Iacke Scraw declareth, who was chiefe amongst them, next to Wat Tyler. This man being taken, when at London he should by iudgement giuen by the Spaior, lose his head; the Spaior spake openly to him thus. Iohn (quoth he) behold thy death is at hand without all doubt, and there is no way through which thou mayest hope to escape, wherefore for thy soules health, without making any lye, tell vs what you purposed amongst you to haue done, to what ende did you assemble the Commons: And when he had sayde a while as doubtful, what to say, deferring his answer, the Spaior added, Thou knowest surely, O Iohn, that the thing which I demaunde of thee, if thou doe it, the same shall rebounde to thy soules health, &c. He therfore animated with fayre promises, beganne as followeth.

Now saith he, It boteth not to lye, neither is it lawfull to vtter any vntruth, especially vnderstanding that my soule is to suffer more traytor formentes if I should so doe, and because I hope for two commodities by speaking the truth, first that these things that I shall speake may profite the common wealth: and secondly, after my death, I trust by your suffrages to be succored, according according to your promises (which is to pray for me) I will speake faithfully without deceit.

the rebels.

The same time (sayeth he) that we came to Blacke Heath, when we sent for the King, we purposed to haue murdered at the knights, Esquires and gentlemen that should haue come with him, and to haue ledde the King royally beset, by and downe, that with the sight of him, all men especially the common people might haue come vnto vs the more heldey, and when we had got together an innumerable multitude, we would haue sodainly put to death in euery Countrey, the Lords and masters of the common people, in whom might appeare to be either counsell or resistance against vs: and specially we would haue destroyed the knights of Saint Iohns, lastly we would haue killed the King himselfe, and all men that had been of any possession, Bishops, Monkes, Chanons, Parsons, to be briefe, we would haue dispatched: one by begging Friars should haue liued, that might haue sufficed for ministering the Sacraments in the whole Realme, for we should haue made Kings, War Tyler in Kent, and in euery other shire one. But because this our purpose was hindered by the Archbishop, we studied how to bring him shortly to his ende.

Against the same day that War Tyler was killed, we purposed that euening (because that the poore people of London seemed to fauour vs) to set fire in foure corners of the Citie, and so to haue burnt it, and to haue deuised the riches at our pleasures amongst vs. We added that these things they purposed to haue done, as God should helpe him at the end of his life.

After this confession made, he was beheaded, and his head set on London Bridge by War Tilers and many other.

Jacke Straw
beheaded.

Principall Captaines.

The principall leaders of the Commons were War Tyler, the second John Strawe, the third John Kirkby, the fourth Allen Threder, the fifth Thomas Scott, the sixth Ralph Rugge: these and many others were leaders of the Kentish and Essex men. At Mildehall and Bury in Suffolke, was Robert Welbrom, that made himselfe King, and was most famous after John Wraw, who being a priest would not let crowne vpon eroline, but left the name of King and crowne to the said Robert. At Dorset which John Little a dier, exercised the name and power of a King, till he was taken and hanged for his paynes.

War Tyler being killed, Jacke Straw and other their principall Captaines hanged or beheaded, the hope and confidence of the Commons decayed, but because the minnes of the King and nobles was yet wauering, seeing the people ready to mischefe, they graunted to them Charters of manumission and suffered them to depart, the which being done, the King caused an army to be assembled from London, and sent into all Countreies that those who were his friends should make haste to come to him to London, furnished with horse and armour, and it came to passe that within thre daies he had a thousand horsemen about him in seemely fort armed, he mustred them on Blacke Heath, himselfe riding on a great courser, with his standard borne before him: when therefore so mighty an army was assembled, the King was advertised that the Kentish men had effronies conspired, whereupon he forthwith set forward, but but by the mediation of the Nobles and great men of Kent that undertoke for them, he was stayde and pacified with them, and then first Iudices were sent to seeke and inquire of malefactours, and that Countrey became quiet at the sight of them. When the Priors of London sitting in Iudgement, caused the malefactours to be tried, as well of the Citie as also of Kent, Essex, North, Dorset, Suffolke, and Suffolke and other Countreies, that might be taken with in the liberties of the Citie, and all those whom he found guiltie of the fore-said treason, he caused to hoppe headlesse, among the which were Jacke Strawe, John Kirkby, Allen Threder, &c. also John Starling of Essex, that glozied to haue beheaded the Archbishop, was beheaded himselfe.

The king remained now at London, now at Waltham, with a great army of armed men, considering what was to be done for the commoditie of the Realme. At length the Counsell thought good to send the Kings commission into euery shire, for the resisting of the disquieters of the peace of the Kingdome. These commissions did much comfort the faithfull subiects, and troubled the false, for they were now compelled to seeke corners, that before took upon them to doe all things a brasse, & suppress now durst come forth of their dennes, and those which before fled from the tyrannie of the time, looked for those that now feared iudgement and iustice to be done on them.

The commons being thus feared, but not in all places alike, they of Essex gathering a new multitude together at Billerica, a village nere to Hatfield Generell, decreed either to enjoy liberty gotten by force, or to dye in fighting for the same, they sent to the King then being at Waltham messengers to knowe if hee thought good to permit them to enjoy their permitted libertie, like to their Lords, and that they should not be compelled to come to courts, but only to great Courts twice in the yeare, vnto the which the king answered thus. Oh miserable and hateful both to land and sea, not worthy to liue: doe ye require to be equall to your Lords? Ye were worthy to be put to most shameful death: but sith ye are come as messengers ye shall not die now, to the end ye may declare our answers to your fellowes: declare to them therefore on the Kings behalfe, that as they were husbandmen and bondmen, so shall they remaine in bondage, not as before, but more vile, without comparison farre, vnto this. Whilste we liue, and by Gods sufferance shall gouerne the Kingdome, with witte, strength and gods, we will endeavour our selues to keepe you vnder, so that the duty of your seruice, may be an example for posteritie, and that your matches both present, and that shall succede, may euer haue before their eyes, as it were in a glasse, your miserie, and to you matter to curie, and feare to commit the like. When the messengers were gone, there was sent straightwaies into Essex, Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, and sir Thomas Percy brother to the earle of Northumberland, to repress the boldnesse of the said commons.

King to the Commons of Essex.

These commons had fortified themselves with ditches and carriages: nevertheless, although there was a great number of them, with small busshes they were scattered into the woods, where the Lords inclosed them, least any of them might escape: and it came to passe, that five hundred of the were slaine, and eight hundred of their horses taken, the other that escaped this slaughter being gotten together, hasted to Colchester, and began to stir the townsmen to a new tumult, and when they posted not there, they went to Subbury, but the Lord Fitz Water and Sir John Harleston followed them, and slew as many of them as they list, and shut up the rest in prisons. The King came to his manor of Baiering at Bourc, and after to Chelmsford, where he appointed Sir Rob. Trishan his Justice to sit and enquire of the malefactours, wherefore the men seeing the cutis that hung over their heads, there came about five hundred humbly to the King barefooted and bareheaded, beseeching him of pardon and mercie. To whom pardon was granted, with condition, to deliuer the stirrers of the said trouble. It came therefore to passe, that many were committed to warde, upon whom, the Justice charged foure and twentie men of their conscience to say the truth, and many being condemned, were put to execution, by drawing and hanging, nine or tenne being hanged on one beame. The Justices that before had sit in Essex, Kent, London, and other places, for all the multitude that were to be executed, bled to head the Commons, till now it seemed not a kinde of death answerable to so many & manifest crimes. These things were done in Essex, the King being present: the like by his Justices was done in other countries.

The tenth of July John Ball priest being taken at Coventry, and brought to Saint Albons, was there before the King condemned, and had iudgement giuen him by Sir Robert Trishan knight almost skilful Justice, as a traitour to be drawne, hanged, headed and bowelled, whose death was respited untill the sponday at the intercession of William Bishop of London, who being careful for his soules health, obtained that space for his repentance. This man a twentie yeeres together and more, preached in diuers places those things which he knew to be liking to the common people, slaunders as well ecclesiasticall persons, as secular Lords, seeking thereby, rather the bencuolence of the common people, then merite towards God: he taught that tithes were not to be giuen to the church men, except the partie that should giue the same were richer then the Vicar or parson that should receiue it. Also that tithes and oblations were to be withdrawen from Curates: if the parishioners or parishoner were of better life then the Curate. Also that no man was made for the kingdome of God, that was not bozne in matrimony, he taught many other things too long to rehearse, for the which he was prohibited of the Bishops in whose diocesses he had attempted these things, that he should not preach from thenceforth in any Church: he went forth therefore into the streets and wayes, and into fields to preach, & there wanted not of the commons that came to heare him, whom he euer sought to allure to his sermons, by detraiding of the prelates. At the length being excommunicated, and yet not desisting, hee was committed to prison by Simon the Archbishop of Canterbury, and William Bishop of London, where he prophesied that he should be deliuered by twentie thousand of his friends, which came so to passe in the foresaid time of troubles, when all prisons were broken up, and the prisoners set at liberty, and when hee was so deliuered, hee followed them, instigating them to committe much euill, and preaching that so it ought to be done. And that his doctrine might infect the more number of people, at Blackheath, where there were many thousands of the Commons assembled, he began his Sermon in this manner:

When Adam delue and Eue span, who was then a gentleman?

And continuing his beguine Sermon, he sought by the worde of that proverbe which he took for his theme, to introduce, and proue, that from the beginning, all were made a like by nature, and that bondage or seruitude was brought in by iniust oppression of naughty men, against the will of God: so if it had pleased God to haue made bondmen, he would haue appointed them from the beginning of the world, who should haue been slave, and who Lord. They ought to consider therefore, that now there was a time giuen them by God, in the which, laying asse the yoke of continuall bondage, they might, if they would, enjoy their long wished for libertie. Wherefore he admonished them, that they should be wise, and after the manner of a good husband that tilled his ground, and did cutte away all noysome weedes that were accustomed to growe and oppresse the fruite, they should make haste to doe now at this present the like. First, the Archbishop and great men of the kingdome were to be slaine: after, Lawyers, Justiciars, and Questioners: lastly, whomsoever they knewe to be like hereafter hurtfull to the Commons, they should dispatch out of the land, for so might they purchase safety to themselves hereafter, if the great men being once taken away, there were among them equall libertie, all one nobilitie and like dignitie, and semblable authoritie or power. These, and many such mad deuises he preached, which made the common people to esteeme of him in such manner, as they cryed out, he should be Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancelor of the Realme, for he onely deserved the honour. Moreover, he had sent to the borders of the Commons in Essex a Letter full of riddles or darke sentences, exhorting them to procede in their begun enterprises, which Letter was after found in the bonnet of one that should be hanged, the tenour whereof was thus:

John Shepe, sometime Saint Mary Wyest of Poike, and now of Colchester, greeteth well John Namelesse, and John Milner, and John Carrar, and biddeth them that they beware of Gillingbrough, and standeth together in Gods name, and biddeth Pierce Plowman goe to his worke, and chaffice well Hob the rober, and take with him John Trueman, and all his fellows, and no more, John the Miller hath yground small small, the Kings sonne of be, den shall pay for all, beware of ye be woe, know your friend from your foe, haue thy proung, and saith hee, and doe well and better, and fleeth sinne, and sa keth peace, and holde therein, and so biddeth John Trueman and all his fellows.

This letter John Ball confessed himselfe, that he had written and sent to the Commons: where, he confessed to William then Bishop of London, to Walter Lee knight, and John Peibor Notarie, that a certain company of his felis were confederate to go rounde about all England, and to preach these points which he had taught, naming I. John Duke of Lancaster that a little before these troubles began, was gone southward to beat the day of truce or march, as þ manner was euerie yere, when he heard of the hurling of the commons, in the tyme that they had the upper hand ouer their Lords, he was maruellously amazed, and for calling what might follow, thought it best, with speeche to make peace with the Scots, which was done before those tumults came to the eares of the Scots, and by them confirmed by oth for two yeres truce, that they would faithfully keepe the same.

London.

About the feast of All Saints, a Parliament was begun, which endured long, to small purpose, by reason of contention among the Lords, especially the Duke of Lancaster, and the Earle of Northumberland, whose quarrel in the end was taken up by the King, and then the Lords proceeded to treat of the Kings businesse and the Realmes, but they lingered so long in vaine, that when some effect was thought should haue succeeded, newes came of the coming to Calceys of the new Quene. The King had made his choice before to haue this woman, and had bought her with a great price and much labor, for he gave to the Emperour, 1. thousand pound, beside other great expences, to make this marriage. Although the daughter of Barnabe Duke of Millan was offered vnto him with an inestimable some of golde. This Quenes coming therefore being vnderstood, the Parliament was prorogued, to begin againe after Christmas. There were diuers of the Nobles sent to meete the Queene, and she was conueyed with all the gloze of the world vnto Douer, many both of her Countrey, and also of England, attending on her.

After the feast of the Epiphany, also the Nobilitie of the Realme assembled at London, to be present at the Kings marriage, and to do their seruice according to the custome of euery one in ancient time used. This Virgin named Anne, the daughter of Vclaus King of Boheme, is at Westminster consecrated the Kings wife, & by the Archbishop of Canterbury is crowned Quene. There were iustices kept for the honour of such a solemnization, certaine dayes together, in which, both the Englishmen shewed their force, and the Quenes countymen their prowesse.

In this Quenes dayes, began the detestable vse of pliked shoes, tyed to their knes with chaines of silver and gilt. Also noblewomen used high attire on their heads, pliked like hornes, with long trained gownes, and rode on side saddles, after the example of the Quene who first brought that fashion into this land, for before, women were used to ride as ride like men. The solemnity of the marriage being ended, the parliament is now begun againe, in which, many articles are proposed and decreed, to wit, of admitting strangers to sell personally their wares, without impeachment of the merchants of England: of the abrogating of forres, and finer garnishing of girdles &c. of the price of wines, that is, that the tunne should not excede sixe markes, &c.

After his death the parliament was ended, after the marchants of England had granted to the king a subsidy, and the customes of woolle for foure paires next ensuing, which the Commons called le Maltot.

In this Parliament, the Lords and Commons requesting it, Sir Richard Scrope knight was ordeined Chauncelor: as the man which in excellent knowledge & inflexible iustice, had not his like for his calling in this Realme. Sir Hugh Segraue knight was made Lord Treasorer.

Edward Mortimer Earle of March departed this life in Ireland, after he had brought that land all in manner vnto peace and quietnesse, hauing gouerned it most nobly and wisely.

About the feast of Saint John ante portlane, all the nobles of the Realme were called to London, and other that of custome were wont to be called, although the Lent before there had been an other parliament, as before we haue shewed, in which, by the petition of the knights of the shires, John Wrawe knight, that was leader of them that did rise at Guildenhal and Burp, was ad- iudged to hanging and drawing, though many believed that he would haue been redeemed with money.

The one and twentieth day of May was a great earthquake in England at nine of the clocke, fearing the hearts of many, but in Lent it was most terrible, where it suncke some Churches, and threwe them downe to the earth.

There followed also another Earthquake the xxiii. of May in the morning before the sunne rising, but not so terrible as the first. Sir Richard Scrope is depriued of the chancelorship, which he had gouerned laudably, and Robert Braybroke Bishop of London, is made Chancelor.

There arriued in a great tempest, a ship called a Caricke, at Sandwich, an huge beffell, and so fraught with riches, that she might haue furnished the want of all the land, if the enuie of the inhabitantes would haue permitted, but the marchants of London hauing much old wares, as fruits, spices, oiles, and such like, they compounded with the Genowayes to forsake that haue, and to passe ouer into Flanders, and so for the couetousnes of a few, the whole Realme suffered great hindrance.

King Richard gaue to Sir Simon Burghley his chamberlaine the keeping of his foirest of Wolmore in Southamptonsheire, for tearme of his life: he also gaue to John Burghley, Simon Burghley, Richard Burghley, knights, and Bawd- wine de Radington Esquire, all the manour of Warroke nigh to Cran- end.

About the Feast of Saint Thomas the Apostle, great raynes and inunda- tions of waters chaunced, so that the water rose foure times more in height then before, drowning by Villages and Cattails, destroying Bridges and Milles.

About the moneth of May, the Bishop of Poswich sayled ouer the seas into Flanders with a great power, where he waime the Dolunes of Graueling, Bugh, Dunckerke, & Newport.

and his Quene, with their Bohemians, visited the Abbeyes of this realme, to the which, their coming was very chargeable, for they came with an ex- cessiue number, all which came to take, but not to giue.

The Scots taking occasion of the time, for that a great number were gone ouer with the Bishop of Poswich, entred into Northumberland, & did much hurt to the inhabitants, taking prizes in euery place, and leading away the people prisoners, and carrying them into Scotland: they take the Castell of Marke upon the riuier of Tweed, and bent it.

About the feast of All-Saintes, a Parliament was holden at London, in which, the halfe of a fifteene was granted vnto the king by the Laytie, and shortly after the halfe of a tenth by the Clergy, a portion of which money, the Lords of the North demaunded, because in this Parliament they were ap- pointed to defend those parts against the irruptions of Scots, to whom an- swere was made by sir William Wakeham Bishop of Winchester, that they were made for that cause, of poore men, rich men and Lordes, that they might the more frankly keepe the Scots, and that the king and Lords of the south parts should be the lesse troubled. And because the Scots came not to this Parliament, according to covenant, and beside that did displeasures vnto the inhabitants of the south parts, it was decreed by this Parliament, that vnto faith-breakers, faith should be broken againe, and that a chosen power should be sent thither, forth of England, vnder the leading of Thomas of Woodstocke, to wit, a thousand lances, and two thousand archers, to restraine their attempts.

These things being knowne, the Scots being afraid of themselves, in the ende of the Parliament came, and were desirous to intreat of peace or truce, but the Englishmen hauing treped their falshood so oftentimes, would neither treat, nor compound with them, but commaunded them to returne home, and warned them to saue their heads as well as they might, and to defend their rights. The Scots being returned, the Lords of the North toke vpon them to defend the Countrey, till Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham were ready to come with a greater power.

In this Parliament the king toke the temporalties of the Bishop of Pos- wich into his hands, because he was disobedient to his commaundement when he sent to haue stayed him from his tourney into Flanders, and the knights that went ouer with him were put in prison, till they were redeemed with gold.

King Richard held his Christmas at his Manor of Eltham, and with him his Quene Anne.

After Christmas, John Duke of Lancaster, which before Christmas went ouer into France to treat of peace betwixt the Realmes, returned into England, bringing with him an abstinence of warre till the feast of St. John Baptist, at what time he was to returne to treat againe, and to confirme the peace if it might be agreed vpon betwixt the kings.

John Duke of Lancaster burnt toward Scotland.

When Lent approached, John Duke of Lancaster, with his brother Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, and an innumerable number of knights, Esquires, and Archers, went toward Scotland, but staid in the North untill all the victualles in the Countrey were consumed: he did moze hurt to the inhabitants, then the Scots had done before. At length, about the feast of Easter, he entred Scotland, but did little good.

John Wickliffe
died.

This p̄ere master John Wickliffe, sometime student in Canterbury Colledge in the Uniuersitie of Oxfozd, parson of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, hauing bene torred with a palsey by the space of two yeres, died, on the last of December, and was buried at Lutterworth. This man whyles he liued, as also long after his death, was greatly fauoured by the students of that Uniuersity, as may appeare by letters testimonial, made moze then twenty yeres after his decease, as follo weth.

Oxfozd of the
Wickliffe.

To all children of our holy mother the Church, vnto whom these presents shall come, the Chancelloz, and company of masters of the Uniuersity of Oxfozd, sendeth greeting in our Lord everlasting. For as much as it is not decent to ouerpasse with continual silence, the acts of the balliant, noz the laudes and merits of the god, but that the same should be manifested to the world by true fame for a witness of it selfe, and example of others, soz that also the p̄o: uident discretion of humane nature, weeping mans cruelty, hath ordained this manner of remembrance, and this buckler of defence, against the blasphemous insulting of others, that when a testimonny by word cannot allwaies be ready, a penne to write may supply: thereon it cometh to passe, that we hauing conceived a spectall god minde, and tender care ouer the childre sometime of our Uniuersitie, John Wickliffe professor of holy theologie, according to the deserts of his manners, do testifie with heart, word, and writing, that his condicions, whyle he liued, were commendable, whose honestie of manners, p̄o: funditie of iudgement, and pleasantnes of flourishing fame, we couet so much the moze to bring to the knowledge of faithfull people, as the perfection of his conuersation, and his diligence of his writings might be the moze evidently knowen to tend to Gods gloz, the weale of his neighbour, and profit of the Church, wherfore we publish vnto you by these presents, that his connecti-

tion from his tender yeres continued, till the tyme of his decease, hath bin here right god and honest, so as there was neuer any motion o: note of sinister suspicion o: infamie cast abroad of him, but in answering, reading, preaching, and soluting, hath behaued himselfe p̄aile worthily, like a stout Champion of the faith, vanquished by sentences of Scripture, like a Catholike man all those blasphemers of Christs religion by their wilful beggerie. And therfore was not the foresaid Dotoz condemned of heretike prauitie, o: yet by our Prelates to be burnt after his burial. God defend therfore that our Prelates should haue condemned to god a man for an heretike, which in Logike, Philosophy, in Theologie, in Moralities, and Speculatiues among all that hath written, (as we thinke) in our Uniuersitie, without p̄ere. All which things we desire to bring to the knowledge of all and singular persons vnto whose hands these presents may come, to the intent that the said Dotozs fame may the oftner be had in remembrance. In witness whereof, we haue caused these our letters testimoniall to be sealed with our common seale.

Given at Oxford in our congregation house the fift day of the moneth of October. Anno. 1406.

All this notwithstanding afterward (being excommunicated by Thomas Arundale Archbishop of Canterbury) his bones, by a Dotoz of Diuinitie of Oxfozd, named Richard Fleming Bishoppe of Lincoln, were taken vp and burnt, and the ashes thzowen into the next water nere vnto Lutterworth. 41. yeres after his decease in Anno 1425. by commaundement of Pope Martine the fift. Thus much for Wickliffe.

The custody of the castle of Dover being void by the death of Robert Ash-ton was then appointed to Simon Burley, who was made Constable there.

After the quindene of Easter the nobles came together to a Parliament at Salisbury, whither a certain Irish frier of the order of Carmelites, a batcheler of Diuinity named John Latimer, halsted in an euill houre, soz he had written a certain scedul in the which was contained many horrible practices devised (as he said) by the duke of Lancaster, soz it was in that scedul expressed, that the said duke had determined sodainly to oppresse the 3. and to take vpon him the kingdom, there was assigned the tyme, place, & other circumstances y might make euident p̄o:se of the thing. The frier obtaining access vnto the 3. p̄sence, toke y scedule to his own hands, swearing by the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, which that day he had receiued, that al witten in that scedule was true. The duke therfore being called to the 3. and hauing the scedul deliuered into his hands, desired the 3. that the frier might be put in safe keeping, till the day y he should shew the cause of those things which he had proposed against him, & besought the 3. that sir lo. Holland might haue special charge of him. The 3. lo. Holland, was the 3. brother by his mother, the sonne of the 3. Tho. Holland, who gladly for the loue of his brother the duke did willingly accept the frier into his custody. The night before the day giuen to the frier to make his answere, lo. Holland & another knight, called sir Henry Greene taking the frier, put a cord about his necke, (some say about his armes) & with the same cord tying his cōde, hanged him vp from the ground, laying a stone o: weight.

The morow after, they caused the friers body to be drawne through the towne as a traitor, that they might put away all suspicion, that he were put to death wrongfully: but it is to be wounded at, that neither Esquier, Peman, nor Cromme, or any other of mean estate, would harme the frier, but the knights did it themselves, they were Judges, Officers, and executioners, and this was the fruite of this Parliament, except that the king asked and had of the Lattie halfe a fiftenth, and of the Cleargie halfe a tenth.

About this time, because the Scots sealed not to do diuers damages to the Northumbres, the Earle of Northumberland Henry Percy, prepareth to invade Scotland, and to requite damage for damage, which enterprise accomplished, the Earle was no sooner returned, and sent home his army, but that the Scottes came againe, and heaped vp damage vpon damage in the countrey.

Sir John Philpot deceased.

John Duke of Lancaster go-
eth into France.

This Sommer, sir John Philpot a most faithfull knight, and noble Citizen of London, that had a long time travelled for the commodity of the Realme more then all other, and both with experiences laid forth, & good affection borne, (for he had oftentimes relieved the king) departed this life, leaving none behind him: his like in good affections.

About the beginning of August, the Duke of Lancaster went into France to treat with the Frenchmen of peace, or els of truce to be had: the Duke with his company of noble men remaining long there, when it was thought that he should haue brought glad and joyfull newes to his Countrey, he returned with knowledge of warres, to follow to the beginning of the next Sommer, the truce to endure but till the first of May, and so he returned, after he had spent 500000. Markes of silver.

Many of the Nobles assembled at Reading, to repress the seditious stirres of John Northampton, late Mayor of London, that attempted great and heinous enterprises, of the which he was conuict, his own chaplein offering many things that he went about and had deuised, as well to the hindrance and harme of the king, as of the Citie of London, and when sentence should haue bene pronounced against him, the king being present, the wicked man made a reclamation, and maintained that such iudgement ought not to passe in absence of his Lord the Duke of Lancaster, but yet the iustice vied such wordes, John (saith he) the naughty deeds that are objected against thee, thou oughtest to reuell by battell, or else by the lawes of the land to be drawne, hanged, and quartered. And when he had made, nor would offer one word, it was decreed that he should be committed to perpetuall prison, and his goods to be confiscate to the kings use, and that he should not come within one hundred miles of London during his life, he was sent therefore to the Castle of Flintagell in the confines of Cornwall, and in the meane space the kings servants spoiled spoiled his goods. John More, Richard Northbery, & other, were like wise there conuict, and condemned to perpetuall prison, and their goods confiscate to the king, for certain congregations by them made against the fish-mongers in the Citie of London.

Parliament
at London.

About the feast of St. Martine, a Parliament was holden at London in the which nothing was done worth y memoie, but that which stil was in hand, and exacting of money of the Cleargie and common people, to maintaine the men of warre. And besides this, about the feast of Saint Andrew there was a combat fought in listes at Westminster, betwixt an Esquier of England named John Vvelch of Strimelby, & one of France, called Mortleto de Vilenos, that had accused the English Esquier, of treason to the king and Realme, but the effect was, that when he was Captaine of Cherburgh, he forced the wife of this Navarroys, as the said Navarroys being after ward ouercome, and being ready to suffer death, did openly confesse, for the which cause, by the kings iudgement, he was drawen & hanged, although the Quene and many other did make earnest intercession to haue his life saved.

tough.

The Parliament was not yet ended, when newes came out of the North of the taking of Berwicke Castell by the Scots, the custodie wherof, the Earle of Northumberland, sir Henry Percy did possesse, by right of his predecessors. The Scots by mediation of money, got entrance into that castell, by one that was put in trust with keeping of it. The Duke of Lancaster that loued not the Earle, was glad of this happe, when he knew it. It came to passe therfore by the Dukes procurement, that the Earle was condemned by iudgement of the Lords there present, the which execution was within a short while after released. The Earle of Northumberland, though the kings fauour restorred to his life and possessions, without any long delates, prepareth al furniture of warre to besiege and win the said Castell of them that were within it, and after he had gathered a mighty army, he suddenly besieged it, and after he had layne about it a certaine time, it was compounded betwixt them without, and them within, that they within should forsake the Castell, and haue their liues and monieable goods, and for surrendering the Castell, they should haue of the Earle two thousand markes of English money, and by this meanes did the Earle recover the Castell forth of the Scottishmens hands. King Richard kept a solemn feast of Christmas at Eltham with Quene Anne his wife, whom he seldom suffered to go from his side, there were at that feast the Bohemians, the Quenes countrymen, that hauing once tasted the sweetnesse of this land, forgetting their owne countrey like vnsheamefast guests, would not go home againe.

Though certaine young men brought vp with the king, there arose great dissension betwixt him and the Duke of Lancaster, who departed from the Court, and went to his Castell of Pomfret, which he had fortified, but by means of the kings mother, this discord was appeased for a time.

The Walling.

The same time the coniunction of two of the greatest planets chaunced, to wit, of Iupiter and Saturne, in the moneth of May, after the which a great mutation of kingdomes followed.

The

The third of May was an earthquake.

The king entered Scotland.

King Richard with a great armie entred Scotland, but the enemies would not shew themselves, wherefore he burnt the Countrey and returned. The eighteenth of July there was an Earthquake. Sir Iohn de Viennne that serued the French king was sent into Scotland with a great multitude of ships and men of warre, that toyning with the Scots, they might infect all England, and that whilest they might draw the power of this Realme that way forth, the French king, with his Pary and armie, might the more at liberty enter other parts of the Realme, few or none being left at home to prohibite them their entrie. The arrivall of the said Iohn being knowne in England, the king with all the Nobilitie prepared themselves to make a journey thither: there came flocking unto the king such a number of knights, Esquiers, and Archers, as the like had not bene heard of in those daies, in so much, as the number of horses amounted to three hundred thousand, as they were lodged, were large the king rejoyced hereat, as well he might, but the rejoycing was shortly darkened at Poyke, by fiercenesse of Sir Iohn Holland, the kings brother, that slew the Lord Ralph Stafford, sonne to the Earle of Stafford, in the way as he went to the Queene, whose servant of household he was, and greatly insansur with her, and he was no lesse beloued of the king, as he that had bene brought up with him, and bene his playfellow from his tender age, where the king taking great indignation, determined to pursue the said Sir Iohn Holland: hee caused therefore his goods to be confiscate. But Sir Iohn Holland fled to Beverley, to enjoy the libertie of the Church. The Lady Iane the kings mother, sent to intreate him for her other sonne, and his brother, but when the messengers were returned to Wallingfoerde, and that the mother could perceiue no hope of grace to be gotten in that behalfe of the king, she toke it heavily, and fell sicke, and within foure or five daies departed this life, her boole being seized and closed in Lead, was kept at Wallingfoerde, till the kings returne forth of Scotland, then to be buried at Stanfords, in the Church of the Friers Spinozas.

Lady Iane the kings mother died, buried at Stanfords.

Edwards and Denbrough went.

In the moneth of August, the King of England with a mightie power entred Scotland, with whole force the Scots and Frenchmen perceiuing themselves not able to match, they like to get them into the woods and places where they might be out of the way. The English armie, then the which there hath not bene scene alaise, stronger, or greater, rideth through the Countrey, that was destitute of inhabitants, both of Castell, and wanting victuals, for the land was left desolate (as our men confessed) that they sawe not so much as a bird, dwles onely excepted. They found green coine on the ground, very faire and plentifull, which they eyther cate up with their horses, or tread downe with their feete, but the enemies seeing battell, our men did nothing to be accounted of, but burnt the Abbey of Melrois, and the towne of Denbrough, with such houses as they found by the way. When our armie was come to Denbrough, and that victuals failed them, many of them began to waile sicke, & some to die for hunger: whereupon the king returned ned with his armie into England. While king Richard was in Scotland, the Scots and Frenchmen entred into England, burning Townes, taking spoiles, and leading away many prisoners, returned home into their Countrey.

The Scots spoyle in England.

The souldiers of Calais went secretly forth into France, and got a battell of foure thousand shepe, and three hundred head of great beasts, which they draw to their holdes.

About the feast of Saint Martine, there was a Parliament at London, in which, the Laptie granted to the king a fifthenth and a halfe, with a condition, that the Cleargie should giue a tenth and a halfe. William Courney, Archbishop of Canterbury standing there against, said, the Church ought to be free, and in no wise to be taxed by the laptie, yea, hee would rather put his head in daunger for this cause, then to suffer the English Church to be brought into such servitude: which answer was so much moved the knights and Commons of the thires, with some of the Nobles of the Realme, that they in great rage, made request, that the temporalities might be taken from the Cleargie, and Church-men, saying, that the Church-men were growne to such pride, that it was a darde of charitie, and almes by taking away their temporalities, to compell them to be more make and humble: this they cried out for, this they presented in writing to the King, and such was their labour in this point, that they were in hope to bring it to passe. Here mooght you have seene the knights pleasant and merry, talking of these things, even as the temporalities of the Church had bene assigned to their abusing, this man promising himselfe thus much of that Monasterie, that man of an other, I heard my selfe (saith Thomas Walsingham) one of the knights deeply sweare, that of the Abbey of Saint Albones, hee would have a thousand markes by yere of the temporalities: But to such a mad wish the King consented not, for bearing the inordinate crying out of the one side, and the ill answeres on the other, hee commaunded that bill to be cancelled, and such inordinate petitions to cease, saying that hee would preserve the Church during his time, in as good state as hee found it, or better: with the which answeres, hee so liked the Church-men, that hee was thought worthy of great recompence, and of good paye men also this answeres was much commended. The Archbishoppe therefore, having made the Cleargie paise, went to the King, and declared that hee and his Cleargie of their whole consentes and free willes had pouldred for his life a Lenth, which graunt the King so gladly heard, and thankfully received, that hee openly affirmed, hee had rather have this free graunt, then any other foure times double the value, that was to be contrapned; and so for that time the insatiable covetousnesse of the enemies, to catch other mens goodes, was made frustrate.

Will put against the Cleargie for their temporalities.

The eleuenth of November, Robert Vere, Earle of Orfords, was made Marquess of Dublin in Ireland, and the king gave him lands to the value of a thousand markes by yere, that belonged the Lord Audley; he also made him

King of Spain

Henry Percy went to Caleis.

Lord Justice of Chester, he gave to him the Castell of Flint in Wales, and also he gave to him 1. of Britons sonne and heire to Charles de Bloys a prisoner, for whom he had 20000. pounds. Th. of Woodstocke was made D. of Gloucester, and his brother Edmond Earle of Cambridge, Duke of York. Michael de la Pole Chancellor of England, was made Earle of Suffolk, and had given him by the king a thousand markes by the year. In the Parliament the Earle of March Mortimer, was proclaimed heire apparent to the Crowne, which Earle was shortly after slain in Ireland by the wilde Irish. Also, king Richard at the earnest request of the Bishops, restored to the Bishop of Exeter, which his temporalities which he had holden from him many years. B. Richard with Quene Anne his wife, kept their Christmas at Eltham, whither came to him Lion king of Ermony, under pretence to restore peace betwixt the kings of England and of Fraunce, but what his comming profited, hee only understood, for beside innumerable giftes that hee received of the king & of the nobles, the king lying in the Royal at the Quenes wardrop in London, granted to him a Charter of a thousand pounds by year during his life. Hee was (as hee affirmed) chased out of his Realme by the Tartarians, and for that cause he got great giftes of the Christian Princes. About the feast of Easter, John Duke of Lancaster, with the Lady Constance his wife and a great company of knights, Esquiers, and Archers came to take their leave of the king and Quene, at whose departing the king gave to the Duke a crowne of gold, and the Quene gave another like crowne of golde to the Dutches, moreover the king commanded his people to call them King and Quene of Spayne, and give them kingly honour. And shortly after the Duke preparerth to go into Spayne, which was due to him by the inheritable right of his wife the Lady Constance, daughter sometime to Peter king of Castile and Lion, so that now he meant to challenge it either with consent of the inhabitantes, or by law of Armes. Hee with a great power toke the seas at Plymouth, and landed in Spayne, at the Haven of Grogne, on the evening of St. Laurence, with all his familie in safety.

Hee had with him twentie thousand chosen people, of whom was 2000. armed men, and 8000. Archers. Hee appointed for Admirall of his whole fleet, Th. Percy, sir John Holland brother to king Richard by the mothers side after created Earle of Huntingdon, and had married one of the Dukes daughters, was appointed Constable of the hoste, sir Richard Burghley marshall, and after him sir Th. le Moleneux was marshall, sir John Marmion Chamberlaine, &c.

This year rumours were raised of the French kings purpose to besiege Calais, many valiant men therefore went out of England to resist his force, among whom was sir Henry Percy, a young Gentleman, in whom the promise of all prowesse and chivalry did shine, which after hee had stayed about Calais idly taking indignation, declared that hee hated such idleness, and before this, whilest he was Captaine of Berwick, hee compelled the unquiet Scots to be quiet, for which cause they called him Henry Hotspur: this Henry assembling his companions, maketh invasion upon them about Turwine, Turwine, and also where in Picardie, taketh prizes, exercising laudable fates, and when he understood that the French king meant not to besiege Calais, but rather to invade England, he returns home, that he might here encounter him.

The Londoners understanding that the French king had got together a great power, assembled an armie, and set his purpose firmly to come into England, they trembling like Leversets, fearful as mice, like starting hoes to hide themselves in, even as if the Citie were now to be taken, and they that in times past bragged they would blowe all the Frenchmen out of England, hearing now a vaine rumour of the enemies comming, they runne to the walles, breake downe the houses adorning, destroy and lay them flat, and do all things in great feare, not one Frenchman yet hauling set foot on shipbord, what would they have done, if the battell had bene at hand, and the weapons over their heads:

About the feast of St. Michael the nobles came to the Parliament at London with great numbers of armed men, to the end they might be ready to withstand the Frenchmen, who were supposed to be comming. Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, and Chancellor of England, caused to be called almost forth of every part of the Realme men of armes and archers unto the marches about London, that being ready they might beate backe the Frenchmen with their king, if they had come. Rochester bridge was beaten downe by the Londoners, to be the more surer. But being wearied with long waiting they were at the length sent home againe, with great misery for want of money to buy them victuals.

In this Parliament John Fordham Bishop of Durham was discharged of the Treasurership, and in his place was set John Gilbert a frier preacher, Bishop of Hereford. Also Michael de la Pole was put from his Chancellorship, and in his place was set Thomas Arundale Bishop of Ely, by consent of the whole Parliament. This being done, Michael de la Pole was charged with many crimes, & committed to prison in Windsor Castell, from whence hee was some delivred by the king: all the possessions of de la Pole purchased whilest he was Chancellor, to the very value of 1000. pounds, were for ever by judgement of the parliament, confiscate to the kings coffers, & further to restore to the king to the value of 12000. pounds which hee had gained by lingeering his affairs, as they said. They chose also 13. Lords which should have the oversight under the k. of the whole realm. Of which thre were the new officers, to wit the B. of Ely Chancellor, the Bishop of Hereford Treasurer, and sir John Walsham keeper of the priup seale, and 10. other which were, VVilliam Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbishop of York. Edm. Langley D. of York, Thomas of Woodstocke, Duke of Gloucester, VVilliam VVickham, Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Exeter, Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Richard Earle of Arundell, John Lord Cobham, sir Richard Scrope, and sir I. Courc knights, to these they gave full power to determine causes, from the time of king Edward the third, until that present, as well within the Realme, as without, &c. They granted to the king a tenth of the Cleargie.

and a fifthenth of the Laptie: they granted him 2 s. of every Tonne of Wine coming into the Realme, and of every pound of merchandise going out: counting in 12. d. wool, leather, and sell, excepted.

The French king in the meane time, staid in Flanders, ready to spoyle the Realme of England, if God had not stopped his purpose: from the first of August, till the Euen of All-Saints, there neuer blew wind for his passage, but onely for a fewe houres of that vntre Euen, the wind rising, they loosed anchor, hopped by sailes, and set forth of the haven, but when all the ships were on the sea 20. miles from the haven, the winde came contrary, & drove them backe, that diuers of their vessels entering the haven of Sluce were broken, by which occasion England was deliuered out of daunger, and the French king returned home. The number of his ships in that Haue were reckoned 1200. Froisart saith, the ships were 1287. he had there with him of Dukes, 16. of Carles, 2.6. of knights, 3600. and of fighting men, 100000. R. Richard with his wife Quene Anne and the Bohemians as he had bene accustomed, kept his Christmas very solemnly at Westminster.

After Christmas, William Beauchampe toke 14. ships of the French king, going toward Sluce, whereof one was laden for the most part with hozes, and an other with toches of ware, and such other necessities, which the French king had prepared for his entrance into England.

In the beginning of this yere, at Leicester an hundred quarters of Warley, were sold for an hundred shillings.

About the beginning of March, according to the detraie of the late Parliament, Richard Earle of Arundell, Admirall of the fleet adioyning unto him, the E. of Devonshire, & Thomas Mowbray E. of Nottingham, went to the sea in a happy houre, for within a small time they met with their enemies on the Wigill of our Lady the Annunciation: a great Haue of Flanders, France, and Spayne, fraught with men of warre, and diuers engins, was discovered: with whom the Carles encountered, & toke of them 100. ships and more, the which contained 210. tunns of wine, which they brought to diuers parts of England, where by wine was then sold for thirteen shillings foure pence the tunne.

Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland forsoke his wife, a young Lady noble and faire, bozne of the Lady Isabell, daughter to the noble R. Edward, & married an other that came with Quene Anne forth of Boheme: she was called in the vulgar tongue of her countrey Lancercroa, The Lozpes toke indignation herewith, especially the Duke of Gloucester, vncle to the pong Lady that was forsaken. The Duke of Ireland studied how to take the Duke of Gloucester out of the way, Caster was now past, the time in which the Duke of Ireland should haue transpozted into Ireland, but least there should be too much stur in the Realme among the Lozds, the king as it were to bring him to the water side, goeth with him into Wales, as not to leaue him, but there to keepe him, that they might deuise how to take away the D. of Gloucester, the Carles of Arundell, Marlowe, Darby, and Nottingham, with other. There were with them the Earle of Suffolk, Michael de Pole, Robert Trislian Justice, and many other, which no more slowly then the D. of Ireland, conspired the death of the said noble men. After a great time was passed, the king, as if the Duke of Irelands tourney had bene forgotten, returned with him and the other forth of Wales, to the Castell of Nottingham, there to treat of the death of the said noble men: there therfore he sent for diuers from London, whom he knew would be ready to which way soeuer they should be moved: he called thither also al p. sheriffs & Justices of the realme, & there interdicted the Lozds of many crimes which the king had imagined against them. In the mean time the rumour of this doing came to the Lozds eares, whereupon first of all the kings vncle, the Duke of Gloucester, that he might mitigate the kings displeasure, before the Bishop of London, and many other nobles, swearing upon the Euangelists, toke it upon his oath, that he neuer had imagined any thing to the kings hinderance, or done any thing to his displeasure, except that he had not giuen god countenance to the Duke of Ireland, nor would hereafter giue him any, who had dishonestly his kind woman, the which he firmly had determined to reuenge.

The Duke of Gloucester calling together secretly the Carles of Arundell, Marlowe, and Darby, that were in like danger of condemnation, if they proued not the more speedily, he discovered to them the matter: they therfore gathered their armies together, determine to talke with the king upon the premises. Contrarily the king for his party did deliberate how he might take each of them by themselves out of the way, and first he sent to the Castell of Wigate, where the Earle of Arundell lay, the Earle of Northumberland with many other to arrest him, who perceiving a great number of men of warre about him, fearing to doe that he was commaunded, departed without doing his errand for which he came. After whom, there were sent many that by night should haue taken him, or haue slaine him, but a messenger sent from the Duke of Gloucester, prevented their coming, that caused him to ride all night, so that in the morning he was come to Haringey, hauing passed with his army thirtie miles, not without great trauaile, where he found assembled the Duke of Gloucester & the Earle of Marlowe, with a great power of men. The king being enformed of this assembly in Harnesey woode, as is said, demanded of his familiars what was to be done in this case, but in the ende, by the mediation of them that came betwixt them, the matter was brought to this issue, that the Lozds should come to Westminster to receive and were before the king of those things, the bishop of Ely, with many other men of worth, credite, taking an oath for the kings part, that no fraud, deceit, or perill, should be prepared. When the Lozds had prepared themselves according to the covenant, the foresaid mediators for peace sent them word, that treason was deuised by an ambush laid for them, in a place called the Spewes, nere to Charing Crosse, and therfore willed them not to come, but with sure hand, whereupon they staid there: and the king demanding why the Lozds kept not covenant, the Bishop of Ely answered, because (alth he) there is an ambush laid of a thousand armed men or more, in such a place, contrary to the covenant, and therefore they neither come, nor repute you to be faithfull: the king moved forthwith, where he knew of no such thing, and therefore commaunded the sheriffes of London, that going to the spewes, they should kill, if they found any assembled there for that cause; but Thomas Triuer, and Nicholas Brembar knights, had secretly sent away the armed men to London: the king therfore sent again to the Lordes, who straightwaies came to Westminster with a strong power, against whose coming, the king adorning him selfe with kingly robes, with crowne and scepter, entred Westminster hall, where the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancellor, speaking for the king, demanded the cause of their assembling of such a power, wherunto the Lordes answered, that it was done for the kings profit, and the realmes, to plucke from him the traitors which he kept about him, whom they named to be Robert de Vere D. of Ireland, Alexander Neuell Archbishop of Dorke, Michaell at Pole Earle of Suffolke, Robert Trisilian a false Justice, Nicholas Brembar a false knight of London, and thereupon they threw downe their gloves, swearing that they would prosecute it by battell: nay, saith the king, it shall not be so, but in the next parliament which was appointed to be holden the morrow after the purification of our Ladie, all this was pacified for that time.

A manner of exhalation in likeness of fire, appeared in the night in many places of England, which went with men as they went, and stayed as they did, sometime like a whele, sometime like a barrell, sometime like a timber-logge, but when many went together, it appeared to be farre off.

Rabot bridge

The Lordes departing from the king not withstanding kept together, which seemed great wisdom in them, for the Duke of Ireland in the parts of Chester & Wales, had assembled a great number, whose Captain was the Constable of Chester, Thomas Molencux, a man of great wealth, and hardy. The Duke of Ireland with such a multitude hasted towards London, that joining with the Londoners, he might make them both as it were an invincible army. But the Duke of Ireland riding forth in state and glorious array with the army of 5000 men, thinking none durst haue encountered him: peruerthelike in the vigill of S. Thomas the Apostle, when he came to Radcote bridge in Dorsetshire nere unto Farendon upon Thames, not past foure miles from Chepyng Boston, which bridge, if he could haue passed, he had bene out of danger, so dauntly, as he looked on the one side, he beheld where the host of the Lordes was ready not farre from them farrpling his coming, in the midst of the valley, with which sight his heart straightwaies failed: and he said, sient s I must fly, for a greater puissance seemeth to be ponder against you they haue no quarrell, so that I being misted away, ye shall escape wel enough, and forth with setting spurs to his horse, he fleeth away. Where was then the foresaid Thomas Molencux that prepared himselfe to the battell, for the Lordes were not yet all come to that place, who when he had sought a while, being wearied, entred the river which was there by. Among other, Sir Thomas Mortimer knight exhorted him to come vp, or else he would shote him through in the river: if I doe come by faith Thomas Molencux, wilt thou saue my life: I doe make no such promise (saith he) but either come vp, or thou shalt straight die for it. To whom he answered, suffer me to come vp and let me fight with thee with thee or some other, and die like a man. As he came vp, the knight caught caught him by the helmet, and plucked it off his head, and straightwaies with his dagger stracke him into the braines.

The Duke of Ireland fleeing, came to the river of Thames, and forced his horse to enter, in the which being made of an horseman a swimmer, he got to the other side: his horse, helmet, gantlets and breast-plate came to the share of the Lordes, so that he was thought long after to be drowned, but he got ouer into Flaunders.

The Archbishop of Dorke fled, and Robert Trisilian, and Michael de la Poole got him to Calais. The Lordes being returned from the battell, which had bene nere to Warford, fast by Babbellack, made great top for the ouerthrow of their enemies, but much lamented the escape of the Duke of Ireland.

The Lordes hasted to London, where the king kept his Christmase in the Tower of London, they hauing assembled an armie of nere hand fortie thousand the morrow after Christmase day came to London, and mustred in the feldes, where they might be seene of them in the Tower: the Londoners were then in great feare, weping diuers perilles as the kings displeasure, if they opened their gates to the Lordes, and if they shut them forth, the indignation of the vniuersite multitude.

The Duke of Gloucester with other entred the Tower, and hauing a little talke with the king, they rected the conspiracie, whereby they had bene indicted, and they shewed forth also the letters, which he had sent vnto the Duke of Ireland, that he should assemble an armie to their destruction, &c. in the end the king promised on the next morrow to come to Westminster, and there to intreat at large for reformation of all matters.

The king, although sore against his mind, when he saw how the Lordes were bent, and that he wanted power to withstand them, condescended to do what they would haue him, & to conclude, the king at the request of the Lordes commaunded the suspected persons of his court, & family to be awarded to prison, to answer at the next Parliament, which persons were Sir Simon Burghley, Sir William Elmham, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, Sir John Golefare, which was not yet returned out of France, all these being knights, Richard Clifford, and Justices called Nicholas Slake Deane of the kings Chappell were appointed to Pottingham Castell. To the Castell of Dover were appointed sir John Beauchampe of Holt Steward of the kings house, sir Thomas Trivet, sir John Salisbury, and John Loncolne. To the Castell of Bristow James Berners, and Richard Medford Clarke. To the Castell of Rochester was appointed Alexander Neuell Archbishop of York, but he was escaped as ye haue heard, and Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolk, which was fled. To the Castell of Gloucester were deputed Robert Trisilian chiefe Justice of England, which was not yet found, and Nicholas Brembar, who sound sureties to stand to the lawes of the Realine.

These were remoued also from the Court, but not sent to prison, John Fordham Bishop of Durham, the Lord Beaumont, Lord William de la Souch of Harnelworth, the Lord Burnell, sir John Louell, the Lord Thomas Camoys, Thomas the sonne of the Lord Clifford, with Baldwin Burfode, Thomas Russhoke a frier, Bishoppe of Chichester the kings Confessor, Aubrey de Vere, Richard Aberbery, John VVorth, the Ladie Maine, the Ladie Pomes, and the Ladie Molineaux, all which were to answere at the next Parliament.

Many persons remoued out of the kings Court.

Parliament that wrought wonders.

The Justices arrested as they sat in Parliament.

The third day of Februarie, the Parliament began at Westminster, which Parliament continued till the 13. of June next following, except from the Wighill of Palmesonday untill the Weekes of Easter, this Parliament was named the Parliament that wrought wonders. The Lords came to this Parliament with a sufficient army for their owne sureties. The first day of this Parliament were arrested as they sat in their places, all the Justices, except sir VVilliam Skipwith, and sir Roger Fulthorpe, sir Robert Belknappe, sir John Carey, sir John Holie, sir VVilliam Borow, and John Aleccion the kings Serieant at Lawe, all these were sent to the Towler, and there kept in severall places.

The cause was, for that where in the last Parliament diuers Lords were made gouernours of the Realine, both by assent of the Parliament, and also by the aduice and counsel of all the Justices, and yet notwithstanding, the said Justices in a counsel holden at Pottingham, did the contrary, whereupon it was now determined that they should make answer to their doings. Afterwards, at the beginning of this Parliament were openly called, Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Neuell Archbishop of York, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolk, sir Robert Trisilian Lord chiefe Justice of England, & Nicholas Brembar, whom the king had oft times made Barons of London against the minde of the Citizens, to answer before Thomas of Woodhocke Duke of Gloucester, Richard Earle of Arundell, Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwick, Henry Earle of Darby, & Thomas Earle of Nottingham, upon certain articles of high treason, which these Lords did charge them with: and so far as much as none of the appeared, it was obtained by the whole assent of the Parliament, that they should be banished for euer, and their lands and goods to be confiscated and seized into the kings hands, their landes entailed excepted, which should descend to their heires. The proccesse against those five Lords compiled in eight and thirtie articles, I ouerpasse in this place, and haue set them downe in my larger Chronicle.

The foresaid Lords being fled as is aforesaid, Robert Trisilian a Cornishman, Lord chiefe Justice to the king, had hid himself in an Apothecaries house in the Sanctuary nere to the gate of Westminster, where he might see the Lords going to the Parliament, and coming forth thereby to learne what was done, for all his life time he did all things closely, but now his craft being espied was turned to great folly. For on Wednesday the seventeenth of february he was betrayed of his owne seruant, & about cleuen of the clocke befoze none, being taken by the Duke of Gloucester, and in the Parliament presented, so that the same day in the after none he was drawn to Wyborne from the Tower of London through the Citie, and there had his throat cut, and his bodie was buried in the gray friers Church at London. This man had disfigured himselfe, as if he had bene a poore weakeman, in a frize coat, all old and sozne, and had artificially made himselfe a long beard, such as they called a Paris beard, and had defiled his face, to the end he might not be knownen but by his speech. On the morrow, was executed sir Nicholas Brembar, who had done many oppressions, and caused seditions in the Citie, of whom it was said, that whilst he was in full authoritie of Baronsalltie, he caused a common payre of Stocks in euery ward, and a common Are to be made to behead all such as should be against him, and it was further said, that hee had indicted 8000. and more of the best and greatest of the Citie, but it was said that the said Nicholas was beheaded with the same Are he had prepared for other: this man if hee had liued, had bene created Duke of Arroy, or of London by the name of Arroy.

Sir Nicholas Brembar executed.

On the fourth of March Thomas Vske, Undershyue of London, and John Blake Esquire, one of the kings household, were drawn to Wyborne and there hanged and beheaded, the head of Thomas Vske was set by ouer Newgate, to the appoyntment of his parents, which inhabited thereby. The goods of the Bishop of Chichester were confiscate, and on the eleuenth of March the Parliament was proroged vnto the quinden of March.

The fift day of May sir Simon Burghley Constable of Dover, and Chamberlain to the king, an intollerable proud man and a great oppressor of the poore, &c. was condemned of treason, but the king dispensed for his drawing and hanging, so that he was with his hands bound behinde him led through the Citie of London, and had his head stricken off vpon the Towler hill on the fiftenth day of May, his heires were by Henry the fourth restored in blood and inheritance, except the landes giuen to the new Abbey on the Towler hill, to S. Stephens at Westminster, and to the friers at Langley. This man might by inheritance dispend twentie markes by yere, but in few yeres he so grew in seruice of the king, that he attained to the value of 3000. markes of yerele reuerues, of whom it was said that he gaue at Christmasse for liueries of Knights and Esquires, yeomen and others as well of the kings court as of his owne family, sometime for tie clothes, sometime 160. clothes, and sometime 200. of great price, as of Scarlet, &c.

Simon Burghley beheaded.

Rob. de Vere Duke of Ireland the Archbishop of York and other banished.

Also on the twelfth of May John Beauchampe of Holt Lord Steward of the kings house, whom the king had thought to have made Baron of Bodge, north, was condemned to be drawne, and hanged, but by the kings favour, he lost his head on the Tower hill.

Sir John Bernes knight of the kings Court, a lustie young man, was in the same place beheaded. Sir John Salisbury knight was drawne from the Tower to Ebborne, and there hanged.

There were condemned also in the same Parliament these Justices, Sir Ro. Belknappe, Sir John Caire, Sir John Holte, Sir Roger Fulthorpe, and Sir William Brough, John Locon Sericant at the Lawe, Richard Gray Justices, with the Lords befoze fled, were all banished.

There was granted to the king, of the Cleargie halfe a tenth, and of the Laity halfe a fiftenth, and of the merchants twelve pence of the pound, three shillings of the tunne, three and fifty shillings four pence of the sacke of wool. The Duke of Gloucester, and Sir John Cobham, asked pardon of the Abbot of Westminster for violence done in the sanctuary of Westminster, in the taking of the Justice Trissilian. The last saue one of May there were deliuered out of the Tower VV. Elmham, T. Triuer, and Nicholas Dagworth knights. Also the first of June, John Holland the kings brother was created Earle of Huntington.

The third day of June, the king in the Church of Westminster renewed the oath, which he toke when he was crowned, and all the Lords swore homage and fealtie to him, and all the Bishops did excommunicate all those that would goe about to hinder the Statutes of this last Parliament, or the great Charter.

After Whitsonside Richard Earle of Arundale, with a company of valiant men went to the sea, and fought with certaine ships of his enemies, taking, destroying, or burning foure score ships, he entred into the Ile of Beas, which he spoiled and bent.

The same yere the Scots prepared themselves that as soon as the truce was expired they might be ready to invade the south parts, and with a great army entred England, committing great slaughters of people and toke hosties in euery place, and led away many prisoners, and burned Townes, and approached to Newcastell upon Tyne, and pitcht their tentes not farre from thence. There was then in the same towne Sir Henry Percy the younger, and Sir Ralph his brother, both famous of warlike renowne, and fore enemies unto the Scots. This Sir Henry came vpon the on the sodain, & assailed them in the campe, making great slaughter of them. VVilliam or James Douglas, after Froisart, also chiefe Captaine of the Scottes, beholding the thing that a thousand times he had wished, that is, Sir Henry Percy within his campe, rebeth against him, but was slaine by the saide Henry; then cometh the Earle of Dunbarre with an excellent number of Scottes, & toke the saide Henry with his brother Ralph, slaying many Englishmen to the number of 1000. in that place, at the which time there were in number 30000. put to flight, and toke the water at Otterborne: but yet the Scottes lost many

Thomas Arundell Bishop of Ely, brother to John and Richard Earles of Arundell and soune to Richard Arundell was translated to the Archbishopricke of Yorke. This Thomas Arundell, late Bishop of Ely fouretene yeres, five months, and 18. dayes. He beautifully builded anew the palace at Ely: he like wise builded his manors in diuers places, especially in Wolborne by London, he did not onely repaire, but rather new builded his manor place there; and also augmented it with a very large port, gate-house, or forefront toward the strete or high way: he gave to the Church of Ely, a Table gilt, set with precious stones to the value of 200. markes. John Fordham was translated from Durham to Ely, and Walter Skirlaw Bishop of Bath was translated to Durham, Richard Scope was made Bishop of Chester, Ralph Erkam translated from Salisbury to Bath: and John Waltham Cleerke of the priuie seale was made Bishop of Salisbury.

The ninth day of September a Parliament began at Cambridge, in the which were diuers Statutes ordeined, especially one for laborers.

In the time of this Parliament, to wit, on the first day of October, as Sir Thomas Triuer going with the king to his lodging at Barnwell besides Cambridge, forced his horse too much with the spurre, his horse falleth and breaketh in a manner all the inner parts of his rider, who yet liued untill the next morow, which time was giuen him of God to repentance, if he would accept it, for he was a man of an haughty stomache, and not beloued of the common people.

Alexander Neuell, after his banishment, was by Pope Urban translated to the see of Andrew in Scotland, but serued in Louaine in place of a parish priest, by the space of thre yeres before his death, where in the first yere of his exile he died, and was buried in the Carmelite Friars there.

King Richard kept his Christmasse in solemne maner at Woodstocke with his Queene Anne.

About the beginning of Lent, the Scots entring the west parts of England destroying men, women and children, sucking babes, and such as lay in childe-bed, in the countie of Silbeldan in the dominion of the Lord Dacres, and shutting vp of doores of houses full of people, they bent them by without merrie to the number of two hundred in some one house. Against these was sent Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham with five hundred speares to reuenge their attempts, but for that his power was so small in comparison of theirs, he preuailed little against them.

On the Thursday before Easter, the Lord Beaumont captaine of Carlisle entred Scotland by 40. miles, and spoiled the market of Fowke, praying and spoiling at his pleasure, and led many prisoners into England.

King Richard discharged the old officers of his Court, and also his Counsellors, appointing other at his pleasure: he toke the seale from Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Yorke, and deliuered it to William Wickam Bishop of Winchester, and made him Chancellor: the Bishop of Exeter his Treasurer,

In the month of Nouember, Iohn Duke of Lancaster came from the partes beyond the Seas into England, after he had bidden in Spaine and Gascoigne, thre yeres space, who in Spaine first tasted great misfortunes, yet in the ende brought his matters to very good sale, not with the force of men, but by the fauour of God: for when he came first to the parts of Spaine with an army sufficient ynough, through want of victuals, they first died through hunger, and after through fire, so that 1000. famous knights of his Army dyed miserably, thereloue leauing the Duke, fled to the French Armie.

stocke, and the Duke of Lancaster in the Castell of Hereford. The same time Iohn Hastings Earle of Pembroke, as he was desirous to Just, he was broken about the priue parts by the knight that ranne against him, called Sir Iohn Saint Iohn, where he died. King Richard caused the Castle of Canterbury to be repaired.

In a parliament at London it was ordained that none should purchase prouisions at the Popes hands: there was graunted to the King xl. shillings of every sacke of wool, and of the pound fire pence.

Iohn Duke of Lancaster was made Duke of Aquitaine by the roade and bonet, which the King gaue him, and Edward the Duke of Yorkes sonne was made Earle of Rutland, to whom the King gaue the Castle of Wbam. The Earle of Huntington was made the Kings Chamberlaine, &c.

A great pestilence was in the North parts of England, so that in a little space cleuen hundred were buried in the Citie of Yorke.

On the Friday next after the feast of all Saints, a Parliament began at London, in the which halfe a tenth, and halfe a sixtenth was graunted to the King, which money he should haue for the treatie to be had for peace with the Frenchmen, which treatie the Duke of Lancaster should procure. Also condi-tionally was graunted to the King, a full tenth, and a whole sixtenth, if that yere he made any iourney against the Scots, and this was the fruite of this Parliament.

This yere passed to poore and meane people very hard and sore for dearth of coyne, now almost continued for two yeres, whereby it came to passe, that when the time of fruits, as nuts, apples, &c. came, many people through ouer-feeding thereof, caught the Filre, and dyed of the same, and the death had ben farre greater through famine, if the recommendable diligence of Adam of continuall care provided, that from the parts of beyond the Seas, corne was brought to London to the reliefe of the whole realme, whereas otherwise without doubt, neither had the Countrey sufficed the Citty, nor the Citty have holpen the countrey. To the furtherance of this good worke in relieving the poore, the Mayor and Citizens of London toke out of their Dyhanes chest in their Guildes hall two thousand markes to buye Corne and other Victuals, from beyond the Seas, and the Aldermen each of them laid out twentie pounds to the like purpose of buying of Corne, which was bestowed in divers places, where the poore might buy it at an appoynted price, and such as lacked money to pay downe, to put in surety to pay in the yeare following: in the which yeare when Harvest came, the fieldes yielded plentifull increase, and so the price of Corne began to decrease.

Sir Hugh Calucley was made Warden of the Isles of Iernsey, Gernsey, Berke, Aurney, &c.

This yeare a certaine Jewe at London became a Chyistian, and was baptised by the name of William Piers, and had two pence the day for feareme of his life given him by the King, as appeareth of record in the Rolles.

King Richard with Quene Anne his wife, foure Bishops, as many Barons, the Duke of Yorke, many Lords, and fiftene Ladies, held a royall Chyristmasse at Langley nere to St. Albons. The same Chyristmas day a Dolphin came forth of the Sea and played himselfe in the Thames at London, to the Bridge, foretelling happily the tempests that were to follow within a weeke after, the which Dolphin beinge scene of the Citizens, and followed, was with much difficulty intercepted, & brought againe to London, the which was a spectacle to many, of the height of his body, for he was tenne foote in length. These Dolphins are fishes of the sea, that follow the voices of men, and rejoyce in playing of instruments, & are wont to gather themselves at musick. These when they play in rivers, with bassy springings or leaping doe signifie tempest to follow. The seas containe nothing moore swift nor nimble, for oftentimes with their ships, they mount over the sailles of ships.

The King sent to the Londoners requesting to borrow of them one thousand pound, which they stoutly denie, and also evill entreated, beate and mishandled a certaine Lombard that would have lent the King the said summe, which when the King heard, he was marvellously angered, and calling together almost all the Nobles of the land to Stamford on the five and twentieth day of May, he opened to them the maliciousnesse of the Londoners, and complained of their presumption, the which noble men gave counsell, that their insolence should with speed be repressed, and their pride abated. By the Kings judgement therofore was the Mayor of London and the Sheriffs, with other the best Citizens arrested to appeare at Spottingham, where on the eleventh of June, John Hinde Mayor was deposed, and sent to Windsor Castle, the Sheriffs were also deposed, and sent the one to the Castle of Wallingford, the other to the Castle of Wytham, and the other Citizens to other prisons till the King with his Council had determined what should be done with them. And there it was determined, that from thenceforth the Londoners should should not choose nor have any Mayor, but that the King should appoint one of his knights to be ruler of the Citty: their priviledges were revoked, their liberties dismantled, and their lawes abrogated.

The King then on the one and twentieth of June first appoynted to be Warden of the Citty a certaine knight called Sir Edward de Dalyngrige, but he was quickly deposed by the King, because men said he favoured the Londoners, and Baldwin Radinon was constituted in his place.

In the meane time, through sute of certaine knights, but specially of the Duke of Gloucester, the King is somewhat pacified, and by little and little abateth the rigour of his purpose, calling to minde the divers honours, and the great giftes he had received of the Londoners, whereupon he determineth to deale moore mildly with them, and to call them to some hope of grace and pardon, he sendeth commandement to them to come to Windsor, there to shewe their priviledges, liberties and lawes, which beinge there shewed some of them were ratified and some condemned, but they could not obtaine the Kings full favour, till they had satisfied the King for the injuries which was said they had done. The King at this assembly at Windsor, had got together almost all the Lords, and so great an armie, that the Londoners had cause to be afraid thereof, about the which preparation he was at great charges, for the which it was sure that the Londoners must pay. They therfore, not ignorant that the end of these things was a money matter, submitted themselves to the Kings pleasure, offering tenne thousand pound. They were permitted home to returne againe, uncertaine what satisfaction and summe they should pay.

When the Citizens were returned, and that the Nobles which were gone home: the King hearing that the Londoners were in such a state, and dismayed, he said to his men, I will goe faith he to London, and see what the Citizens, and will not that they any longer despaire of my favour, which sentence was no sooner knowne in the Citty but all men were filled with incredible joy, so that every of them generally determined to make him, and to be as liberal in gifts, as they were at his coronation. The King therfore as he came from Shine in Surrey to London, with Quene Anne his wife, on the 29. of August, the principall Citizens all in one liverie to the number of 400. horsemen rode to meete them at Windsor, where in most lowly wise, they submitted themselves unto his grace, beseeching him of his speciall pardon, in all such things, as they before had offended him, and the Recorder of the Citty, in the name of the whole Citizens, instantlier desired him to would of his great bounty take such paine upon him, as he should see the Chamber of London, to the which request he graciously consented, so on his journey till he came to St. Georges Church in Southwarke, where were received with procession of Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London, and the Clergie of the Citty, who conveyed them through London, the Citizens of London, men, women and children in order meeting the King at London Bridge, where he was by them presented with two faire white Hackes, trapped in cloth of golde, parted of red and white, hanged full of silver belles, the which which present he thankfully received, and after he held in his way through the Citty toward Westminster.

And as they passed the Citty the streets were hanged with cloth of golde, silver and silke. The Conduite in Chepe ran with red and white wine, and by a child Angel-like he was presented with a very costly crowne of golde, and the Quene with another. A table of the Trinitie in golde was given to the king, valued worth eight hundred pound, and another to the Quene of S. Anne, because her name was Anne, with divers other gifts, as hoxles, trappes, plate of gold and silver, clothes of gold, silke, velvet, Basons & Towers of golde, also golde in coppe, pectorall stones, and Jewels, so rich, excellent, and beautifull, that the value and price might not wel be esteemed, and so the Citizens reconred their ancient customes and liberties, & then the Kings Bench from Doyke, and the Chancery from Bottingham, was returned to London. And it was graunted to them that they might chose them a Mayor as befoze time they had done. The Londoners believed that by these gifts they had escaped all daunger, and that from thenceforth they should be quiet, but they were deceived, for they were compelled to give the King after this 10000. pound, collected of the commons in great bitternesse of minde; for the which summe, the King became benedolent to the Citizens, and forgave them all trespasses, by his patents dated at Westminster the 28. of February, and so the troubles of the Citizens came to quietnesse; which trouble the Dolphin in Thomas at Christmasse last past did happily signifie a farre off. A fabulous booke compiled by a namelesse author, but printed by William Caxton (and therefore called Caxtons Chronicle) reporteth these troubles to happen through a fray in Fleetestrete, about an hoxse lease which was taken out of a Bakers basket, by a Peoman of the Bishop of Salisburies, and that the same troubles were pacified, and their liberties were againe restozed by means of Richard Graucend Bishop of London, in reward whereof the Citizens repaire to the place of burial in the middle Isle of S. Pauls church, &c. But al is untrue, for at this time Robert Braybrooke was Bishop of London, and Richard Graucend had been Bishop, and deceased in the time of Edward the first, in Anno 1303. almost 90. yeres befoze this time. After whom succeeded in the Bishopricke Ralph Baldoke, Gilbert Segraue, Richard Newport, Steven Graucend, Richard Wentworth, Ralph Stratford, Michael Norbroke, Simon Sudbury, William Courney, and Robert Braybrooke that late Bishop of London from 1381. untill the yere 1403.

Moreover the place of buriall in S. Pauls, whereunto the Spaloz and Citizens of London have repaired, is of William, who was Bishop of London in the time of William Conquerour, who purchased the first Charter of the said King William, for the same Citty, as I have befoze declared.

Robert de Vere, sometime Earle of Oxford, that by many degrees had mounted to the name of Duke of Ireland, died at Rouaine in great anguish of mind, and miserable penury, which yong gentleman was apt to al offices of worth, and in his childehode he had not wanted discipline.

After the feast of Christmasse, a Parliament was holden at Winchester, in the the which was graunted to the King by the Cleargie halfe a tenth, and by the commons halfe a fiftene, for the expences of the Duke of Lancaster and Gloucester, that were to goe into Fraunce to treat a peace betwene the king-domes.

At the which time the French king, whilst that he was dauncing in the hall with 4. Knights of his household, being disguised like a wilde man, having a short garment about him beset with pitch and rosen, that the flaxe which was fastened to his frait coate might the better abide, and the witt selfe more plaine, he had bene sodainly burned to death (if good helpe had not chaunced) through the fallshode of the Duke his brother that did aspire the kingdome, for as the King led the daunce, one that was hired thereto, howling downe his torch, set fire on the towle, which being kindled burnt the frait garment, where finding matter mete to feede on, to wit pitch and rosen, burnt so spitefully, but a Lady seeing such daunger to wards the kings person, ranne to him, and pulled him from the daunce, by which meanes the King was saved, but the foure Knights could not by any meanes be holpen till their skinned and deeth were scolerped, and they yielded up the Ghost.

This yere the Kings Bench and Chancery were removed from London to Doyke, for the Archbishop of Doyke being Lord Chancellour did wish the commoditie of his Citty, but the noveltie lasted not long, for with the same facility that they were removed to Doyke, they were brought backe againe to London.

The same yere Aubery de Vere uncle and better to Robert the late Duke of Ireland was restozed in blood, and created Earle of Oxford. John Deuerois, Knight Constable of Dover, and the Kings Steward, died sodainly, in whose roome, Thomas Percy, that befoze was vice-chamberlain, was made Lord Steward, and Thomas Beaumont was made constable of Dover, and William Scrope was made vice Chamberlaine, who about y same time bought of William Montacute Earle of Salisbury the Ile of Span, with the regality thereof, for the Lord of this Island is called King, to whom it was lawfull to weare a crowne of gold, Thomas Percy the younger was made warden of Burdeaur.

The Dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester passed over into France, to make some what of the truce, so to conclude a finall peace betwixt the kingdomes: but it was not so brought to passe, as it was wished, by reason of the French Kings sickness.

In September, lightnings and thunders, in many places of England did much hurt, but especially in Cambridg-shire, the same yere many houses and cozmenere to Colleswoke, and in the towne it bent terribly.

Such abundance of water fell in October, that at Bury in Suffolke, the Church was full of water, & at Newmarket it bare downe walles of houses, so that men and women hardly escaped drowning. The same yere Lord Thomas de Ros, as he returned south of the Holy land, in city of Naplos in the Ile of Cyprus, through intemperancy of the aire departed this life there. In the Octaves of S. Hilary, a Parliament was holden at London, in which a subside was demanded for the King that was minded to go into Ireland, wherefoze the Cleargie graunted to him a full tenth if he would passe thither, and if he went not, they graunted him but halfe a tenth. Certaine Lords of Scotland came into England to get woorthip by force of armes. The Earle of Murre challenged the Earle of Spottesingham, to iust with him, and so they rode together certaine courses, but not the full chalenge, for the Earle of Murre was cast both horse and man, and two of his ribbes broken with the fall, so that he was boine out of Smithfield, and conveyed toward Scotland, but died by the way at Porke. Sir William Darrel Knight, the Kings banner-bearer of Scotland, challenged Sir Pierce Courtney Knight the Kings banner-bearer of England, and when they had run certaine courses, they gaue ouer without conclusion of victorie. Then Cockborne Esquire of Scotland challenged Sir Nicholas Hawberke Knight, and rode five courses, but Cockborne was boine ouer horse and man. The seuenth of June Quene Anne died at Shilne in Southery, and was buried at Westminster. The King toke her death so heauily, that he does, cursing the place where she died, he did also for anger throwe downe the buildings vnto the which the former Kinges being wearied of the Citie, were went for pleasure to resort.

Constance Duchesse of Lancaster deceased.

Thus the King, the Duke of Lancaster, and his sonne the Earle of Darbie, were widowers all at one time: for the Lady Constance Duchesse of Lancaster, daughter to Peter King of Spaine, was but lately deceased, whilst the Duke her husband was in France. And the same time also deceased the Countesse of Darby, wife to Henry Earle of Darby. Moreover, this yere deceased Isabel Duchesse of Yorke, that was halfe sister to the Duchesse of Lancaster, being boine of one mother, and she was buried at Langley in the frier Church there by the Kings commandement.

Also this yere deceased that famous Knight, knownen to the world, Sir John Hawkwood, whose deedes (saith Thomas Wallingham) require a speciall treatise. I finde by good record, that this John Hawkwood was boine in Essex in the parish of Wingham Sibell, the sonne of Gilbert de Hawkwood Tanner, in his youth he was bound as an apprentice with a Taylor in the citie of London, and from thence was prest in the masters for seruice of King Edward the third in the warres of France, wherein he serued first as a common souldier in the rowme of an Archer. Afterward he was made a capitaine and had some charge committed vnto him, which he so well performed, as he was aduanced to the order of knighthood, and stood in good possibilitie to haue growne to great preferment by those warres if they had indured: for when the peace was concluded at Brytaine, betwix the Charlers in the yere of Christ 1360, he was then a yore knight, and had reaped small commoditie of those warres. Wherefore he ioynd himselfe with the companies, called the late comers, who assembled in great numbers, a five or sixe thousand English hoisemen, and seeking after better game, made great spoyle of all the East parts of the Kingdome of France, passing through Champaine, Burgondy, and Dampflin, euen to the deep gates of Auignon in Provence, where Clement the seventh, Bishop of Rome, then held his residence and court of Cardinallies: from whence he departed into Lombardy, hauing the leading of that part of the companies companies, which was called the white bande, with whom he serued valiantly in the warres of John Marques of Montferrato. But when Leonel Duke of Clarence sonne to Edward the 3. King of England came into Italy, to marry the Lady Violent, daughter of Calcaius, Viscount Lord of Millaine, he forsooke that seruice and attended the Duke to that marriage.

At which time Barnabe the brother of Calcaius had great warres with the territorye of the State of Mantua, and obtained of the Duke of Clarence, that Sir John Hawkwood being a Capitaine, and principall man of his retinue might come to ayde him in his warres, for Barnabe being himselfe a warlike Prince, had a great desire to make some triall of the discipline and prowesse of the Englishmen. Sir John Hawkwood therefore hauing in sundrie skirmishes with great courage, and consideration happily taken aduantageable occasions of victorie, and the Englishmen demeaning themselves worthily with their bowes and arrowes, did dyaue Barnabe into that admiration of them, that he commended the discipline of this nation, and greatly regarded the prowes and discretion of Sir John Hawkwood. And in short time after, to wit, the first yere of King Richard, good liking increasing betwene them by entercourse of fauours and courtesies, he desired to haue him his sonne in lawe, and gaue him in marriage the Lady Domnia his daughter, whom he had begotten of a noble woman, named Porra, with the valne of tenne thousand Florenes of pearly prauenew, and after that time he married not any other.

This alliance being made in respect of his valour in warre, was the occasion of the increase both of his pay, and of the renoune of the Englishmen throughout all Italie: What a most puissant Prince in warre, had not without sufficient cause to induce him, conceived so good opinion of the valour of a man that was a stranger, and for this cause his seruice was required by the Princes and free Cities of Italy. For at that time all martiall affaires amongst the Italians were managed by foraine forces and Capitaines.

It fortuned that vpon some displeasure conceived the Englishmen that were left at Alba where the Duke of Clarence dyed, for the alliance past, made a sobaine reuolt from the friendshippe of Calcaius, and Barnabe, and ioynded themselves with their enemies, by which change of affections many of the Townes of Lombardy came to be wasted, by the outrageous spoiles of the Englishmen, amongst other they toke the Towne of Faetra, and Baccanallo, whereof he solde one to the Marques of Cast for twentie thousand Crownes, and the other he kept, and after that Sir John Hawkwood, hauing both his forces and pay increased, determined to like newe hopes, and newe aduentures. He went first to the ayde of Pope Gregoric the twelfth, and hauing with great commendation recovered the Cities of Prouence that had reuolted from him, for his seruice therein was worthily rewarded with the dominion of five Townes. From him, he went to the Visances, who profered great pay, and from them, not long after to the Milanese, and then againe to the Florentines, vnder whome he serued with such a number of our nation both hoſte men and ſote men that all Italle feared him, with that ſucceſſe and increaſe of his commendation, and glorious renoume, that he was eaſily reputed to be the beſt ſouldiour of that age, for hee had learned by his long experience in the warres, hauing an exceeding ripe and quick conceipt, to foze occasions, to frame his reſolutions, and to make ſpee- die execution, being alſo as occasion required, both hot in his ſight, and no- table for his delays, in ſo much as ſundry great Captaines, who were afterward highly renowned, proceeded out of his ſchole, as from an exact Maſter of Martiall affaires. The exploitcs that he had achieved, with good ſucceſſe, were accounted for ſure groundes and principles of Diſci- pline, as well amongſt his very enemies, as alſo amongſt his owne fol- lowers.

After infinite victories obtained, and an incomparable renoume amongſt all men for the ſame, he deſeased at Florence being then an olde man, and was moſt honourably buried in the great Church of the ſame Citie, where after his death, the Senate in rewarde of his good deſeruings, beſtowed vpon him the honour of a Tombe, with the Image of a man on horſebacke, as great as a mightie Pillar, for a Monument and teſtimonte of his great prouweſſe in warre, and exceeding fidelitie to their ſtate. Notwithſtanding his erecutors, or other wiſe his friendes here in England, to wit, Robert Rokeden ſenior, Robert Rokeden iunior, and Iohn Coe, rayſed a Monument, or Tombe arched ouer, and ingrauen to the likenesse of Haukes flying in a wode, in the Pariſh Church of Hyngham ſible where he was bozne, and founded there for him a Chantry, and another in the Priory of Hyngham Caſtle, to remem- ber Iohn Haukewood Knight, Iohn Oliuer, and Thomas Newenton Es- quires.

About the moneth of Auguſt Proclamation was made that all Iriſh peo- ple ſhould anoyde the Reame, and get them home before the feaſt of the nati- uity of our Lady, vpon paine of life.

King Richard went ouer into Ireland, and the Duke of Glouceſter with him, and the Carles of March, Salſburie, Arundell, Nottingham and Rut- land. The Iriſhmen being afraid of ſuch preparation as was made, durſt not ſhew themſelves openly, but with ſecret ſauiltings they often troubled the Kings army, yet when the Engliſhmen preualled, many of the Lords of the land ſubmitted themſelves to the king, of which ſome the king held with him, leaſt they ſhould attempt ſome new ſtrife.

The king held his Chyſmaſſe at Dublin in Ireland, and after that feaſt held a Parliament there: alſo the ſame time the Duke of Yorke, the Lord Warden of England called a Parliament at London, to the which came (being ſent forth of Ireland) the Duke of Glouceſter, to the which came the ſtates ſhewed the Kings neede, who had now ſpent his treaſure amongſt the Iriſhmen, ſo that a tenth was granted by the Clergie, and a ſixteenth by the Laity.

The ſame time the fauourers of Wicliffes opinions ſet vp on the gates of S. Pauls Church in London, and on the gates of Saint Peters Church at

Sargunt ingrati, corrupti semine nati,

Mentum prelati, hoc defendere parati,

They were mainteyned in this their doing, by ſome noble men & knights of this land, among which as chiefe were Sir Richard Stury, Sir Lewes de Clifford, Sir Thomas Latimer, Sir Iohn Mountague, which did incigate them to confound if they might, the religious men: whereupon the Archbiſhop of Yorke, the Biſhop of London and other, as meſſengers from the whole ſtate of the cleargie paſſed ouer into Ireland, where to the king they made a grie- nous complaint, beſeeching him that he would returne with ſpeece, to helpe the faith and Church that was now incredibly afflicted by lollardes, (as they termed them) how they might take away all the poſſeſſions of the Church, and that woſe was, how they might take and deſtroy all Canonical ſancti- ons. King Richard hearing theſe things, determined to returne home theſe- ner. And when he was returned, he called before him, and rebuked certaine of the Nobles bitterly, threating them, if they from thenceforth fauoured theſe Lollardes, or in any wiſe did comfort them he would extreamly puniſh them, he toke an othe of Sir Richard Stury, that from thence forth, he ſhould not hold ſuch opinions, which thing being done, the king ſaid, and I ſwear to thee that if thou euer violate thine othe, thou ſhalt die a ſhamefull death, other bea- ring ſuch roaring of the Lion, plucked in their heads and lay cloſe.

About this time Sir Iohn Froiſart Chanon of Chymay in the Carle dome of Heynault, as himſelfe reporteth, came into England, he demaunded of Sir William Little (who had been with the king in Ireland) the manner of the hole that in Ireland is called Saint Patrikes Purgatory, if it were true that was ſaid of it, or not: who answered, that ſuch a hole there was, and that himſelfe and another Knight had been there while the king lay at Dublin, & ſaid they entered into the hole, and were cloſed in at the ſunne ſet, and abode there all the night, and the next morning iſſued out againe at the ſunne riſing: he ſaid, that when he & his fellow were entred and paſt the gate that was called the Pur- gatory of Saint Patrike, and that they were deſcended and gone downe thre or foure paſes, as into a cellar, a certaine wote vapour roſe againſt them, and ſtrake ſo into their heads, that they were ſaine to ſit downe on y<sup>e</sup> ſtaires which were of ſtone: and after they had ſate there a ſeaſon, they had great deſire to ſleepe, and ſo fell into a ſlumber, and ſlept there all night. In the which ſleepe they had maruellous dreames, other wiſe when they were wont to haue in their chambers: but in the morning after they had iſſued out, they had cleane forgot- ten their dreames and viſions.

mont, Hugh Spencer, and many other to Charles the French King, to treat with him for a marriage to be had betwene the King of England, and the French King a eldest daughter named Isabella of eight yeeres old, who was already promised to the Duke of Britonsonne, by a treaty that was made at Bourges in Chouraine. This was hard to be broken, for the French King and his vncles had sealed with the Duke of Britaine.

How somewhat of the former boiage of King Richard into Ireland, as the same was reported to Sir John Froilart, by an Esquire of England, named Henry Christall. Sir John (quoth he) It is not in memorie, that ever any King of England made such prouision for any iourney into Ireland, nor such a number of men of armes, nor archers. The King was a nine moneths in the marches of Ireland to his great cost, and charge to the realme, for they bare all his expenses: and the merchant cities, and good townes of the Realme thought it well bestowed, when they sawe the King returne home againe with honour. The number that he had thither, were foure thousand men of armes, and thirte thousand archers, well payed weelke. But to shew the truth, Ireland is one of the euill Countries of the world to make warre vpon, or to bring vnder subiection, for it is closed strongly and wildely with high foyrests, & great waters and marshes. It is hard to enter to doe them of the Countrey any damage: nor ye shall finde no towne, nor person to speake withall. For the men dwale to the woodes, and dwell in Caves or small Cottages, vnder trees and among bushes, like wilde and sauage beasts: and when they knowe that any man maketh warre against them, being entred into their Countries, then they dwale together to the straites and passages to defend them, so that no man can enter into them. And when they see their time, they will some take their advantage on their enemies, for they knowe the countrey, and are light people. For a man of armes, being neuer so well horsed, and runne he neuer so fast, the Irishmen will runne on fote as fast as he, and overtake him, yea, and leape vpon his horse behinde him, and throwe him from his horse: for they are strong men in their armes, and haue sharpe weapons with large blades, two edged, wherewith they will slay their enemy, whom they neuer repute to be dead till they haue cut his throte, and opened his belly, and taken out his heart, which they carry away with them, some say they eat it, and haue great delight therein, they take no man to ransom. And when they see that they be overmatched, then they will depart and hide themselves in bushes, woodes, and caues, so that no man shall finde them: Sir William Windfore, who had most seld the warres in those parts of any other Englishman, could neuer learne the manner of the Countrey. They be hard people, and of rude witte: and they set nothing by tollitie, nor fresh apparell, nor by noblenesse, for though their Countrey be soueraignely gouerned by Kings, wherof they haue many, yet will they abide and continue in their rudenesse.

Truth it is, that foure of the principall Kings, and most puissant after the manner of the country, are come to the obsequance of the King of England, by loue and faire meanes, and not by battell, or constraint. The Earle of Ormond, mond, who marcheth vpon them, hath taken great paine, and hath so treated them, that they came to Dublin to the King, and submitted them to him, to be vnder the obsequance of the Crowne of England, wherfore the King and all the Realme repute this for a great and honourable ade. For King Edward did neuer so much vpon them, as King Richard did in his boiage. The honour is great, but the profit is but small, &c. The names of the foure Kings were these, first, the great Oncale King of Meth, the second Brinc of Thomond King of Thomond, the third Arthure of Mackquennur King of Ailester, the fourth Conline King of Cheneuo and Draye, they were made knights by King Richard in the Cathedrall Church of Dublin: these foure Kings watched all the night before in the Church, and the next day at high passe time, were made knights, and with them Sir Thomas Orphew, Sir James Pado, and Sir John Pado his cousin.

These Kings sate that day at the Table with King Richard, they were regarded of many people, because their behaviour was strange to the manner of England.

When Sir John Froilart desired to knowe howe it came to passe, that foure Kings of Ireland were so come brought to the obsequance of King Richard, when King Edward the Kings grandfather, who was so valiant a Prince could neuer subdue them: Sir Henry Cristal answered, he could not tell, but as men said, the great puissance that the King had ouer with him, and remaining there nine moneths, abashed the Irishmen. Also the Sea was closed from them on all parts, whereby their merchandises might not enter into their Countries, though they that dwell farre within the Realme cared little for it, yet such as line on the marches of England and by the Sea coast, vse seate of merchandise.

King Edward in his time, had to answere so many warres in France, Britaine, Gascoigne, and Scotland, that his people were distubed in diuers places, wherfore, he could not send any great number into Ireland. But when the Irishmen sawe the great number of men of warre that King Richard had in this last iourney, they aduised themselves, and came to obsequance.

Whereouer there was of olde time in England a King named Edward, who is canonized as a Saint: This King in his time subdued the Danes, and discomfited them by battell on the sea thre times: This Edward the Irishmen loued, and dread him much more then any King of England that had been before. And therefore King Richard this yeere past, when he was in Ireland, in all his armoyces and deuises, he left the bearing of the armes of England, as the Leopardes and flour deluces, and bare the armes of Saint Edward, that is, a crosse patent golde and gules, with foure white Sparcelets in the field, wherof it was said, the Irishmen were well pleased, and the sooner inclined to him, and haue done to him faith and homage in like manner as their Predecessours sometime did to King Edward. Thus haue I shewed the manner howe King Richard had this yeere accomplished his boiage in Ireland.

In this meane space the English Lords rid from Caleis to Amiens, and to Claremount in Beaufayn, and so to Paris, where they were lodged about the Crosse of Pyreuer, they were five hundred hostes. The French King was lodged at the Crosse of Lowre, and the Quene with her children at the house of S. Paul vpon the riuer Saine. The Duke of Berrey at the house of Belle; the Duke of Burgoigne at the house of Archois, and the Duke of Bourbon in his owne house, the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of S. Paul, and the Lord Cowley at their owne houses.

The King had assembled there all his Councell, to the intent to make the better answer to the Embassadors of England. He commanded euery day to be deliuered to these Embassadors 200. Crownces, for their seruicences, and for their hostes. And the chiefe, as the Earle Marshall, and the Earle of Rutland, were oftentimes with the king and dined with him. These Lords desired euery to haue answer, and hauing ben at Paris. xx. dayes and their charges payd by the French King, a reasonable answer was given them, so that they were put in great hope to bring about that they came for, howbeit the French men said it could not be done shortly, because the Lady was so yong, and also that she was affianced to the Duke of Brittaines eldest sonne, wherefore they must treate to breake that promise, or they could proceed any further, & thereupon the French King should send into England the next Lent, to shew how the matter went. With which answer the Englishmen were contented, they took their leaue & departed from Paris to Calais, and so to England, the King was sorry of their coming, and well contented with their answer.

About Michaellmas the Duke of Lancaster returned out of Calcoigne into England, for that he had not ben receiued in Calcoigne, as he thought he should haue ben, for the people there did utterly reiect him, from bearing gouernement ouer them. The King made him good chere, and all the Minist folowing oft times sent to the French King, concerning the marriage, and was well inclined to haue peace, these pursutes and treaties took such effect, that their matter dyeloe nere to a point, so that such Embassadors as were first sent out of England into France, and were againe lodged in Paris, were in number five hundred, and solourned in Paris more then thre weekes.

This yere England suffered great losse by pirats, that belonged vnto the Quene of Denmarke, who spoiled mariners and merchants, especially the men of Dorsetholke that assembled a multitude together, and took vpon them to fight with them, but the enemies preuailing, many of them were slaine, and very many taken prisoners, were referred for ranstone with the losse of twenty thousand pounds, which they had aboꝛde with them to make their marchandise.

This yere deceased John of Maltham Bishop of Salisbury, Treasurer of England, who had pleased the King so greatly, that (though many murmured at it) he commanded him to be buried at Westminster among the Kings. After him Roger Walden the Kings secretary and treasurer of Calais, was made Treasurer. John de Metford Bishop of Chichester was translated to Salisbury, and the Archbishop of Diuelin to Chichester. Also Thomas Brantingham Bishop of Excester deceased, after whom succeeded Edmond mond Stafford beauer of the purple Seale. Henry Wakefield Bishop of Worcester deceased, vnto whom succeeded at the Kings request a monke of Chester, called Tideman a Philition.

In the moneth of Nouember King Richard caused the body of his deere frende Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, to be brought from Louane, and after to be buried in the priory of Colne in Essex, with solemae funerals, which he honoured with his presence, and caused the Coffin of Cyprus, wherein his body being embalmed lay, to be opened, that he might behold his face, & touch him with his fingers openly shewing his loue to the dead carcase, which he bare him when he was aliue, there were at the same funerals with the king, the Countesse of Arford, mother of the deceased Duke, the Archbishop of Canterbury, many other Bishops, Abbots, Priors, and other religious men, but yet there were few of the Nobles, for they had not digested the hatred they had conceived against him.

The Embassadors of England being at Paris with the French King, their matters took such effect, that it was fully agreed that the King of England should haue in marriage Isabell the eldest daughter of King Charles, and by vertue of procuratton the Earle Marshall affianced and espoused her in the name of the King of England, & so from thenceforth she was called Quene of England. The Englishmen took their leaue and departed to Calais and so into England. The King was glad of their returne, and so were other, but whosoever was glad of this marriage, the Duke of Gloucester vncle vnto the King made no top thereof, for he saw well, that by reason of that marriage and alliance, peace should be betwene the Kings, and their realmes, which grieved him, & of this matter he would oftentimes speake with his brother the Duke of Yorke, and dꝛoue him as much as he could to his opinions, for he was but a soft Prince. But to the Duke of Lancaster his eldest brother, he durst not speake ouer largely, for he saw well that he was of the Kings opinion, and was well pleased with the Kings marriage.

This yere the King held his feast of Chyristmasse at Langley, whither came to him the Duke of Lancaster, and he receiued the Duke with honour, but not with loue, as was thought, he therefore taking leaue of the King, departed from the court toward Lincoln, where Katharine Swinford then lay, whom after the feast of the Epiphanie, (al men wondering at the strangenesse of the deede) he took to wife. This woman was boꝛne in Henault, daughter to Sir Paine Ruit, a Knight of that Countrey, she was in her youth brought by in the Duke of Lancasters house, and attended on his first wife Blanch the Dutchesse of Lancaster: and in the dayes of his second wife the Dutchesse Constance of Spynie, he kept the said Katharine to be his concubine, who after was married to a Knight of England named Swinford, that was now deceased. Before she was married, the Duke had by her foure children, thre sons, & a daughter, one of the sons hight John Bewford, the second Thomas de Bewford, and the other Henry, who was brought by at Alton in Almaine, pꝛoued a good Lawyer, and was after Bishop of Winchester, and loan a daughter for the lone the Duke had to those his children, he married their mother, the said Katharine Swinford, being now a widow, as before is said. The great Ladies of England, as the dutchess of Gloucester, the countesse of Darby, the countesse of Arundell, and others descended of the blood royall, greatly disdayned that they should be matched with the Duke of Lancaster, and by that meanes accounted second person in the Realme, and be preferred in roume afore them; and therefore they said they would not come where they should be present, for it should be a shame to them, that a woman of so base birth, that had been concubine to the Duke should goe and haue place before them.

This yere during the peace, many Noble men of England frequented Scotland, and many Scottes frequented England, through the which, oftentimes, many honourable toynements were done betwixt Englishmen and Scottes, in defence of their honours and gloire in armes: Among whom was not a little praised, the honourable victorie gotten by David Crauford on the Bridge at London against the Lord Welles in this manner: The Lord Welles was sent Embassadour into Scotland, concerning certaine high matters betwixt the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, and when he was at a solemne banquet, where Scottish men and Englishmen were communing of debtes of armes, the Lord Welles said, Let words haue no place, if ye know not the chivalry and valiant debtes of Englishmen, appoint me a day and place when ye list, and ye shall haue experience. Then said David Earle of Crauford, I assent, and incontinently, by consent of either party, a day and place to is assigned. The Lord Welles chose the bridge of London for the place, and Earle David chose S. Georges day for the time. Thus departed the Lord Welles toward London. Afore the day Earle David came with thirtie persons well appointed to London: As soon as the day of battell was come, both the parties were conveyed to the bridge, and soon after by sound of trumpet, the two parties ran basely together, on their barbed horses, with square grounden speares to the death. Earle David notwithstanding the valiant dint of speares broken on his helmet, and visage, sate so strongly, that the people moved with vaine suspicion, cryed, Earle David contrary to the law of armes, is bound to the saddle: Earle David hearing this murmure, dismounted off his horse, and without any support or helpe ascended againe into the saddle. Incontinent they rushed together with the new speares, the second time with burning ire to conquer honour: but in the third course the Lord Welles was sent out of his saddle, with such a violence, that he fell to the ground: Earle David seeing his fall, dismounted basely from his horse, and tenderly embraced him, that the people might understand, he fought with no hatred, but onely for the glory of victorie: and in the signe of more humanitie, he visited him every day, while he recovered his health, and then returned into Scotland.

The same season was sent into England from the French King, Valerian Earle of S. Paul with certaine articles concerning the treaty of the peace. The King receiued him topiously, and heard well his message, and said unto him aparte, Faire brother, as to the treatie of peace betwene me and my my father of France, I am right well inclined therunto, my brethren, and two vnckles of Lancaster and Bozke incline right well therunto: but mine vnckle the Duke of Gloucester, who is a right perillous man, letteth it as much as he can. Sir, quoth the Earle of Saint Paul, it behoueth you to winne him with faire words, and giue him great gifts. In the name of God (said the king) ye say well, and thus shall I doe. The Earle of Saint Paul said, the French king with his vnckles should come to Saint Omers, and bying with him his daughter, so that the king of England would come to Caleis, and so betwene Saint Omers and Caleis the two kings should mete and speake together, whereby should increase loue and amity: And if they could not conclude on some peace, yet at the least the truce might be prolonged to endure for thirtie or fortie yeres, betwene the two realmes, and their allies: this deuise seemed good.

And so when euery thing was readie, the king and the Earle of Saint Paul passed ouer. And the king of England with his vnckles came to Caleis with many Lords and Ladies: and the Duke of Burgoyne one of the French kings vnckles came to Saint Omers, and from thence to Caleis, to the king of England, and there consulted together on certaine articles of the peace. Whereunto the K. of England lightly inclined. The Duke of Burgoyne and Earle of Saint Paul returned to Saint Omers, &c. And the king of England with his vnckles into Englad, leauing their wiues at Caleis, til their returne.

Ye haue heard how the king of England was returned from Caleis into England, & there remained till Michaelmasse, that the Parliament at Westminster should beginne. In the meane season great provision was made at Caleis, and at Guisnes for the king & his Lords sent from the parts of England on that coast, also great provision was had of Flanders, at which came by sea to Calcis. And likewise for the French king and his brother the Duke of Orleans, and his uncles and other Prelates and Lords of Fraunce, great provision was made at Saint Omers, at Arras, at Tervin, at Arde, Mountoire, and at all other houses and Abbeyes therabout, there was nothing spared on eyther part, especially the Abbey of Saint Bertine was well replenished of all things to receive the kings.

The Parliament beganne at Westminster, at Michaelmasse, and it was ordained to endure eight and forty daies, but it was abridged; for the king would not tarry there more then five daies, wherein he declared the things pertaining to the Realme, especially such matter as touched himselfe, and the cause why he came from Calcis. Which things being dispatched, the king returned againe to Calcis with his Uncles of Lancaster and Gloucester, and other Prelates and Lords of England. The Duke of Yorke tarried still in England with the Earle of Darby to governe the Realme in the kings absence. As soon as the French king knew that the King of England was returned to Calcis, he sent to him the Earle of Saint Paule to shew him what order was taken in Fraunce concerning his marriage, which the king liked well.

When the Duke of Lancaster and his sonne, the Duke of Gloucester and his sonne, the Earle of Rutland, the Earle marshall, Earle of Huntington, the kings Chamberlaine and many other Lords and knights, Esquires and Ladies, rode with the Earle of S. Paule, to S. Omers, where they were well received of the Duke of Burgoyne, and of the Dutchesse, the Duke of Bypytaine and other. All the chere that could be devised was made to the English Lords and Ladies: there was the Dutchesse of Lancaster, her son, and two daughters, there was great gifts given of plate, of golde and silver, nothing was spared, insonuch that the Englishmen had maraile, especially the Duke of Gloucester, who saide to his counsell, I see well there is great riches in the Realme of France, there was much given to him: he took ever all their gifts, but alwaies the rancor abode in his heart: which the Duke of Burgoyne well perceived. When the Lords and Ladies of England had been royally feasted, then was communication had how the two kings should meete and speake together, and how the Ladies should be delivered, whereupon appointment was made, and leave taken on all parts. The English part returned to Calcis to the king, and shewed what chere they had, and what presents had been given them, which newes pleased well the king.

After the French king came to Saint Omers, having the Duke of Bypytaine in his company, where it was ordained that the Dukes of Berry, Burgoyne and Bourbon, should go to Calcis to speake with the king of England, where they were secretly received, and had as good chere as could be devised. The three Dukes had secret communication with the king & his counsell, from whence they returned to Saint Omers to the French king, and shewed how they had sped. When the French king went to the Basse of Arr, the Duke of Burgoyne to Mountoire, the Duke of Bypytaine to the towne of Elque, and the Duke of Berry to Walingham. In every parte about, there were were pitched by tents and pavilions, and all the countrey full of people, what of Fraunce and of England. The king of England came to Guisnes with the Duke of Lancaster, and the Duke of Gloucester to James.

Thus on the Eve of Simon and Jude, about ten of the clocke in the forenoon, the kings departed out of the tents the which were pitcht not farre asunder, and came a foute the one to the other, and met at a certaine place appointed, on the one side there was arranged 400. knights of Fraunce, armed with their swords & halberds: And on the other part, 400. knights of England in like manner, so the two kings passed thorow them.

The Dukes of Lancaster and of Gloucester ledde the French king, and the Duke of Berry, and of Burgoyne led the king of England, thus came forth the 800. knights, all which knights, when the two kings came fust together, kneeled downe, the two kings met together bare headed, and a little inclined, and took each other by the hands, then the French king led the king of England into his tent, which was noble and rich, and the four Dukes took each other by the hands, and followed the two kings, and other knights after, the frenchmen on the one side, and the Englishmen on the other side: and so they stood regarding each other till all was done. So the two kings hand in hand entered the French kings tent. Then the four Dukes kneeled downe before the kings, and they raised them up and so talked together: then the two kings went a litle apart, & talked a certaine space. In the meane time wine and spices were brought, the Duke of Berry served the French king of spicer, & the Duke of Burgoyne of wine: And the Dukes of Lancaster & Gloucester served the king of England, & other knights & Esquires served the other Prelates and Lords. This busines done, the two kings took leave each of other, & so returned to their tents, & took their horses and rode, the king of England to Guisnes, the Dukes of Lancaster, & Gloucester, to James, & the other to Calcis: the French king rode to Corbry, & the Duke of Orleans with him, the Duke of Berry to Donnam, & the Duke of Burgoyne to Mountoire.

On Simon & Judes day, about 11. a clocke, the king of England & his Uncles and other Lords came to the French king into his tent, where they were received right honourably. When tables were set up, and the two kings sat at one table alone, the French king on the right hand, the Dukes of Berry, Burgoyne & of Bourbon served the two kings. This dinner was taken in the French kings tent, & after wine & spices taken, the young Quene was brought forth accompanied with a great number of Ladies & damoysels, & there she was delivered to the king of England, & every man took their leave to depart. The young Quene was set in a rich litter, and there went no more French Ladies with her but the Lady of Colcey, there were Ladies of England, the Dutchesse of Lancaster, Yorke, Gloucester, the Lady Namure, the Lady Poyninges, & many other, who received the Quene with great joy. Thus the king of England and his young Quene, with their company rode to Calcis the same night. And the French king and his company to Saint Omers.

After the kings returned to Calcis, ere Allhalowne day in sollemne wise, he married the Lady Isabel in the Church of S. Nicholas at Calcis, the Archbishop of Canterbury doing the office, at the which time there was a great feast, and great larges.

On the next morrow the Dukes of Ayleance and Burbon came to Caleis, to see the King & the Quene, and on the next morrow they took their leave, and departed to S. Omers to the French king, and the same day the King and the Quene took their ship, and had faire passage: for within thre houres they arrived at Dover, notwithstanding by tempest they lost their tents and household stuffe, from Dover they rode to Rochester, to Wertsford, to Eltham, and so to London, whereof the Citizens being warned, made out certaine horsemen well appointed, all in one livery of colour, with devises imbroidered on their sleeves, that every company might be knowen from other, the which with the Mayor and his brethren, clothed in Scarlet, mette the King and Quene on the blacke Heath, and there doing their duties, and attended upon them till they came to Newington, where the king commaunded the Mayor with his company to returne, for that he was appointed to lodge that night at Benington.

Quene Isabel crowned.

The 13. of November, the young Quene was conveyed from Newington, through Southwarke, with great pomp unto the Tower of London, at which time there went such a multitude of people to see her, that upon London bridge nine persons were crowded to death, of whom the Mayor of Wipton in Essex was one, and a worshipful matrone that dwelt in Cornhill was another. The morrow after she was conveyed to Westminster, and there crowned with all the honour that might be desired.

Parliament at London.

The 22. of January a Parliament began at London, in the which the Duke of Lancaster caused to be made legitimate, the issue which he had begotten of Katherine Swinford, before she was his wife. And the same time John Sonne to the said Duke of Lancaster and the said Katherine, was created Earle of Somerset, and the Duke gave him to surname Sir Bello Forro or Bowfort. It was ordained in this Parliament, that Justices should not have to sit with them any as assistant: there was a tenth granted by the Clergy to the king. At this time King Richard contrary to his oath, reuoked Robert Beke, John Holke, William Brugh knights of the Bath, and Justices, south of Ireland.

This yere when the realme of England seemed to enter the chiefest peace that might be, by reason of the Kings marriage, and the great riches that were heaped by together by the same, and by the reason of the truece of 10. yeres established, and the presence of so many noble men as the like no foraine realme was able to shew, suddenly all things were troubled & brought into a tumult. Whiles the king at Blashy in Essex, upon a sodaine took his uncle the Duke of Gloucester by force of armes, he suspecting no such thing, & caused him to be conveyed to Caleis, there to be kept in prison, & caused the Earle of Warwick to be arrested and imprisoned, the same day that he had bidden him to dinner, notwithstanding that he shewed him very good countenance, & had promised him great friendship: beside that he deceived the Earle of Arundell with fayre words, (who was well able to have defended himselfe, & to have delivered his friends, the Duke of Gloucester & the Earle of Warwick,) and notwithstanding ding he yielded himselfe quietly, he sent him to the Isle of Wight, there to be imprisoned untill the Parliament. And to the end there should be no commotion among the commons for the imprisoning of the Nobles, he caused to be proclaimed that the apprehensio of them, was not for any old displeasure, but for new transgressions committed against the king, shortly after he caused the said Nobles to be indicted at Pottingham, and suborned such as should accuse them in the next Parliament, to wit, Edw. Earle of Rutland, Thomas Mowbray Earle marshall, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, John Holland Earle of Huntingdon, John Bewford Earle of Somerset, John Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, & Tho. Spencer, Wil. Scrope the Ch. Chamberlaine. And in the meane season the king assembled together to guard his person, many malefactors of the Countie of Chester which kept watch and ward both day and night about him. When the king caused a great and generall Parliament to be summoned at Westminster, where he caused a great Hall to be builded in the midst of the pallace betwixt the cloke tower, and the doore of the greates Hall: This Parliament beganne about the sixteenth of September, at the beginning whereof Edward Stafford Bishop of Exeter Lord Chancellor, made a proposition or sermon, in the which he affirmed that the power of the king was alone and perfect of it selfe, and those that impeached it were worthy to suffer paine of the law: to this Parliament all the Nobles came with their retinue in armes, for feare of the king: the prosecutors were knights in whom no godnesse at all could be found, but a naturall covetousnesse, insatiable ambition, intolerable pride, and hatred of the truth, their names were John Bushy, William Bagot, and Thomas Greene. These required chiefly to have the Charters of pardons reuoked and disannulled: and Bushy said to the king, because we are charged to say what they be that have committed any offence against your maiesty, and regal authority, we say that Thomas Duke of Gloucester and Richard Earle of Arundell, in the 18. yere of your raigne, have traitorously compelled you, by meane of the new Archbishop of Canterbury then Chancellor, to grant to them a commission to gouverne your Realme, and to dispose of the state thereof, to the prejudice of your maiesty and royaltie. The same day was that commission disannulled with all Articles depending thereupon. Also the generall pardon granted after the great Parliament by them procured, and one speciall pardon for the Earle of Arundell were reuoked.

Tho. Walsing. Bushy, Bagot, and Greene.

Also there was a petition made by the commons, John Bushy speaking for them, that the generall pardon procured and got forth, the Archbishoppe of Canterbury then Chancellor procuring it, should be disannulled; and he to be ludged a traitor; for granting to it: whereupon the Archbishop rose and would have answered, but the king said, to morrow, to morrow; but he came not into the Parliament house againe: the king said, that he would deliberate of the commons petition.

Also it was established, that any traitor conspired to stand against the kings regality, should be adjudged worthy to suffer punishment to be appointed for such offence.

Some thousand said Archers compassed the Parliament
house, ready to shoote.

And it was enacted, that criminall causes from thenceforth should be determined in every Parliament, and then licence being had to depart, a great turke was made as is used, whereupon the kings Archers, in number foure thousand, compassed the Parliament house, thinking there had bene in the house some broyle or fighting, with their bowes bent, their arrowes nocked, and drawing, ready to shoote, to the terror of all that were there, but the king herewith comming, pacified them. On the next day, the Prelates were informed, upon paine of losing their temporalities, that they should the same day agree upon some procurator, to consent in their names to all things in that parliament, to be dispatched, & the king had these words: Sir Iohn Bushy, because many desire that I would explaine the fittie persons exempted in the generall pardon, I will briefly: that what man soeuer desireth this, is worthy of death: first, because he dwelt: secondly, because I haue excepted those that are to be impeached in this Parliament: thirdly, because other of their associates hearing them oppressed, would be afraid where no feare is. On the next day, the Archbishop of Canterbury commeth to the pallace to appeare in the Parliament, but the king commaunded him by the Bishoppe of Carlisle that he should returne to his house, and from thenceforth he appeared not. The Prelates made Thomas Percy the kings Steward of household, their procurator, to consent in all things in this Parliament to be done. Also sir Iohn Bushy had these words, our Soueraigne Lord the king, because the second Article in the Parliament is for punishment to be appointed for such as violate the kings royall authoritie, I beseech your grace that you will authorize me by way of appealing, of accusing, or impeaching, with licence to make declaration from one to the rest so often and when to me and my fellowes it may seeme expedient, and it was granted: then Bushy had these words, I accuse Thomas of Arundell, Archbishop of Canterbury, of treason.

First, of the commission in granting the regiment or gouernement of the Realme to Thomas Duke of Gloucester, and to Richard Earle of Arundell at his instance, who rather because he was your Chancelor, should haue refused it.

Secondly, for that vnder pretence of that commission, they traitterously usurping the iurisdiction of your royall authoritie, held a solempne Parliament traitterously in preiudice of your regalitie.

Thirdly, because that by the said usurping, Sir Simon de Burley, and Sir James Barnes Knights, and faithfull Lieges to you, were traitterously murdered, and put to death, of which things, we your Commons demand iudgement, worthy of so high treason, to be terribly pronounced by you, and because the Archbishoppe is a man of great consanguinitie, affinitie, power, and most politike wit, and cruell nature, for the preservation of your estate, and the whole kingdomes, by the petition of this present Parliament, I require that he may be put into safe custody, untill the final execution of his iudgement.

The king hereunto answered, that for the excellence of his dignitie he would take deliberation till the next morrow, and all other that were put into the same same commission, he pronounced them to be his faithfull liege people, and voided from that treason, and especially Alexander Neuell, late Archbishoppe of Yorke, and then sir Edmond of Langley, Duke of Yorke, Uncle to the king, and sir William Wickham Bishoppe of Winchester, that were put into the same Commission, with teares fell downe on the ground before the king, and gaue him humble thanks for that grace and benefite bestowed on them.

Also on St. Mathewes day, Edward Earle of Rutland, the Carles of Kent, Huntington, Pottingham, Somerset, and Salisbury, with the Lords Spencer and Scope, in a suite of red gownes of silke garbed, and bordered with white silke, and embroidered with Letters of Golde, proponed the appeale by them to the king at Pottingham, before set forth: in the which, they accused Thomas Duke of Gloucester, Richard Earle of Arundell, Thomas Earle of Warwick, and Thomas de Mortimer Knight, of the premised treasons, and of an armed insurrection of Haringey Parke, traisterously attempted against the king, and putting in sureties for the prosecuting of their appeale. Richard Earle of Arundell was arraigned in a red Cowen, and a Scarlet hood, and forthwith the Duke of Lancaster said to the Lord Neuell, take from him his girdle and hoble, and so it was done, and herewith the Articles of appeale being to the said Earle declared, with a baliant and a boide minde, he denied that he was a traitour, and required the benefite of the pardon, protesting that he would not go from the fauour of the king and his grace. The Duke of Lancaster said to him, thou traitour, that pardon is reuoked. The Earle answered, truly thou lyest, I was neuer traitour. Also, the Duke of Lancaster said, why diddest thou purchase thy pardon: the Earle answered, to escape the tongues of mine enemies, of whom thou art one, and verely, as farre forth as toucheth treason, thou hast more neede of pardon then I. The king said, make answer vnto thine appeale. The Earle answered, I feele well that these persons haue accused me of treason, shewing the appealements, but truly they all lye, I was neuer traitour, but I aske alwaies the benefite of my pardon, the which your grace granted to me within these sixe yeres not to last past, being of full age, and of your franche god will and proper motion. When said the king, I did so grant it that it should not be against me: then said the Duke of Lancaster, then the graunt auayleth not. The Earle answered, truly of that pardon I knowe lesse then thy selfe, that was then on the further side the Seas. When said Sir Iohn Bushy, that pardon is reuoked by the king, the Lords, and vs his faithfull people: the Earle answered, where be those faithfull people? I knowe the well, and thy company, how we are gathered together, not to deale faithfully, for the faithfull people of the Realme are not here, and therefore the people doe lament for me, and well I know that thou hast bene euer false. And then Bushy and his fellowes cryed out. Behold soueraigne Lord and king, howe this traitour goeth about to raise sedition betwixt vs, and those people that are at home. The Earle answered, ye lye, I am no traitour. When rose the Earle of Darby and said, diddest thou not say thus to me at Huntington, where where we were first assembled together to rise, that it was the best of all things to take the king. The Earle said to the Earle of Darby, thou speest on thy head, I neuer thought of my Soueraigne Lord the King, but that that was god, and for his honour. When said the king, viddell not thou say to me in time of thy Parliament, in the Barbe behind the White Hall, that Sir Simon de Burley was worthy of death for many causes: and I answered, that I knew no cause of death in him, and yet thou and thy fellows viddell traitorously put him to death, and then the Duke of Lancaster pronounced iudgement against him in this manner: Richard, I John, Steuard of England, iudge thee to be a Traytour, and I condemne thee to be drawn and hanged, to be beheaded and quartered, and thy landes, taylor and not taylor, from thee and from thine heires of thy body descending, to be confiscate: then the king for reuerence of his blood, commanded him onely to be beheaded, and then was he ledde to the Tower hill, and there beheaded: the Augustine Friers in London toke by his body and buried it in their Church, on the South side of their Quire, and after on his graue a sumptuous Tombe was set of marble stone. Also the same day, the king appointed the Lord Cobham (accused by the commons) to be arraigned. Also upon the Saturday, Sir Thomas de Mortimer was summoned, upon paine to be banished as a Traytor, within five moneths to come to be tryed in iudgement: and then said the king, peradventure the Earle of March cannot take him, and therefore I will so long stay for his certificate out of Ireland.

Also, a declaration was made, that all benefices or gifts, granted or alienated by those that were already condemned, or after were to be condemned in this Parliament, and other whatsoever, granted thence the tenth yere of this kings raigne, should be revoked. Also, on Monday following, the certificate given in of the Earle of Nottingham, then captaine of Caleis, in whose custody the Duke of Gloucester was, that the same Duke might not be brought to be tried in iudgement, because he was dead in his custody at Caleis, at the petition yet of the said appellants, the same sentence was pronounced against him which had bene pronounced earst against the Earle of Arundell.

Duke of Gloucester condemned to die after he was dead.

Also the Archbishop of Canterbury, first his temporalities being confiscated was banished the realme. On the Tuesday, Rikell one of the kings Justices, borne in Ireland, read certaine confessions drawn in writing upon the said treasons, affirming that the same were the confessions of the said Duke, by him put forth or discovered, and written with his owne hand.

Archbishop of Canterbury his goods confiscated.

Also, the Carle dame of Chester was advanced to the honour of a principality, by annexing thereto the lands of the said Earle of Arundell confiscate.

Also, the same day, John Earle of Salisbury made request to haue a Scire facias granted to him against the Earle of March, for the Lordship of Denbigh in Wales, and the king answered therupon that he would take deliberation. Also on the Wednesday, it was ordained, that the lands of the said Earle of Arundell, annexed to the Duchie of Chester, should enjoy the liberties of the same Duchie, excepted that to the Welchmen of those parts, their old lawes and customes should still remaine and be continued.

The

The Castell of Lyons, with the seignioy of Bomfeld, & Pale, to the said Castell belonging. The Castell of Chirke with the seignioy of Chirkland to the said Castell belonging. The Castell of Swales Street, with the towne well walled with stone, with the hundred, and the eleven townes to the said Castell belonging. The Castell of Habel, with the seignioy to the same belonging to the Castell of Dullay, with the appurtenance in the Countie of Shropshire, and the reuerfion of the seignioy of Cloue with their appurtenances, which Edward Earle of Rutland then held for terme of his life. All which Townes, Castels, and Seignioyes aforesaid were belonging to Richard late Earle of Arundell, and which by force of the iudgement given against the said Earle in the said Parliament, forfeit to our Soueraigne Lord the King, and shal be from henceforth annexed to the principality or Dukedome of Chester. Also it was ordained that such as gaue either counsell, ayde, or fauour to the childzen of them that were condemned, or that should be condemned in this Parliament, should be punished as traytors.

1397.
Ireland.

On Friday, the king appointed a prestred day to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to wit, the third of the first weeke, to depart the Realme.

Archbishop of Canterbury banished the Realme.

Also it was ordained, that all the Lords spirituall and temporall, should sweare inuolubly to obserue whatsoeuer in this Parliament were enacted, and that the censures of the Church should be pronounced by the Prelates against all those that should go against the same.

Also, the Earle of Warwick was arraigned, & his hood being taken off, and the appeale read, as he had ben some miserable old woman, confessed all things conteyned in the appeale, weeping, wailing, and howling, to be done traytously by him, and submitting himselfe to the kings grace in all things, sorrowing that ever he had bene associate vnto the appellants. Then the king demanded of him by whom he was allured to ioyne with them, & he answered, by Thomas Duke of Gloucester, and the Abbot of S. Albons, and a Monk recluse in Westminster, and besought the king of grace & mercy, and the king granted him life to be led in perpetuall prison out of the Realme, his goods moveable & immoveable to be confiscate, as the Earle of Arundels had bene, and the king commanded that he should be had to the Tower of London, and after, to be conveyed ouer to the castel within the Ile of man, vnder the wardship of William Scroope then Lord of the said Ile, to remaine there in perpetuall prison, and on the morrow, the king granted to him and his wife five C. markes yearly during their liues. Also, the writ of Scire facias was granted to the Earle of Salisbury, against the Earle of March, for the said Lordship of Denbigh sixtene daies respit being given to put in an answer. Item, it was ordained, that those which ought money to Rochester byidge, should be put in execution for the payment, to the use of the same byidge.

Earle of Warwick arraigned.

Also, Henry Bolenbroke Earle of Darby, sonne and heire to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, was created Duke of Hereford; Edward Earle of Rutland Constable of England, was created Duke of Aumarle; Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, Duke of Surrey; the Earle of Nottingham, Duke of Poole. John Holland Earle of Huntington, Duke of Excester. John Earle

Westminster Hall repaired.

King Richard caused the great Hall at Westminster to be repaired, both the walles, windowes, and roffe, with a marvellous worke, and great costs, which he leuied of strangers banished out of their countreys, who obtained licence to remaine in this countrey, by the kings Charter which they had purchased with great sommes of money.

1398.

Parliament at Shrewsbury.

King Richard kept his Christmas at Leitchfield, and then took his journey towards Shrewsbury, where the Parliament lately proroged, began againe, in the which it was ordained, that all Statutes ordained at Westminster in the 11. yere of the kings raigne, should be reuoked and disannulled, and all the Articles of the same, and the heires of them that were adiudged in the saide Parliament, should be reconciled, and restored to all their lands, inheritances, and possessions: excepted, that they should haue no clayme against the withholders of the profits, and reuenues of those lands in the meane time. On the morrow it was ordained that the heires of them which were iudged and convicted in the foure Articles of high treason, should not enjoy the landes, nor any possessions of their progenitors, but should be excluded from all and euery action and clayme for ever.

The first Article of high treason was this, if any man, of what condition soeuer he were, did imagine the kings death.

The second Article was, if any man should haue an imagination to depose the king.

The third, if any man did rise armed within the Realme of England in manner of warre against the king.

The fourth was, if any man disclaymed the kings homage.

Also the same day, the Lord Cobham was arraigned, to make answer vnto the two Articles of high treason.

The first was, that he said Lord Cobham was in counsell to make one commission against the state of the king; and likewise, that he vsed the same commission in doing iudgement against the kings will, and to the prejudice of him.

The second, that he sate in iudgement to iudge Sir Simon de Burley, and James Barnes knights of the Kings; in his absence, and against his will: and vpon this, he was conuict and iudged to perpetuall prison within the Isle of Jersey.

Henry Duke of Gloucester accused Thomas Duke of Norfolk.

On the morrow, Henry Duke of Hereford accused Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, of certaine words by him spoken, as they rode betwene London and Baynesham, tending to the dishonour of the kings person, which the Duke of Norfolk utterly denied to haue spoken; whereupon a combat was was granted them by the king to be fought at Conuentry, vpon the tenth of September.

Combat granted at Conuentry.

A sixth and a halfe was granted, and the customes of Woles, fiftie fillings of euery sacke of euery Englishman born, and thre pound of euery stranger.

This Parliament ended, the king visited many places in the West part of England, as Worcester, Hereford, Wyllow, Walsenbury and Bath.

After this also, the king caused a Theatre to be made at Wyllow, for a combat to be fought betwene two Scots, to wit, the one being an Esquire appellant, & the other a knight defendant, and the appellant was overcome and hanged: but after this time, he made a great & marvellous strong Theatre at Conuentry for the combat betwixt the Duke of Hereford, and the Duke of Norfolk, and gaue them day for the fight, the 16. of September, to wit, the feast day of S. Egid, at which day and place, a great concourse and assembly of people was there gathered out of all parts of England. When the saide Champions appeared in the Lifes, ready to fight, the king commanded them to be quiet and not to fight, & then the king sitting in his royall apparrel within his tent girt with his sword, he commanded his decree to be proclaimed, & this was the kings decree, that Henry Duke of Hereford, for his disobedience towards the king should be banished for tenne yeres, and likewise the Duke of Norfolk to be banished for euery out of England, taking of his reuenues a thousand markes by yere, till the towne of Calets were repaired.

Dukes banished.

At the feast of S. Michael, the king caused seuentene Counties in East England to be indited, and laid to their charges, that they had bene against him, with the Duke of Gloucester, the Carles of Arundell & Warwike, wherefore he sent honourable men to induce the Lords both spiritual and temporal, to make a submission by writing, sealed with their owne hands, acknowledging themselves to be traitors to the king, though they neuer offended him in word or deed. Whereupon he compelled all the religious gentlemen and commons, to set their seals to blankes, to the end he might as it pleased him oppress them severally, or all at once: some of the commons paid 1000. markes, some 1000. pounds, &c.

Blank Chartres.

Also, he ordained through euery prouince in England, that all gentlemen, and men of substance, should be sworn firmly to maintaine according vnto their possible power, all the Statutes, Articles and constitutions ordained in the last Parliament.

Unaccustomed othes.

This yere the king kept a most royal Christmas, with euery day fasting and running at the tilt, whereunto resorted such a number of people, that there was euery day spent xxviij. or xxvi. oxen, & thre hundred sheep, besides fowle without number. Also the king caused a garment for himselfe to be made of gold, silver, and precious stones, to the value of 3000. markes.

1399. Great Joustings and feasting.

On Selwynes day, nere vnto Walsford, a very deepe water which ranne betwixt the townes of Swellstone and Harlewood, stode sodainely still and diuided it selfe, so that by the space of thre miles, the bottom remayned drye, which wonder, many a one thought, did signifie the diuision of the people people, and falling away from the king, which happened shortly after.

Roger Mortimer Earle of March, and of Visier in Ireland, lying there in a Castell of his, there came on him a great multitude of wild Irishmen to assaile him, and he issuing out, fought manfully, till he was by them helwen to piéces, whose death the king determined to reuenge.

The third of February died Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, at the Shop of Elies Anne, in Holborne by London, and was honourably buried in Saint Pauls Church at London, by Blanch his first wife, his sonne Henry Duke of Hereford being then beyond the seas.

About Whitson tide, king Richard with a floute of 200. ships, sailed from Milford haue, towards Ireland, and arrived at Waterford on the last day of may, from whence, he marched with an army of 30000. to Kilkenny, foure score miles within the countrey, and there remained 14. daies, tarrying for Edward Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumarle, that kept not the right course.

On Whitsomere euen he went from thence towards the countrey of Mackmur, who remayned amongst the woods with 3000. men, right hardy, and such as seemed but little to feare the Englishmen. At the entring of the woods, the king commaunded fires to be vied, so that many a house, and many a village was burnt, & there the king made Henry the Duke of Hereford's sonne knight, who was afterward king Henry the fifth, with tenne other. 2500. pioneers were appointed to fell the woods, and make waies for the Englishmen. The Irishmen feared greatly the shot of the Englishmen, but yet with their darts they assailed, and slew diuers as they caught them at aduantage. The vncle of Mackmur came in and yielded himselfe to the king, with a wythe about his necke, and many other naked and bare-legged, vnder the like, all which, the king pardoned. After this, the king sent to Mackmur, promising him, that if he would come in as his vncle had done, with the wythe about his necke, he should be pardoned: but he utterly refusing, said, he would fight to death in defending his right, for he knew the Englishmen wanted victuals, and more then they had brought with them could not be bought for silver or gold. There was already such scarcity, that there were some foure, some five, that had but a small loafe of bread to liue by the day, and some that eate not a graine in fise daies together. In this estate they remayned eleuen daies, many of their horses were lost for lacke of meate. In the meane season yet came thre ships from Dublin fraught with victuals, for the which was great strife and peale especially for the wine of Alsey and Spayne. The morow after the 13. departed from thence, keeping the bye way toward Dublin, maugre all the noise of the enemies: at what time Mackmur sent a messenger with notice to the king that he would be his friend, & aske him mercy, or els, if it pleased him to treat of peace, to send some noble men to him: whereupon the Earle of Gloucester was sent, who led with him the reuerward whereof he was Capitaine, being two hundred lances, and a thousand archers, betwixt two woods farre from the sea in the declining of an hill they met with the Irish. Mackmur himselfe rode on a white horse without saddle or other furniture, that cost him (as was said) foure hundred a line, which horse he ran down the hill, that beholders reported they neuer had seen there nor were to haue runne so swiftly. In his right hand he bare a Dart great and long, which he threw exceeding well. He was a mightie strong man of personage. There the Earle and he talked a good while, about the murdering of the Earle of March, and after of other things, but agree they could not, and so departed.

The Earle aduertised the king what he had found, which was nothing, but that the enemy would cry mercy, so as he might be sure to haue peace without other griefe, other wise, he would (so long as he liued) defend himselfe: wherefore, the king (in his wrath) not knowing what let might happen, swore, that he would neuer depart Ireland, till he had him eyther alive or dead. The horse dislodged for lacke of victuals, they were a thirtie thousand at their coming ouer, that lay then at Dubline fiftene daies, the king forthwith diuiding his army into thre parts, sent them out to seeke Mackmur, promising an hundred marks to him that could bring him in, which offer was well hearkened vnto, for it sounded well, but he could not be caught: and the same day Edward Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumarle Constable of England, arrived with an hundred sale, of whose coming, the king was very glad, though he indeed had tarried long, and might haue come much sooner.

They remayned five weekes at Dubline, and heard no newes out of England, the passage was so dangerous, the wind being contrary, and tempests so great, at the length came a ship with heauie newes, how the Duke of Hereford, and now by the deceale of his father Duke of Lancaster, was arrived in England at Hauenspore fast by Birdlington besides Wablington in Poyke shire, and had beheaded William Scroope Earle of Wiltshire, Treasurer of England, Iohn Bushy, Henry Greene, and other, and had caused Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterbury to preach against king Richard, who also shewed a Bull procured from Rome, promising remission of sinnes to all those which should aide the late Henry, in conquering of his enemies, and after their death to be placed in paradise, which preaching moued many to cleaue to the Duke.

Upon this newes the king being perswaded to make haste ouer, the Duke of Aumarle said, it was better to stay till his ships might be brought together, for there were but an hundred ready to make saile, whereupon Iohn Mountacute Earle of Salisbury was sent with a power, whilst the king going to Waterford might gather his state, who promised within fise daies to haue followed him. The Earle of Salisbury landed at Conwey, where he was soon aduertised, how the Duke had taken the more part of England, and that all the Lords were got to him, with more then threescore thousand men. The Earle of Salisbury caused to summon the Welchmen and them of Cheshire, to come to him, so that (wearing the king had been arrived at Conwey) within foure daies there were come together fortie thousand men, ready to go against the Duke of Hereford, where they stayed fourteen daies, but when they saw the king came not, they stealed away, & left the Earle of Salisbury in manner alone, so that vnnearsh he had an hundred men with him. The Duke of Hereford advanced towards the Earle of Salisbury, who withdrew him into Contwey. The king throught euill counsell shalbe after the Carles departure 18 daies, and then arrived at Wilsford haven, with the Dukes of Aumarle, Erceffer, and Surrey, and diuers other of the Nobility, with the Bishops of London, Lincolne, and Carlile, & many other, that he might with an army mete the Duke before he had gotten his assurers together, but after his coming into England, and understanding the Dukes preparation, he let fall his courage to giue battell, knowing for certain that the people assembled against him, would rather die then giue place, as well for the hatred as feare, which they had conceived of him: wherfore leaving his army with the Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumarle, Constable and chiefe gouernour of his army at Wilsford, went from thence priuily about midnight following, disguised like a Pilgrim, for feare to be knowne, with 14 persons only, who went to Contwey, thinking the Earle of Salisbury had there held the field. There were with him the Dukes of Erceffer and Surrey, and the Earle of Gloucester, that continued faithfull vnto the last houre.

There were three Bishops also, of which, two did not like good men, the Bishop of Lincolne, and Saint Davids, but the third continued faithfull, that was the Bishop of Carlile.

He had also two knights, Stephen Scroope, and William Fireby, and Ianico a Gascoigne. The king rode so warily by nights, that he came to Contwey at the break of a day. Great sorrow and lamentation was made by the king and the Earle at their meeting, for that the Carles hoste was dispersed and gone, some to the Duke, and some other waies.

The Duke of Aumarle, Constable and chiefe gouernour of the kings army at Wilsford, immediately when the kings departure was knowne, said vnto the souldiers, let vs shift for our selues masters, for the king is dedde, where vpon euery man trusted and away. Sir Thomas Percy steward of the houlbold, talking with the Constable also departed, and toke their way through Wales.

The Welchmen seeing such disorder, assembled them together, and spoiled the Englishmen of all their goods, & sent them packing in their cubits, with white stauces in their hands, for there rode, here tenne, here twenty, here fifty, here an hundred, and so the Welchmen coming down the Mountaines, the English lost that they had. The king had many hoyses of the beyond sea broode, and great riches in apparell and iewels, which was in the keeping of Sir Thomas Percy, who with the Constable came to Duke Henry of Hereford, and moze then six hundred of their company, all naked, whom the Welchmen had dispoyled, and beaten well.

The king being at Contwey in great discomfort, sent the Dukes of Erceffer and Surrey, to Henry Duke of Hereford and Lancaster, to knowe what his meaning was, himselfe remaining still at Contwey in great perplexity, and with him the Earle of Salisbury, the Bishoppe of Carlile, Sir William Ferebe knight, Sir Stephen Scroope mine author, and another Frenchman, in all but fiftene persons, then was newes brought to the king how his Constable had demeaned him, and likewise his Steward, that had caus-sed his riches to be brought a land, and going through Wales with it, the Welchmen had taken it.

The king then by the aduise of the Earle of Salisbury departed from Contwey vnto Beaulmareis, a ten miles off, and from thence, he went to Carnaruan. Beaulmareis was a strong fortresse if it had been manned & victualled. Carnaruan is a fayre towne, and a strong Castell, but these were vnprovided of all things, so that for sixe or seuen nights he lay very hard and bafe, and for vi. daies there was none; wherfore he returned againe to Contwey, where he sore lamented his estate. The Dukes of Erceffer & Surrey entering the City of Chester, which Duke Henry had taken, were brought straight to the Castell to the Duke, who was glad to see them, as he professed, & forthwith asked the Duke of Erceffer what newes, who told him from point to point, what shame and dishonour it would be to him, if he dealt so vnjustly toward his Prince, and that though him he were depofed: he therfore demanded answer with speed; but the Duke of Lancaster was as slowe to dispatch him, and told him he should not go for one weeke from him, and that the king was not well aduised to send him and his fellow, being men of such calling, sith he had other enough of meaner estate to do the message: so they remayned to their great discomfort. The Duke of Erceffer, Duke Henry still kept in his company: but the Duke of Surrey was committed to safe keeping with in the Castell of Chester.

There is a Castell five miles from Chester, called Beeton Castell, builded on a rocke, very strong by situation, therein were an hundred men of armes chosen and able men, but not valiant, or faithfull to king Richard, for they deliuered it to the Duke, where they might well enough haue kept it, the ascending is so steep: it was victualled for sixe yeeres. There was found within it coyne better worth then an hundred thousand markes, beside other iewels, which king Richard caused to be kept, to the value of two hundred thousand markes, all which Duke Henry toke with him, and returned to Chester, and there taking counsell of his friends what was best to be done, the Archbishop of Canterbury toke vpon him to speake, and said: that sith the king was in Wales, which was a countrey strong, by reason of the Mountaines, so that it was impossible for an army to passe with baggage and baggage, he thought it best to send vnto king Richard, & to make him beleue that he sought nothing but peace and a Parliament to be made, wherein, those that had offended in putting to death his uncle the Duke of Gloucester, should be punished, and so from thenceforth the king and the Duke to be good friends, and that it should be at the kings pleasure to appoint the day and place for this Parliament; for without this shift, it should be impossible for the Duke to get him into his hands, for he might depart to sea wher he would, hauing retained at Contwey ships for that purpose.

All the other Lords assenting to this counsell, the Duke appointed the Earle of Northumberland to go to the king with foure hundred launces, and a thousand archers, which Earle, when he came to Flint castell, had it deliuered to his hands: from thence he hasted to Rudland, which was also giuen ouer to him: this Rudland is but tenne miles from Contwey, where the king was, greatly marualling, that he heard nothing of his brother the Duke of Gloucester, being now eight daies since he was sent to the Duke of Hereford. The Earle of Northumberland laid vnder a rocke, nere to the Castell of Rutland two great ambushments of his people with commandement to kepe that passage. Then he went with five or her in his company and went by the sea coast, till he came before the town of Conwey, and then he sent an Herald to the king for a safe conduct, to come to his presence, to declare his message from the Duke about an agreement, which safe conduct being granted, he passed the water, and entered the Castell of Conwey, where he found the Duke and the Earle of Salisbury, he declared to them that peace would be made if he would be a good Judge & a true, and cause those that should be named, to be tried by Justice at a certaine day of Parliament at Westminster, which he and the Duke should hold together, and that the Duke might kepe his place of high Judge as his father and other ancestors before him had done, for the space of one hundred years. Those that he would haue to be tried by the law, were the Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of Surrey, the Earle of Salisbury, the bishop of Carlisle and Tho. Marke, which five, had given the Duke counsel to put his uncle the Duke of Gloucester to death, and then if it should please him to pardon the Duke his wozath, he would be ready to come to him on his knees to aske him mercy, and so they might go to London together, or the one one way, and the other another. The Earle offered to swear that all this should be performed, and that the Duke had assured him by oath to stand to it. The King liking well that it should be at his liberty to go, either in company with the Duke, or alone vnto London, purposed to take the offer, and so to pretend some excuse for his going alone, after he should meet with the Duke: as lacke of vituals or such like, and so to take a by-way thorow Wales, and there to raise a power, for he promised the Lords neuer to suffer them to come to iudgement, discouraging with them, how he would auoid all the daunger, and surely be reuenged vpon his enemies, namely on Duke Henry of Lancaster, who with the rest should die for it, he accorded to go to the Duke, and then (passing celebrated) the Earle of Northumberland swore vpon the host, that the Duke should hold all that he had told the King. The Earle halted the King for ward to horsebacke, but the King prayed the Earle to go before vnto Rutland, there to prepare dinner. The Earle rode a pace vntill he came where he might see his people vnder the mountaine, whom he much commended for obseruing his commandement.

The King passing the water rode a foure miles before he came to the rocke where when he saw the ambushes he was soze abashed, knowing wel he was betrayed by the Earle, for he was in such a place as he could not escape. The sea beating on the one side, and the rocke keeping him in on the other, and if he should haue fled backe, they would haue caught him, ere he could haue come to Conwey, for he had not past thre and twenty in all of his company. The King descending the rocke, the Earle came, and kneeling down, excused the matter, saying, he had caused those people to come to guard his person, but the King told him, fewer would haue serued, and that it was contrary to his oath, for he had promised to haue but five in his company, and said therefore that he would goe backe to Conwey, but the Earle answered, that now he sith he had him, he would leade him to the Duke as he had promised. Tenne daies since, and so he caused bread and wine to be brought and offered the King, who durst not refuse it, and after leaping on horsebacke againe they rode to Rutland to dinner, and after to Flint, where they lay that night.

Rutland.
Flint.

The morrowe being the two and twentieth day of August, the King got him to the Castell walles, where he beheld the Duke with all his hoste of an hundred thousand men comming by the sands: there came before that were departed from the army, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Thomas Percy, and the Earle of Rutland from whom the Duke had taken the office of Constable, more for a colour, then for displeasure, for they bare the Dukes order, and not the hart, which was the Kings, the Archbishop entered first, and after the other with a great traine, they went by to the dungeon, and then the King came downe from the walles, vnto whom they did reuerence lobly on their knees, the King took them vp, and drew the Archbishop apart, and they two talked long together, but the Earle of Rutland kepte him aloofe. They took horse againe, and rode towards the Duke that now was appoaching nere.

The King went by againe to the walles, lamenting soze when he saw the Dukes hoste within two bowe shotes of the Castell, who compased it round about downe to the sea. The Earle of Northumberland went forth to the Duke, who after long talke, concluded, that the Duke should not enter the Castell before the King had dined, for he was fasting: so the Earle returned, and the King was set to dinner, with whom sat his assured friends the Earle of Salisbury, and the Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Stephen Scrope, and Feribe, they ate long and ate little, for they had no haste to rise.

After dinner the Duke entered the Castell all armed, his basenet excepted. King Richard came downe to meete the Duke, who as soon as he sawe the King, fell downe on his knees, and crawing nere vnto him, he knailed the second time with his hat in his hand, and the King then put off his hode, and spake first, faire cousin of Lancaster ye are right welcome. The Duke bowing lowe to the ground answered, my Lord, I am come before you sent for me, the reason why I will shewe you. The common fame among your people is such, that ye haue for the space of twenty or yll. years, ruled them very rigorously, but if it please our Lord I will helpe you to gouerne better. The King answered, faire Cousin of Lancaster, sith it pleasest you, it pleasest me well.

The Duke spake as ye haue heard to the King, he spake also to the Bishop of Carlisle, to Sir Steven Scrope, and to Feribe, but to the Earle of Salisbury he spake not, whereby the Earle perceived that the Duke hated him deadly.

The Duke with a high sharpe booke, had bing forth the Kings horses, and then two little naggies not worth fourtie franks, were brought forth, the King was set on the one, and the Earle of Salisbury on the other: and thus the Duke brought the King from Flint to Chester, where he was deliuered to the Duke.

Chester.
Duke

Duke of Glocesters sonne, and to the Earle of Arundels sonne that loved him but a little, for he had put their fathers to death, who ledde him straight to the Castle.

The thirde day they went from Chester to Saintwich, and the next day to Newcastle, and there the Earle of Warwick's son met them, and so journeying forth, the next day they came to Stafford, and after they departed to Lichfield, where the King thought to have escaped, slipping downe into a Garden out of a Window of a great Towre, but he was espied and thrust into the Tower againe: from Lichfield the Duke went to Countreie, but before they could come thither, the Welchmen did them much harme and slew many of them, and the Englishmen, when they by great chaunce could take any of the Welchmen, they tied them to their horse tayles, and drew them after them, through wapes full of stones, and caused them to dye miserably.

The Duke passed from Countreie to Weintreie, the next day to Northampton, from thence to Dunstable, and then to Saint Albons, and a five or six miles before his comming to London, the Mayors and the Companies in their liveries, with great noyse of Trumpets met the Duke, doing more reverence to him then to the King, rejoycing that God had sent them such a Prince, that had conquered the Realme within one moneths space.

When the Duke came within two miles of the Citie, the Duke caused the host to stay, and then said to the commons of the Citie: My Masters, behold here your King, consider what ye will doe with him. They answered, they would be bound to Westminster, whereupon he was delivered unto them, and they led him to Westminster, and from thence by water to the Tower of London.

The Duke entered into London by the chiefe gate, and rode through Cheap to Saint Pauls, where he was after lodged in the Bishops pallace five or six dayes, and after at Saint Johns without Smithfield, where he remained fiftene dayes, from thence he remoured to Hertford, where he abode three weekes, and then came backe to London, to holde the Parliament that began the first Wednesday of October in Westminster hall, which they had hung and trimmed sumptuously, and had caused to be set up a roiall chaire, in purpose to chaise a new King, neere to the which the Prelates were set, and on the other side sate the Lords, and after the commons in order, first sate the Duke of Lancaster, then Edmond of Langley the Duke of York, the Duke of Aumarle, the Duke of Surrey, the Duke of Gloucester, and the Marques Dorset, then in order the Earles of Arundale, Northfolke, March, Stafford, Pembroke, Salisburie and Devonshire, the Earles of Northumberland and Westmerland sate not, but went by and downe, and oftentimes knelt as it fell in doing their offices.

The Archbishop of Canterbury made a Sermon and toke for his Theme, Habui Iacob benedictionem a patre suo, which Sermon being ended in Latin, a Doctor of the Law, stood up and read an instrument, in the which was contained, that King Richard had by his owne confession disabled himselfe to be worthy to raigne, and that he would resigne the crowne to such a one as was sufficient to rule. This instrument being read, the Archbishop perswaded them to proceede to the election of a new King, and perceiving they were all contented, for there were not past foure persons that were of King Richards part (and they durst say nothing) he asked each of them whom they would haue to their King, whether the Duke of York or not: and they answered no: he asked if they would haue his eldest sonne the Duke of Aumarle: and they said no: he asked if they would haue his youngest sonne, and they said no: and so of diuers other: then staying a while, he asked if they would haue the Duke of Lancaster, and then they answered they would none other. This demaund being made thice, they drew certaine instruments and charters, and read them in presence of all that were there. When the Archbishops comming to the Duke, fell on their knees declaring to him how he was chosen King, and willed him to take regard if he would consent thereto. When the Duke being on his knees rose, and declared that he accepted the realme, sith it was ordained by God. When the Archbishop read what the new King was bound unto, and with certaine ceremonies signed him with the crosse, then he kissed the Archbishop, and they toke the ring, with which the Kings be wedded to the Realme, and bare it to the Lord Percy, that was Constable, who receiving it, shewed it to all the assembly, and then put it on the Kings finger, the King then kissed the Constable, and then the Archbishops led him to the Hege Royall, and the King made his prayers on his knees before it, and after spake unto them all, first to the Prelates, and then to the Lords and all other, and so set him downe in the seate: and thus he was inuested, and King Richard put downe, he sate a good while and kept silence, and so did al the rest: for they were in prayer for his prosperitie in his gouernment, and when they had ended, where the offices were boide, the King created the Lord Percy Constable, and toke him the staffe: When was chosen Ralph Earle of Westmerland Marshall, John Scire, or Serle Chancellor, Sir Richard Clifford keeper of the ppytie Seale, and many other officers were newly confirmed. After this the Archbishop spake certaine things in latine, praying for the Kings prosperitie, and the Realmes, and after spake in English vpon this following: Vir dominabitur in populo reg. 9. &c. And then exhorting all there present to pray the like, every man sate downe. When the King rose and made his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, then the Lords were sworn to be true to the Prince as before they had done to his father: his second sonne was there made Duke of Lancaster. Thus was King Richard deposed when he had reigned 22. yeres, 3. moneths, and odde dayes, in such sort as ye haue heard, whose royaltie had bin such, that where soeuer he lay, his person was guarded by 200. Cheshire men, he had about him 13. Bishops, besides Barons, Knights, Esquiers, and other more then needed, in somuch that to the household came every day to meate 10000. people, as appeared by the messes told out of the kitching to 300. seruitors, &c. he was murdered on the 14. of February next following, as shall be shewed in place convenient, and was buried first in the Church of the Friars preachers at Langley besides Saint Albans. And after by commandement of King Henry the sixt, remoued to Westminster.

Henry the fourth.

Ann. reg. 1.

Record Tower.

Henry Plantagenet bozne at Bolingbroke, in Lincolnshire, sonne to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, was ordeyned King of England, moze by force then by lawfull succession or election: he began his raigne the 29. of September, in the yere of our Lord God 1399. He forthwith made new officers, to wit Thomas his second sonne Keward of England: Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Countable of England: Ralph Neuill Earle of Westmerland, Par- Hall of England: Sir John Scerle Chancellour of England, Sir Richard Clifford keeper of his priuie seale: John Norbury Esquire Treasurour, Thomas Chaucer Countable of Wallingford Castle, & other officers, and then was crowned at Westminster the 3. of October, by Thomas Arundale Archbishop of Canterbury: The Dukes of York, Surrey, Aumarle, and the Earle of Gloucester bare a Canopie ouer him. Sir Thomas Dinmocke was champion, and rode thre times about the hall. This was a noble and valiant Prince, and after the ciuill warres were appealed, shewed himselfe louing to his subjects. He made Henry his sonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Chester, and heire apparant to the crowne of England.

After the solemnitie of the coronation, the Lords and commons straight proceeded to the Parliament. In which it was inquired out of the death of Duke of Gloucester, and howe he had been murdered at Calais by the Duke of Northfolke, vpon the kings commandement. King Henry created his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Chester, and Duke of Aquitaine. In this Parliament it was ordeined that the statutes made in the Parliament holden in the 21. yere of King Richard at Westminster, and after proroged vnto Wyke, with all the circumstances to be disannulled, renoked, made voyde, & utterly blotted out. Also that the Parliament holden at Westminster, in the 11. yere of King Richard, be holden firme and stable. Also that the Lords and other persons which were iudged forth in the Parliament holden the 21. yere of King Richard, and their heires that be dead, shoulde be wholly restorred to their possessions without any suing liuerie thereof to be made, excepted that the Lords and other shall haue nothing of the issues receiued in the meane time. The King gaue to the Earle of Northumberland the Isle of Man, to be holde of the king by seruice, to beare the sword with which he entred into England. And to the Earle of Westmerland he gaue the Countie of Richmond. Also iudgement was giuen against the Appellants of the Duke of Gloucester in this manner: The Lords in this present Parliament by the kings assent, iudge that the Dukes, of Aumarle, Surrey, and Gloucester now present and were appellants, shal lose their names of Dukes and honours from hence forth, together with the dignities, of Dukes, and that the Marques Dorset that is present, lose his name of Marques, and the Earle of Gloucester, which lose his name for him and his heires, as the aboue named persons doe theirs, and that all the Castles, possessions or manors which they had of them that belonged to those whom they appealed from the day of the arrest of the Duke of Gloucester, and the other Lords, or after at any time, simply and without fauour or mercy, they shall lose them: and that all other Castles, possessions, manors, Lordships, deminions and liberties, which they held of the Kings gift, that day or after shoulde rest in the Kings grace from that houre, and that all letters patents and charters, which they or any of them had of the said names, Castles, Dominions, possessions, and liberties shoulde be surrendred vp into the Chancery, there to be cancelled, and that they stand in state which they had in name and possession before the said day of the said arrest.

The King to shew to all men in all Countries about by what right and title he had taken vpon him the crowne and realme, sent Embassadors to Rome, John Treneuant Bishop of Hereford, John Cheyne Knights, & John Cheyne Esquire. Into France he sent Walter Tricklow Bishop of Durham, Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, and William Heron. Into Spaine John Trenor Bishop of St. Davids, and Sir William Par knight: Into Almaine the Bishop of Bango with other.

The Scottes in time of the Parliament taking occasion by the absence of the Northen Lords, and because the same time the North parts were sore oppressed by a great Rebellion entred as enemies, and took the Castle of Marke, and kept the same a certaine time, but at length spoiled and utterly ruined it, and many other mischiefes they did in the Countrey. Thomas Moubrey Duke of Northfolke, which was exiled, dyed at Venice, in his returne from Jerusalem. Also the Duches of Gloucester dyed, and her sonne and heire Humfrey dyed of the Rebellion when he was sent forth of Ireland.

The King held his feast of Christmasse in his Castle of Windsor, where John Holland late Duke of Excester and Earle of Huntingdon, Thomas Holland late Duke of Surrey & Earle of Kent, Edmond late Duke of Aumarle, and Earle of Rutland, son to the Duke of York, John Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Spencer, Sir Ralph Lumly, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Benedic Cely Knights, with others that fauoured King Richard conspired against King Henry, and appoynted priuily to murder him, vnder the colour of Tasting and other pastimes pretended. And the time appoaching of their purpose, they sent messengers to London with letters to the Duke of Aumarle, that he shoulde not faile to come at that day appoynted with his company, to helpe to doe the feate whereunto he was sworne: but his minde being altered, he bare the letters straight to his father the Duke of York, who caused a number of his men forthwith to carry his son to the King, where he shewing his letters, the King would not beleue them: but the same morning came the Spies of London to the Court, and informed him of the matter, whereupon the King made no tarriance, but got him forth to ward London, in company of the Spies and other: But before the King could gette London on his backe, his enemies came to Windsor, and there eyntred the Castle with an armed band band of 400. men on the fourth of January at night, where understanding that the King was escaped their hands, being sore amazed, they withdrew from Winbloe, into Sunning, a certayne Mannour neare to Reading, where the Quene wife to King Richard then lay, where they perswaded her household, that King Richard was escaped out of Donifret Castell, and they would go to him: from thence they went to Wallingford, and after to Abingdon, moving the people to take armes upon them, and to go meet their King Richard. After this they came to Faringdon, in the Vale of White Horse in Berkshire, and the same day to Cirencester, on the xij. day late in the evening, and there harbozed, with a great number of men of armes and many archers: there they beated that Sir Richard was escaped forth of prison, and that he was there with them, & to make their wordes to haue the moze credite, they had got a Chaplein of Sir Richards called Maudelen, so like to him in all proportion and fauour, that one could byneth be discerned from the other: many times (saith mine author) I haue seene him in Ireland sitte with the King his Master: so faire a Priest and goodly a person, I had not lightly seene. They put him in armour with a crowne on his helmet, so as all men might take him for King Richard. On the morrow being Wednesday, the people of that town mistaking of their proceedings, fought against them, and at length tooke the chiefest of them, and ledde them to the Abbey there, and put them in a faire chamber, vnder safe custody. And on the Thursday the sayd Lordes, fearing the people, imagined how to escape out of their hands, and caused some of their seruantes to sette fire on certayne houses in the Towne, thinking that thereupon the people would depart from them, and seke to stanch the fire: but it chanced contrary, for the people turned into marueylous rage against them, ranne upon them with great violence, and dreyue them into the market place, and there they beheaded Iohn Holland the Duke of Hereford, Thomas Holland the Duke of Surrey, and the Earle of Salisbury, the third day after the Cyprianie: their seruantes that were with them, were by and by taken and as prisoners bound and brought to Oxford, and on Monday following were beheaded in the Castell there, to the number of five and twentie persons. Also Sir Thomas Blunt Knight was beheaded with them. The week next following, was beheaded Tho Spencer Earle of Gloucester at Bristol: not long after was Sir Barnard Brocas beheaded at London, and a Priest named Iohn Maudelen, that was like King Richard, and another Priest called William Fribie. The Bishop of Carlisle was impeached and condemned of conspiracie, but was pardoned.

The first day of Februarie King Henry caused the blanke Charters, made to King Richard, to be burnt, at the Standart in Cheape of London.

King Richard was imprisoned in Donifret Castell, where xvj. dayes and nights they bereed him with continuall hunger, thirst and cold, and finally bereft him of his life, with such a kinde of death as neuer before that time was knownen in England (saith Sir Iohn Fortescue.) He died the xij. day of Februarie, whose body was brought to the City of London, and so through the City to Pauls Church bare faced, where he lieth three dayes for all beholders

and

and had seruice, where King Henry was present. From thence he was caried to Langley, and there buried in the Church of the Friars Preachers. Upon his death the famous and excellent Poet Iohn Gower, wrote certaine verses, which may be englished thus.

O Mirour for the world meete, which should't in Golde be sette,
By which all wise men, by foresight, their prudent wittes may whette.
Lo, God doth hate such rulers, as here viciously doe liue:
And none ought rule, that by their life,
doe ill example giue.
And this King Richard witnesseth well, his end this plaine doth shewe:
For God allotted him such ende, and sent him so greate woe,
As such a life deferude: as by the Chronicles thou mayst knowe.

The King with a great army went into Scotland, spoiled the countrey and returned to Poike, where two Knights, the one a Frenchman, the other an Italian challenged to fight within lists against Sir Iohn Cornwall, and Iames of Artois, which two strangers were overcome in battaile, and Sir Iohn Cornwall obtaining the Kings fauour, married the Kings sister, that had been wiue to Sir Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington.

The Welchmen taking occasion by the Kings absence when he was in Scotland, began to rebel, by the setting on of Owen Glendowerdew sonne to Griffith Vicham an Esquire of Wales, and so called Glendower, because his dwelling was in a place called Glendowry, for Glyn in Welch is a baile, and Dor is water, because the place was in a dale, at the side of the water or river of Dew in the parish of Corwen, in the countie of Merioneth in Powys wailes. He serued King Richard, at the time of his oppression by Henry Duke of Lancaster at Flint Castell.

The first cause of this stre was about a piece of land in controuersie betwixt him and the Lord Reignold Gray of Ruchine, for when he saw his cause not fauoured, first he began to spole the lands of the said Lord Gray, whereof the King being certified, went with an army into Wales: but the Welchmen fled to the mountaines, the King went the countrey, due the people with whom he met, and returned with a great pray of cattell.

The famous Poet Geoffrey Chaucer esquire, the first Summer of our English language, deceased. This was a worshipfull Gentleman, and of faire possessions, whose abode was chiefly about Woodstocke, (where he had a faire manor) and he was borne in Dorsetshire which also was his, with diuers other manors: he was of times imployed by King Edward 3. as an ambassadoe into France, and into other foreign lands: he had to wife the daughter of Paine Roete alias Guiana King of Armes, by who he had issue Tho. Chaucer, who married Maud daughter Esquier, chiefe Clarke of the Kitchin, and master of the household to K. Henry the 8. unto whom he dedicated the fruite of that his labour Anno Christi. 1540. The which volume was since againe, to wit, in Anno 1560. by viewe of diuers witten copies, corrected by my selfe, the author of this history, who at that time also corrected and added diuers woorkes of the said master Geoffrey Chaucers neuer before imprinted, and againe in the yere 1597. further increased with other his woorkes, as also his life, preferment, issue and death, collected out of records in the towre and else where by my selfe, and given to Thomas Spighe to be published, and was performed. Besides the history of Oedipus and Iocasta, with the siege of Thebes, translated and made into English verse, by Don Iohn Lidgate, a disciple of the said Chaucers.

John Gower a famous Poet.

Not long after deceased the like famous Poet Master Iohn Gower, a man not much unlike the other in excellency of wit, learning, or possessions, he builded a great part of St. Mary Querries Church in Southwarke, then new redified. On the South side of the which Church, he prepared for his bones a resting place, where somewhat after the old fashion he lyeth right sumptuously buried in a tombe of stone, with his image also of stone lying over him, y haire of his head alburne long to his shoulders, and curling by, a small forked beard, and on his head a garland or Chaplet of roses red, foure in number, an habite of purple damasked downe to his feete, a Coller of Eſtes gold about his necke, under his head the likenesse of three bones, which he compiled: the first, Speculum meditantis in French, the second Vox clamantis in Latine, the third Consolatio amantis in English, which last named booke is extant in print, y second I have since witten, but the first I have not seene, his tombe arched, was beautified with his armes, and the likenes of Angels with posies in latine. Besides in the wall were painted three virgins crowned, one of the which was written Charitie, and held this deuise. En toy qui fils de Dieu le pere s'anne soit, qui gisf sous ceſte pierre. The second Mercie, with this deuise: O bon Iesu fais ta mercie alme dont le corps gisf icy. The third Witte, with this deuise, Pour ta pite Iesu regard, Et mei cest alme in sauegarde.

All which is now washed out, and the image defaced, by cutting off the nose and striking off his hands, because they were elevated towards heauen.

The Emperour of Constantinople, came into England, to require ayde against the Turkes, whom the King with sumptuous preparation met at Blackheath, upon St. Thomas day the Apostle, and brought him to London, and paying for the charges of his lodging, presented him with gifts woorthy for one of so high degree.

Some after came newes, that the King of Leco had slaine in battel Bassacke the son of the noble Balchazaradan, and destroyed Jerusalem, and all the country round about. And because he had by Gods grace so overcome contrary to his opinion, he became chafened and 60000. men of his sect.

The Emperour of Constantinople hearing this, was very glad, and departed out of England, being honoured by the King with precious gifts. A Parliament was holden at London, after the feast of the Epiphanie, in the which Parliament a statute was enacted for Lollards, that wheresoever they were known to preach their false and corrupt doctrine, (so termed at that time) they should be taken, & delivered to the Bishop of the diocese, before whom, if they would presume stoutly to defend their erroneous opinions, they should be disgraced, & committed to the secular jurisdiction to be executed, which law was first put in practise upon a Priest named Wil. Sawtry, which was burnt in Smithfield, in the presence of many a man. Simon Burley was restored in blood & inheritance, except the lands given to the abbey of Grace by the towre of London, to St. Sephans at Westminster, and the Friars at Langley.

The 8. day of Aprill deceased Thomas Beawchampe Earle of Warwick, and shortly after deceased Iohn Botellham Bishop of Rochester.

The fine and twentieth day of July Iabel late wife to King Richard, not yet twelve yeres of age, departed from Dover towards Caleis, and so into France to her father, well and honorably accompanied. Where when she was arrived, Hugueucll that had ben sent for her into England, advertised the commissioners then remaying at Bulloigne. She was conveyed from Caleis by the Englishmen that accompanied her to Lallingham, where the Earle of St. Paul mette her, and the French Ambassadors: the alighted from her horse beneath Lollingham, the French Ladies came to her, and brought her to the Chappell, before the Ambassadors of both Realmes, and there Sir Henry Percy protested, that the King of England his mother had sent her to be delivered to her father cleare of all bonds of marriage, or other toſſe, and that he would take it on his soule, that she was found and true, even as she was the same day she was delivered to King Richard, and if any would say to the contrary, he was ready to prove it against him by Combat, but the Earle of St. Paul, saying he believed it to be true, the Lord Percy took her by the hand and deliuered her vnto the Earle, and the Commissioners of France deliuered certaine letters of acquittall.

Owen Glendouerdew with his Welchmen did much harme to the Englishmen, and returned without receiuing any harme.

There was found in the Kings bed clothes, an yron with 3. sharpe pikes, slender and round standing vpright, laid there by some traytor, that when the King should haue laid him downe, he might haue thrust himselfe vpon them.

This time was vsed exceeding pride in garments, golowes with deepe and broade sleeves, commonly called poke sleeves, the seruants wore the as wel as their masters, which might wel haue bin called receptacles of y deuill, for what they stole, they hid in their sleeves, whereof some hung downe to the kete, and at least to the knees, full of cuts & tagges, whereupon were made these verses.

The Conduit vpon Coznehill in London was made, which before time had been a prison, called the Tanne in Coznehill, whereunto, night walkers that were taken in suspicion of felonye, or other trespasses, were committed.

From the feast of the Epiphany till the midst of Aprill appeared a blazing starre, first betwixt the East and the North, and last of all putting fierie beames toward the North, soe thewling peraduenture the effusion of blood, about the parts of Wales and Northumberland.

Owen Glendouerdew with his Welchmen, wasted the lands of the Lord Reignald Gray, toke him prisoner, and slew many of his people.

Certaine men affirmed King Richard to be aliue, and that he should shortly shew himselfe openly, and reward them that were faithfull vnto him. But after a certaine priest was taken at Warwicke, who had writtten the names of many, which were the authors of these troubles, both the hope and feare of this conspiracie banished. The Priest was drawen, hanged and quartered. Also Walter Waldoke late Priour of Launde a Priorie in Leicester shire, because he confessed he knew euill against the king and did conceale it, was likewise hanged and beheaded. Spoure certain gray friers were taken, of the which one Richard Frisby, Doctor of Diuinitie, being asked what he would do if King Richard were present, answered, that he would fight in his quarrell against any man, euen to the death, wherefoe he was condemned, drawen, and hanged in his religious habite and weede.

At Danebarie in Essex, vpon Corpus Christi day, the deuill appeared in likeness of a gray frier, who entering the Church, raged insolently, to the great feare of the Parishioners: and the same houre with a tempest of whirlewind and thunder, the top of the Steeple was broken downe, and halfe the Chancel scattered abroad.

Shortly

Shortly after, Sir Roger Claringdon Knight, a bassard sonne of Edward the blacke Prince, and with him a Squire and a Peoman were beheaded, and eyght gray friers hanged and beheaded at London, and two at Leicester, all which had published King Richard to be aliue. All Priories allians with their possessions were reclaimed and seized into the Kings hands, except such houses as were conventuall.

Owen Glendouerdew, with a company of Welchmen invaded all the Shires that bordered nere vnto him, wherefoe Sir Edmond Mortimer with many knights and squires went out to encounter with Owen, stronger then he was of the Countrey: but when it came to martiall affaires, their owne Archers turned their hands against them whom they should haue defended. There were slaine aboue eleuen hundred of our men. Sir Edmond Mortimer was taken, and the Welchwomen, when the battayle was done using the dead carcases to shamefully to be spoken, would not suffer them to be buried without great rancome. This battayle was fought at Melle in Wales. The King was not hasty to purchase the deliuerance of the Earle of March, because his title to the crowne was wel known, but suffered him to remaine in prison.

The King went with a great power into Wales to pursue Owen Glendouerdew, where he profited nothing, but lost much, for the Welchmen conueyed themselves into unknown places: wherefoe the king constrained by necessity, returned into England, after he had spoiled and spent the countrey.

Edmond of Langley Duke of Yorke deceased, and was buried at Langley, with his byetren, nere vnto his wife daughter to King Peter of Spaine.

The same time the Scottes cruelly entered into England, for they supposed all the Lordes beyond Humber to be occupied in the parties of Wales: but the Earles of Northumberland, Henry Percy, and his sonne Henry with the carle of Dunbarre, (that a good while agoe hauing forsaken the Scottes, had swoyne to be true to the King of England) with a number of armed men and plentie of archers, sodainely came to resist the Scottes, as they would haue returned home, after they had spoiled and spent the Countrey; but now vpon a sodaine their way was soe laid, so that they must needs abide and take a place to fight vpon: they chose therefore a mountaine nere to the Towne of Wollor, called Halydowne hill, in the which they place themselves with their armed men & archers, which when our men beheld, leauing the way in which they stood against the Scots, they clime the hill that stood ouer against the Scots, and without delay of time, our archers placed in the balley, set their arrowes against the Scots battell, that they might by some meanes force them to come downe: on the other side, the Scottish archers let sic at our men, who yet after they felt the grieuous waight, and as it had been a shower of tempest of the arrowes, shot by the Englishmen, they fledde. The Earle Dowglas persecuting his men so to sic, for he was their generall leader, toke his speare, and manfully with a multitude came downe the hill, trusting doubtesse in his armour and armour of his complices that had been three yeres in making, and forced himselfe to runne vpon the archers, which when the archers chers saw, they stepped backe, and shotte so fiercely, that they pierced the armed mens bodies, strooke through their helmets, rined their speares, and rent their armour with light acoe. Carle Dowglas himselfe was wounded in five places, the residue of the Scottes that were not come before the hill, turning backe from the arrows that flew, strode away, but their sight nothing anayled them whilst the archers followed them: but that they were compelled to perle themselves. Carle Dowglas also was taken, and many drowned in the river of Tweede, whilst they knew not the swordes, to the number of five hundred (as was sayd.) In this battell no Lord, no knight, no esquire, gaue any stroke to the enemies, but onely God gaue the victorie to the English archers, the Lordes and armed men being onely lookers on.

That day the flower of the Scottish Chivalry was taken, to wit, the earle Dowglas, Mardake the eldest son of the Duke of Albanie, that was heire apparent to the Realme of Scotland: the earles of Murray, Angus, and Orkeney, the Lordes Mountgomerie, Erskyn, & Gram, with many other knights to the number of foure score, besides Esquires and yeomen, whose number was not knowne. There were slaine of barons, the Lord Gordon, the Lord John of Swinton that was false to both the Realmes, &c. This battell was fought on the fourteenth of September.

The 26 of February, she was crowned at Westminster.

In the summer following, by the Townes of Bedford and Berkeleysward, monsters were seene oftentimes mornings and evenings to come out of the woodes, under divers colours, in the likeness and similitude of men of war, which met one with another, and seemed to fight cruell battels, which although they that were a farre off might see, yet they that were nere hand could not see nor finde, which thing decreed many that coueted to appoach and come nere.

Henry Percy the younger, did sodainly shewe himselfe to be the Kings enemy, unto whom toynd Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, uncle to the said Henry: and to make their conspracte excusable, they did write unto the King about, that they pretended nothing against the allegiance nor fidelitie which they ought to the king, neither to gather to any other end an armie, but onely for the saving of their persons, and for the better gouernement of the common wealth, because the payments and taskes granted to the king for the safe custodie die of the realme, were put to such uses as they ought not to be, and were unprofitably consumed and wasted.

Whereover, they complained: that because of the euill standers which their enemies had made of them, they durst not personally appeare in the kings presence, untill the prelates and barons had intreated for them, that they might be permitted to purge themselves before the king, and be lawfully iudged by their peeres, so that many that saw these letters, did praise their diligence, and extoll their fidelitie towards the common wealth. But the king being disquieted with these writings, that he might appeale the communalitie, he wrote to them, that he marvelled much, that seeing the Earle of Northumberland, and Henry his son had receiued the most part of the payments and summes granted to him by the cleargie and communalitie, for the defence of the Marches of Scotland, what occasion they had to make such manifest standers &c. But the young Henry Percy putting his confidence in the aide of Owen Glendouwerde, and Edmond Mortimer Earle of March, with the Welchmen, and men of Cheshire, published that King Richard was aliue, and was with them, whom if any man would see, they should without delay come in armour vnto the Castle of Leicester, which declaration made diuers variable motions in the hearts of many, and caused them to waue.

King Henry considering all things wisely, gathered together as many as he could, and came sodainly into the partes where the rebles kept their rage, and when Henry saw vpon a sodaine the kings banner, and was euen ready to haue scaled the towne of Wykeburg, he straightwayes bestid from the assault of the towne, and said to his men, we must now needs turne our weapons vpon them that come against vs: ye see the kings standert, neither can we, though we would, fixe any cartinghole: stand to it manfully therefore, for this day shall either bring vs all to promotion and honor, if we ouercome, or else if we be ouercome, it shall deliuer vs from the kings malice. For it is a woeful thing to die in battell for the common wealth, then after battell to die by the sentence of condemnation by the enemy: and with that, 14000. of the best men that were with Henry, made bolue & promise to stand by him so long as breath would serue, and they took the field that was commodious for them, and the king and his men lay in the field right against them. The boluyn of Henry Percy began the battell, whose arrowes fell not vpon the ground, but vpon the bodies of the kings souldiers, & the kings archers shot as fiercely against their enemies, so that on both sides many were slaine, and many thousands fled, thinking the King had been slaine: but the Earle of Dunbar withdrew the king from the place that he stode in, which was a good turne for him, for the aforesaid Henry Percy, and Earle Dowglas the Scot (then whom was neuer man more stout) raged so, that the kings standert was ouerthrowen, & those about it slaine, among whom was slaine Edmond Earle of Staffo, Sir Walter Blunt the kings standert-bearer, Sir Nicholas Langford, Sir John Coke, Sir John Caluerley, Sir John Massey, Baron of Woodington, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir John Clifton, & the two brethren Nicholas and Robert Generals, with many other knights and Gentlemen, and of the commons on both ides about five hundred daime. Henry the Prince was wounded in the face with an arrowe. In the meane season Henry Percy whilste he went before his men in the battel, pressing upon his enemies, was sodainly slaine, which being knowne, the kings enemies fled, but the Earle Dowglas was taken, and also Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, with Sir Richard Vernon, and the baron of Linderton, and many other were taken. This battel was fought on Mary Magdalens eue, nere vnto Shrewsbury, in a place called Old field, alias Bull field, not farre from a place called Barwike. On the Monday following, were condemned and beheaded at Shrewsbury the Earle of Worcester, the Baron of Linderton, and Sir Richard Vernon. The body of Henry Percy was deliuered to the Lord of Furniuaile to be buried, but the king caused the same body to be taken vp, and to be reposed betwene two Pillstones in the Towne of Shrewsbury, there to be kept with armed men, and afterward to be beheaded and quartered, commaunding his head and quarters to be carried vnto diuers Cities of the kingdome.

The Earle of Northumberland with a strong power was comming toward his sonne and his brother, (as men thought) or at the least towards the King; but the Earle of Westmerland, and Robert Waterton had gathered a great army, and had entred on their way to meete him sodainely, but the taking none of them both to be his friends, returned vnto the castle of Markwiche.

When all things were set in a stay at Shrewsbury, the King went towards Poike, where, when he was settled, he sent to the Earle of Northumberland, commaunding him to dismisle his company, and to come to him, and the Earle at the Kings commaundement came to him on the morrowe after Saint Laurence day, but the King receiued him not friendly, but as one that sued for pardon, and pardoning him of his life, committed him to safe custodie.

The Britons Amorikes, the Lord of Castels being their leader, invaded the Towne of Blimouth, spoiled and burnt it, and went their way free, but immediately the western naue, vnder the conduct of William Wilford esquire in the coast of Briton, toke fortie ships laden with yron, oyle, sope and tunne of Rochell, to the number of a thousand tunne, and in returning backe againe, he burnt fortie ships, and at Penarch the said William arrived with his men, and burned to wanes and Lordships the space of 6. leagues, and set the towne of St. Matthew on fire, and their shippes about the said towne.

A little before Christmasse, the Frenchmen came into the Ile of Wight, boasting that they would keepe their Christmasse there, and when a thousand of the Frenchmen were entred into the Island, and diuising flockes of Cattell toward the Sea, sodainely there came vpon them a companie of the Islande men, that forced them to leaue their pray behinde them, and to gette them gone (with shame yndough) to their shippes, with no small losse of their men.

In a parliament holden at London after the Idances of the Epiphanie, the Earle of Northumberland was restored to his former estate and dignitie. And in this Parliament was granted vnto the King an vnaccustomed talke, very heauie and painefull for the inhabitants, the manner of which talke the gray

ters thereof would haue to be kept secret for euermore: and vnder that condition only it was granted, that it should not be any example to them that should come after, and that there should remaine no record thereof, but the same forthwith to be burnt.

The Frenchmen about that time came before the Ile of Wight with a great flang, and sent certaine of their men to demand in the name of King Richard, and of Quene Isabell, a tribute or subsidie of the inhabitants: who answered, that king Richard was dead, and the Quene, sometime his wife, was sent home to her parents, without condition of any tribute: but if the Frenchmers minde were to fight, they willed them to come vp, and no man should let them for the space of fye houres to refresh themselves, but when that time was expired, they should haue battell giuen them, which when the Frenchmen heard, they went away and did nothing.

The Lord of Castels in Brytaine, arrived at Blackepole, two mile out of Dertmouth with a great flang, where of the rusticall people, whom he euer despised, he was slaine. There were taken that day thre Lords, and twentie knights of name, and the vplandish people presenting their captiues vnto the King, returned with their purses full of golde.

In the moneth of Aprill, the clergie granted vnto the King a tenth.

All the summer following, Owen Glendowerdew and his Welchmen, rob, burne and destroy the countreies adioyning vnto them: he toke many captiues, and slew many Englishmen: he laid flat certaine Castles that he had taken, and some he kept for his owne defence.

The Flemmings and Brittaines toke certaine shippes of ours laden with merchandises, and slew or hanged all the sparners.

The olde Countesse of Arfozd, mother to Robert de Vere Duke of Irewland (who as we said before died at Bouaine) did cause such as were familiar with her, to bryte throughout all the parts of Chester, that King Richard was aliue, and that he should shortly come and challenge his olde estate and dignitie. She caused many harts of silver, and some of golde to be made for badgers, such as King Richard was wont to bestowe on his knights, Esquires and friends, that distributing them in the Kings name, the might the sooner allure the knights, and other ballant men of the Countrey, to be at her will and desire.

Also, the same and byte which daily was blazed abroad by one William Serle, sometimes of King Richards chamber, that the same King Richard was in Scotland, and tarried with a power of French and Scottiuhmen, caused many to beleeue that he was aliue. This William Serle had forged a priuie scale in the said Richards name, and had sent diuers comfortable letters vnto such as were familiar with King Richard, by which means, many gaue the greater credit to the Countesse, inso much, that some religious Abbots of that countrey did giue credit vnto her tales, who afterward were take at the kings commaundement, and imprisoned, because they did beleeue and giue credit to the Countesse in this behalfe, and the Countesse had all her goods confiscate, and was committed to close prison: and William Serle was byawen from prison.

King.*

About the feast of Saint Faith, the King called a parliament at Conventry, and sent proccesse to the Sherifffes that they should chose no knights nor burgesses that had any knowledge in the Lawes of the Realme, by reason whereof, it was called the Lay mens Parliament. These picked out knights and Burgesses, could devise none other way to release the Kings lacke of money, but to deprive the Clergie of their temporall landes and goods, by this occasion given, arose great alteration and variance betwene the Clergie and the laytie. The knights affirming that they had oftentimes going forth with the King against rebels and enemies, not onely spent largely their goods, with and for the King, but also had set their bodies in great daunger and jeopardies, where in the meane season the Clergies late idle at home, and helped the King neuer a whit. But Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterburie made answer, that the cleargie did alwayes give the King as much as the lay people did, considering that they did oftner give the King tenths, then the laytie gave sixtences. And moreover, that more of their tenants did serve the King in his warres, then of the tenants of the laytie. And besides this, they prayed day and night for the prosperitie of the King, and of all them that faithfully served him.

And when the speaker of the parliament named John Cheyney, said with a loud voice & angry countenance, that he little regarded the payers of the Church, the Archb. of Canterburie answered: Wh (quoth he) now I perceive plainly to what end the fortune of this realme will come, when the Suffrages of the church are excluded and little set by, where with the gobbeart is wont to be appeased: surely that kingdome neuer continueth firme and stable, that is void of prayer and deuotion: not withstanding, thou which settest at naught the religion of the Clergie, thinke not without punishment to take away the possessions of the church, for if the Archbishop of Canterburie live, thou shalt haue euill taking of any thing that is his. When the archbishop considering that the king did thinke at these things, rose vp, and kneled downe before the king, desiring him to consider how graciously, & by Gods fauor, he had attained the kingdome, that he would consider his first promise, which was, that he would procure vnto euery man their right & title so far as lay in him. He also willed him to remember y<sup>e</sup> which he voluntarily made, which was, that he would honor and defend the church, and would cherish and maintaine the ministers thereof: he required him to consider the danger and dishonour of breaking an oath, wherefore he desired him to permit and suffer the church to enjoy the pri-

uileges and liberties, which in time of his predecessors it did enjoy, and to feare that king, by whom all things do raigne. When the Archbishop had said these and like words, the king commaunded him to go againe to his seat, and said, that his intent and purpose was to leave the Church in as good state or better then he found it. And then the Archbishop speaking to the knights and burgesses, said: You, and such like as you be, haue giuen such counsell vnto our king, and to his predecessors, to confiscate the goods & landes of the Celles which the Frenchmen and Germans did possesse in England, and said, that by them he should heape vp great riches, as inuaded they were worthy many thousands of golde. Notwithstanding, it is most true that the king at this day is not the richer thereby of halfe a Marke; for you haue extorted, or at the least begged them out of his hands, and haue appropriated the said goods vnto your selues, so that it may be confuted that your request to haue our temporallies, is not for the kings profit, but for your owne couetousnesse: for without doubt, if the king (as God forbid he should) fulfill your wicked purpose, he should not be one farthing the richer the next yere following: and surely, I will sooner let my head be cut off, then that the Church should be destitute of the least right that pertaineth to it.

The knights of the Parliament hearing this saying of the Archbishop, and seeing the constancie of their Petropolitane, held their peace, but yet persistered in minde to haue their purpose: which the Archbishop perceiving (hauling his eye on erbe side to marke what was done) laboured so to disappoint their doings, that he wanne the fauour of certaine of the temporall Lords to assist him, who constantly auouched by their consents, that the Church should neuer be spoiled of the temporallies. And here they acquite the Archbishoppe and Prelates, one pleasure for another, which they had done for them before. When the commons in this Parliament required that all such landes and reuenues as sometime belonged vnto the Crowne, and had bene giuen away, eithr by the king, or by his predecessors king Edward or Richard, should againe be restored vnto the Crowne. Vnto which request the Archbishop and other the Prelates would in no case condescend: and so it came to passe, that there was no more mention made after wards of any exactions of the temporallies. But contrariwise, the knights of the Parliament, who had thewed themselves so importunate in that errour, confessed vnto the Archbishop their fault and malice, desiring him to forgive them.

Moreover they gave him thanks, for that through his stout courage the Church at that time recovered strength, rectifying the saying of the Scripture, Thou vnder an hard Prince, and an euill time, art bolde to do good. Besides many things that were granted to the king in this Parliament, the lay people granted him two sixtences upon condition, that the Lord Furniwall should receive all the money, and use it to be spent in the kings warres.

the king.*

Also the Letters patents that were giuen to sundry persons, for purely reuenues by king Edward, and king Richard, were called in againe, the knights of the Parliament so adiudging it, although it rebounded to the kings dishonour. The Clergie granted the king a tenth and a halfe.

Oxford.

This yere died William Wickham bishop of Winchester, by whose charges and trauell, the Cleargie of England was much increased, for he builded a notable Colledge in Oxford, for the increase of learning, where he placed the warden & his company, to the number of lxx. besides children, servants, & ten priests, to keepe daily service, endowing þ said company with sufficient lands.

This Colledge

He began the foundation of a newe Colledge at Winchester, and in five yeres finished the same, where he placed the like number of Schollers to learne their Grammar, and other principles, to be sent afterward to his other Colledge at Oxford. These two Colledges are called, the Newe Colledges, dedicated to our blessed Lady.

He builded the great body of the Church of Saint Swithens in Winchester, where the sermons are made, and where his body is entered, a very princely worke: neither did he for all this diminish any thing of his ordinary household charges, and so (as the writing engrained on his Sepulchre sheweth) both rich and poor. He deceased at the age of lxxx. yeres. He died rich, for beside that he gave to his kinfolke and to the poore, he gave somewhat to every Church in his dioces. He gave many things to the king, and to his owne servants, and to his Colledges: neither do I doubt but that he that thus lived, is now with God, whom I beseech to raise up many like Bishops in England.

Wickham borne at Wilt-ham, his prefence by
third.

This William Wickham was borne at Wiltcham in Hampshire, of which place he toke his surname, and was of some called Long, because he was a tall man: one master Wodale of Wiltcham brought him up at schole, where he learned his Grammar, & to write faire. After this, the Constable of Winchester Castle, at that time a great ruler in Hampshire, got Perot, alias Wickham of Wodale and made him his Cleark. Edward the third comming to Winchester Castle, liked Wickham, and toke him to service, and understanding that he had mind to be a priest, made him first Parson of S. Martins in London and then Deane of Saint Martins le Grand, and then Archdeacon of Buckingham. He made him also surerpoore of his buildings, as of Windsor, Doublington in Kent, and other places. After this, he preferred him to be bearer of the priuy seale, master of the Wardes and Forests, and Treasurer of the kings revenues in Fraunce, Archdeacon of Lincoln, then Bishop of Winchester, Chancellor, and Treasurer of England.

Wickham but a while.
His goods confiscate and very soon after restored to him again.

Of his banishment out of the Realme wherof some have written, I find no mention thereof in Thomas Walsingham, Henry Knitton and other Authors at that time living, nor more of his troubles, but onely that by meanes of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, his goods were by Edward the third confiscated, and given to Richard the sonne of the blacke Prince, in Anno. 1376. and by the meanes of Alice Pierce were againe restored to the said Bishop in the yere next following, to wit, in Anno 1377. as more at large in those yeres

I have set downe: moreover it is manifest, that if he had sustained the losse of all his goods, and seven yeres banishment (as some have fabled) it would have bene hard for him, or rather impossible to have brought so many great works to perfection, as the world can witnesse to have bene done at his charges. To him in that Bishopricke, succeeded Henry Bewfort, sonne to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, by his wife Katherin Swinford, he was translated from Lincoln to Winchester, and Philip Reppon Abbot of Leicester, was at the kings request made Bishop of Lincoln.

Henry Bewfort Bishop of Winchester.

The king kept his Christmas at Eltham in Kent.

About the feast of Saint Valentine, the sonnes of the Earle of March were taken out of the Castell of Windsor, and led away into Wales to Owen Glendowerdew, but shortly after were recovered againe. The Smith that made the keyes, by the which they that conveyed them, got into them, had first his hands, and then his head cut off.

1405.
Earle of Marches sonnes.

The Lady Spencer sister to the Duke of Poike, and widow of Thomas Lord Spencer, before executed at Wyktoke, being apprehended and committed to prison, accused her brother the Duke of Poike to be chiefe Author in stealing away of the Earle of Marches sonnes, wherefore the said Duke was kept by Sir John Pelham in the Castell of Pemsey till the next Parliament.

After the feast of the Purification of our Lady, the king assembled his Barons at London, to treat of the government of the Realme, and to have ayde of money to be given him, but the Nobles would not at that time obey his request. In the Lent following therefore, the king caused the Cleargie and the Barons to assemble at S. Albones for the matter aforesaid, but by reason the nobles stood against him, there was nothing done, and so departed on Palm Sunday.

About the 10. of March, in a fight betwixt the Englishmen and Welchmen, the sonne of Owen Glendowerdew was taken, and 1500. with him were taken or slaine.

Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Richard Scroope Archbishoppe of Poike, Thomas Mowbray Earle of Marhall, Thomas Lord Bardolph and other, conspiring against King Henry, assembled together the Citizens of Poike, and many other, to stand with them for the commoite of the Realme. And to animate the commons to be the readier unto this business, they set Articles upon the doores of the Monasteries and Churches of the same Citie, written in English against the king, because he had put downe King Richard, offering themselves for; those Articles to live and dye, which caused great number of people to resort to them: but Ralph Nevell Earle of Westmerland that was not farre off, together with John Duke of Lancaster, the kings sonne, being enforced of these things, gathered an army with speede to goe against the Archbishops company, but all was in vaine, for the Archbishops power was farre greater than theirs, whereupon the Earle of Westmerland sent messengers, to enquire of the Archbishoppe the cause of so great an assembly in armour, contrary to the kings peace: wherunto the Archbishop answered, that he toke nothing in hand against the kings peace, and he was in armour, and munished with men, onely for feare of the king whom he coulde not safely come unto to speake; but his purpose (he said) was good and commodious both for the king and the Realme, if happily they would knowe it: and then he shewed a Schedule, in which the Articles were contained, which when the Earle of Northumberland had read, hee with word and countenance praised the Bishops holy and vertuous intent, and promised, that hee and his would prosecute the same with the Archbishop.

The Archbishop being glad of this, belied the Earles wordes, and persuaded the Earle Marshall, being unwilling thereunto, to go with him to a place appointed to talke together, to whom they with like number came, and the writing with the Articles was read over: straightway the Earle and they that were with him gave their assent to these articles: then said the Earle being subtiller than the rest, behold the labour that we have taken in hand is come to such ende as we would have it, and the people hath now bene long in armour, let some of your men beare word unto the people to go to their way home, and to lay downe their armour, and every man to fall to his occupation and accustomed labour: in the meane season, we, in token of concord will dinke together, that the people on both sides shall see it, and without delay, after they had taken each other by the bands, a knight was sent on the Archbishops behalfe, to beare word to the people that it was peace, and to command euery man to lay downe their armour, and to go to their owne home.

The people beholding signes of peace, and the Lords drinkeing together, being wearied with the vnaccustomed trauell of warre, turned the reines of their hildes homeward, and so it came to passe, that when the people of the Archbishops side went away, the number of the aduersaries increased, as before it was appoynted, and the Archbishop did not perceiue that he was betrayed, untill such time as the Earle arrested him: hee arrested the Marshall also, and many other with him, to all which it was promised that they should haue no harme, but that promise was not kept, for both the Archbishop and the Earle Marshall were brought to Pontefract to the king, who in the meane while was advanced thither with his power, and from thence he went to York, whither the prisoners were also brought: others say that the king sojourning at Bishops Thorpe, the Archbishop was brought thither, where sir William Fulford knight learned in the lawes, sitting on an high stage in the Hall, gave iudgement that the Archbishop should be beheaded: he was therefore set on an ill fauoured iade, with his face towarde the horse's tale, and carried with great shame and disgrace enough to a feld betwixt Wake and Thirsk: where with five strokes his head was smitten off on the morrow after: with him were condemned and executed the Earle Marshall, sir John Lamplough, and sir Robert Plompton. After the king had ransomed and other wise punished by grievous fines the Citizens of York, he departed from York with an army of 37000, fighting men furnished with all prouision, marching northward against the Earle of Northumberland. At his coming to Durham the Lord Hastings, the Lord Falconbridge, sir John Colville of the Dale, and sir John Griffith, being convicted of the conspiracy, were were beheaded. The Earle of Northumberland perceiuing the kings intent, got himselfe to Berwik with 300. horse, and from thence into Scotland. The king being bent against the Earle of Northumberland, went to Berwik, from whence the Earle fled into Scotland, and the Lord Bardolph with him, whom Dauid Lord Fleming the Scot receiued into alliance. The king understanding that the Earle was fled, he commaunded them in the Castell to render it unto him, which when they refused to do, the king caused a great Gun to be shot, which ouerthrew part of a Tower, whereupon they of the Castell gaue ouer, and submitted themselves to the king, who caused some of them to be beheaded, and the residue to be sent to prisons. After this, the Castell of Alnwick, and the rest of the Earles Castles were with small adoe rendered to his hands: with which successe the king being encouraged, went straight into Wales, where contrariwise nothing prospered with him, wherefore he returned, losing charets, carts, and wagons, to the number of fiftie, with his treasure, so that coming backe to Worcester, he sent for the Archbishop and Bishops, and declared to them his misfortune, desiring them to helpe him: to whom the Archbishop answered, that he would talke with the Clergie in that matter. In the meane season the Frenchmen came to succor the Welchmen with 140. ships: they landed in Milford haue, hauing lost almost all their horses for lacke of fresh water. The Lord Barkley and Henry Pay burned fiftie of those ships in the same haue. These Frenchmen besieged the town of Carmarthen, and took it, granting to the inhabitants all their moueable goods, and to go whither they would.

The same time the foresaid Lord Barkley, Thomas Swinborne, and Henry Pay took foure and six ships of the French, in the which they took the Lordward of France and eight Captaines more.

The towne of Cruce Kose or Koston in Northfolshire was bent.

This yere all the weares in Thomas from the towne of Stanes in the West, unto the water of Spedway in the East, by the Spaloe and communalitie of London, were destroyed, and the trunks bent, for the which great plea and discorde followed betwixne Thomas Arundell Archbishoppe of Canturbury, and other Lords and knights of the one party, and the Spaloe and communalty on the other party, but the Citizens preuailed by vertue of their charter and statutes. Roger Walden Bishop of London deceased.

The first of March a Parliament beganne, which lasted nigh one whole yere, for after the knights of the Parliament had long delayed to graunt to the king a subsidy, yet in the ende being overcome, they granted the king demanded. The Prioresse and the friers that lined of almes, were forced euery one to pay halfe a Marke. By decre of this Parliament the Wytons that serued the Quene were expelled the Realme, and two of her daughters were also sent with them.

Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolf, by the counsell of Dauid Fleming fled into Wales, for hee had declared to them, that the Scottes had conspired to deliuer them vnto their owne king, in exchange for other prisoners: and for this doing of Dauid Fleming, the tray-

The Bishop escaped and fled, but the Earle of Arkeney, and the said James the young lad, was sent to the Tower of London, where he remained prisoner till the second yere of Henry the first, which was aboute eightene yeres.

Pesidence.

This summer, through corruption of the ayre, so great a plague was shed upon mens bodies, as was not sene the like in many yeres in this lande, so that men might say:

The south winds warme did blow, with heat pestiferous,
And pesidence did beare great rule in Cities populous.

For at London in short while it consumed aboue 30000. men and women, and in the countrey to wnes great mortalitie fell among the husbandmen, so that great households died cleane up, and the houses were emptied.

In time of this pesidence the King durst not come nere to the Citie of London, wherefore being at the Castell of Leedes in Kent, he departing from thence, toke shipping at Quinborough in the Isle of Sheppey, to sayle ouer into Essex, and so to go to Blashey, there to passe the time till the mortalitye were ceased. But as the king was on the sea, certaine French Pirates which lay lurking at the Thames mouth to watch for some pray, got knowledge of the kings passage, and thereupon as he was in the midst of his course, they entred amongst his fleet and toke foure vessels next to the kings shippe, and in one of the same vessels sir Thomas Rampton, the kings vicechamberlaine, with all his chamber suite and apperell. They followed the king so nere, that if his ship had not bene swift, he had landed sooner in Fraunce, than in Essex: But such was his good hap that he escaped, and arrived at his appointed port.

About the sixteenth day of August deceased, sir Robert Knowles knight, at his Manor of Sconethorpe in Spozfolke, he was brought to London, and there honourably buried by the Lady Constance his wife, in the white Friars Church which he had newly recedified and builded.

Sir Robert Knowles.
John Leland.

This sir Robert Knowles had bene a most valiant Captaine in the warres of France, during the raigne of Edward the third, and Richard the second, whose force the Realme of France both felt and feared, so did the Duke of Burgundie of Britaine, and all the people from hence to Spayne. Of him in his life were made verses in Latin, which may be englished thus.

Register of Becmondley.

O Robert Knowles, most worthy of fame,
By thy prowess France was made tame:
Thy manhood made the Frenchmen to yeeld,
By dint of sword in towne and field.

Utrics.

This sir Robert Knowles founded in the towne of Pontfract a Colledge to the honour of the holy Trinitie, with an Hospitall ioyned thereunto. In the which Colledge was placed a Paister, and six or seven Wykes, and in the Hospitall 13. pore men and women. He was once minded to haue made this Colledge at his manour of Sconethorpe, but at the request of Constance his wife (a woman of meane birth, and sometime of a dissolute life afore her marriage) he turned his purpose, and made it in the very place of Pontfract, where he was boine, endowing the same with 180. pound land by yere. He also builded the faire new great bidge at Rochester, ouer the riuer of Medway, with a Chappell and a Chauntrie at the crosse end thereof. In the which Chappell was sometime a table hanging, wherein was noted the benefactors to that bidge, as followeth.

All these had given money or lands towards the building and repaying of the said bridge.

Notwithstanding this table, I finde in recoꝝd as followeth: The bridge betwixt the Citie of Rochester, and the village of Strode was in the fourth yere of king Richard the second, soze decayed or broken downe by tempest of weaether, and inundation of the river of Medway, whereupon William Basing Master of the hospitall at Strode, and Nicholas Hering, were licensed by the King to repaire the same. And in the eleventh yere of the same king Richard the second, John Cobham, and Robert Knowles beganne their charge towards the building of the said bridge, and in the eightene yere of the same Richard, the said John Cobham founded a Chantry in the Chappell there of thys Chapleins, and gave lands to the bridge in the 22. yere of Richard the second: and thus much of the recoꝝd have I noted.

I find further by John Leiland, that one John Warner a Merchant of Rochester made the new coping of Rochester bridge. And William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury made the pion pikes and barres about the same coping.

Hospitall at Rome for Englishmen.

This Robert Knowles, was also one of the founders of an hospitall in the Citie of Rome, in manner following: for that there was no pation of the world, but had some kinde of hospitalitie in Rome, save onely the people of England, certaine Englishmen beeing in Rome, procured licence of the Pope to build an hospitall, in place where Thomas Becker Archbishoppe of Canterbury had sometime builded a Chappell of the holy Trinitie. In this hospitall which they builded, was to be releued, a gentleman thys daies, bread, wine, and ware: a commoner eight daies and nightes, meale, drinke, and lodging. And if any woman happen to be nigh her time of liverance, so that she dare not take her journey, she to be honestly kept till she be purified: and if she be of power, to take her child with her: if not, to be kept there untill it were seven yeres old.

The founders of this hospitall were, Sir Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London, Thomas Brampton Bishoppe of Rochester, Sir John Philpot and his wife, Sir Robert Knowles, Sir Hugh Calueley, Sir John Haukewood, Sir John Thornam, Knights, John Twiforde, John Shepard and Alice his wife, Robert Cristall and Agnes his wife, Robert Windleront, Walter Whitchers, Robert Pyne, Adam Staple, Henry Line Draper, and other Citizens of London in the yere of our Lord 1380. in the Raigne of King Richard the second; which Hospitall was againe newe rectified and made a goodly house in the yere of our Lord 1449. towards the charges whereof, was money gathered in cuertie Parish in Englande, but that came to small effect, the charges of collecting and conueying was such, that, there came towards the wooꝝke not past one thousande Duckettes in one whole yere.

In November a Parliament being called at London, a tare of money was devised of the whole Realme. Parliament at London.

This yere was a soze and sharpe winter, and such aboundance of snow, which continued December, Januarie, februarye and March, so that almost all small birds dyed through hunger and cold. Whiles the King held a great Councell at London with the Nobles of the Realme, Henry Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Lord Bardolf came againe into England, who after long journeying, when they came to the Towne of Wyke, they caused to be proclaimed, that who so would have libertie, should take by armour and weapon and follow them, whereupon much people resorted to them: but Sir Thomas Rockley Scherife of Northshire, with other Knights of that countrey went against them, and at Biamham soze nere to Daleswold, fought with them a great battell, and slue the Earle, whose head was straight waies cut off. The Lord Bardolf was soze wounded and taken alive, but died shortly after. This battell was fought on the xiiii day of february. The Earles head was put on a stake, and carried openly through the Citie of London, and let on London bridge. The Bishoppe of Bangor was taken with the Lordes, but pardoned of his life, because he was not found in armour. The King went to Wyke, and there condemned such as transgressed, confiscated their goods, pacified the countrey, hanged the Abbot of Wale, who had bene in armour, and returned to the south partes againe.

Upon the seventh of September there were such floods of rayne, as the sode men of that age had neuer sene before. Edmond Holland Earle of Kent whilsk he besieged the Castell of Wyke in Brittain, he was wounded with an arrow of a Crossbow in the head, notwithstanding he toke the Castell and destroyed it to the ground, and not long after his bzaines rotted, and he died.

William having no issue by her husband, was now married by the king, after her husbands death to marry with his bastard brother, the Earle of Dorset, but the chole for her husband, Henry Mortimer, a goodly young Bachelor, by whom she had issue Anne married to sir John Aubremond.

About the feast of All-Saints the Cardinals of Burges came into England, being sent from the Colledge of Cardinals, to informe the King and Cleargie of the inconstant dealing of Pope Gregory, as also he had informed the French King and his Cleargy and Realme, to the ende that those two kings might set to their helping handes, to induce the saide Gregory to observe the oath he had made, and that by the magnificence of those two kings, concord might be made in the Church, unto the which businesse the French King had gladly granted, and sent messengers unto Pope Gregory, who notwithstanding was obstinate.

The King of England when he understood the Cardinales message, he commaunded that courtesie and gentle entertainement should be given him, and offered to beare his charges so long as he would abide in England.

After the feast of the Epiphany, the Archbishop of Canterbury caused to assemble at London, all the Cleargy of the Realme, to chole personages mete to go to the generall councill holden at Pisa, whereunto were chosen Robert Holam Bishop of Salisbury, Henry Chiseley Bishop of Saint Davids, and Thomas Chillingdon Bishop of Christes Church in Canterbury, and the king had sent before John Coluile knight, and master Nicholas Rixton Clearkes, with letters to be given to them. And in the letter to the Pope it was written.

Most holy Father, our humble recommendations in aliall wise premised. The inscrutable wisdome of the high God doth sometime dissemble in some sort, the finnes of men, if at length they will yet amend, though not through servile feare, but by their aliall conscience moving or picking them. And how much the longer he deferrith his yre in this life, so much the more grievously will he punish in the life to come, as is to be feared. We therefore in our mindes recalving the long, and as it were the intractate schisme now in the Church of God being very hotte, truly we feare, as by likely hode is to be feared, that it ought to be imputed to all Princes of the Christian Religion before God and man, unto a slothfull negligence, the crueltye of such an error, nourished thus long: Therefore specially because the Cleargie of enerie kingdome, eyther feare, or the blindness of avarice causing them, doe cover this wicked schisme under the veyle of devotion, and holinesse, so that those Princes, to whom the materiall sword is committed, for the defence and safegarde of the Church, about this foresaid schisme, to be utterly extirped, they neyther goe about to helpe any great assistance of courteous perswasion, nor to put in practise the sword for the purpose. Whereupon, having heard often-times of many, and understood

now a good while agoe by letters of the most reverend in Christ, our fathers the 11. Cardinales of your Colledge, and by the report of the reverend in Christ, the Lord Cardinal of Bourdeaux our friend, worthily beloved on the behalfe of the Colledge, comming to the presence of us, and of our first begotten sonne the Prince of Wales, and of the prelates and priors of our Realme, how that not onely hee, but also the Cardinales of your said Colledge, by occasion of the continuance of this schisme, contrary unto the bolue and othe made by your holinesse, to renounce the papacie, have withdrawn from you all their obedience, and doe determine to holde a generall councill in the feast of the Annunciation of our Lady nowe nexte to come at the Citty of Pisa, a place indubde fit, as it is said, and honest, and by your holinesse commended for mete and convenient, as it is affirmed, that this may bee done, especially by force of a certaine obligation for occasion of the schisme to bee extirped by your holinesse, whilset you were yet in minority, of your owne accord, and solemnly entred or made in the conclau with the Cardinales aforesaid, and after that you were reueiled to the papall dignitie, by the subscription of your holy handes, openly renewed and confirmed, as by the viewe of a certaine publike instrument before us and the States abovesaid exhibited it plainly, as hath to us appeared, not knowing how the union of the Church may be come unto by any other way more commodiously. Whereupon the sayde Cardinall hath requested us, upon consideration of the premises, and other reasonable causes by him openly exprest, and in the same letters evidently comprehended, which indubde greatly moued both the consciences of us, and of the said States, that we should take care to employ our counsell and ayde about the premises, to the said Colledge, for the respect of the godlie zeale and loue which thereto we beare, together with other catholike Princes, and that we should send our Ambassadors and prelates of our Realme by themselves, or by procurators to the said councill. We therefore, desirous to shew the zeale and intent which we beare and haue to the same union, and noting with more hede the wholesome and holy intention of the same Colledge in the premises, as other Princes doe note the same, as we here at this present, willing also, so farre as in us lieth to the honour of God, and that we may auoyde the sword edge of his wrath, to doe our partes about the reformation of the same state of the Church, having taken with our said sonne, and also with the prelates and Nobles aforesaid, ripe deliberation, we beseech with all humilitie, and in the bowelles of Iesus Christ, exhorting, doe require your clemencie, whose state and honour upon diuers causes as a devout sonne of the Church, so farre as with God we might, we haue euer embraced, and doe embrace by the expresse and whole assent of the States aforesaid, that as well for the auoyding of the manifest slaughter of the Church, as of the Apostolike see, and for the desirefull conseruation of your estate and honour, and also for the desire of the faithfull procurators that will come to the said place and day together, and with all quietnesse, for the respect of him specially that giueth grace to the humble,

King Henry
writeth to the

that we will vouchsafe to be present at the day and place before mentioned, in the spirit of humbleness, to fulfill the bolue together, and such manner of effectually, as we trust you will. For we hold for certain, that, as we are informed, the Cardinals of both Colledges have come together in one and the same consonance of minde about the premises, and as it were all the Bishops Christians set forth themselves with glad mindes in their fauour and ayde, howsoever they seeke from els-where starting holes, the same Cardinals by Gods helpe assisting them, shall obtaine the effect of such an union: neyther doth it seeme to vs, or to the inhabitants of our Realme expedient, that we should disagree from other Catholike princes in so holy a purpose in any thing, but rather that we should cause our Ambassadors and Bishops of our Realme by themselves or their procurators, as we beleue that other will do the like, that the vniuersall Church may be nourished with the pleasant taste of a wishfull union. Moreover, most blessed father, if the prouidence of the Apostolicke sea would vouchsafe to attend and marke, what great harme & danger is springing by throughout the whole world, not onely of bodies, but also of soules, redeemed by Christs blood, haue hitherto chanced vnder pretence of the continuation of the said Schisme, and specially the slaughter of Christian people, which aboue the number, as men say, of two hundred thousand are perished by the raging of diuers warres that haue risen in sundry partes of the world, and euen now of late, to the number of thirtie thousand, which (by reason of the dissention had vpon the Bishopricke of Leige betwixt two which doe strue and contende, the one in the authoritie of the true Pope, and the other by the authoritie of the antipope) were in slaughter felde (a lamentable thing to be spoken) slayne and destroyed. Truly, the Apostolicke sea would be in great heavinesse of heart, and would rather so sake the honour of the Apostolicall sea, than then to see from henceforth such wicked slaughter to be committed, and would take example of the true mother, who before King Salomon, rather chose to giue place, than that the child should be cut in peces. And albeit by the creation of the nine Cardinals, against your oath (that we may be other mens words) lastly by you made, of the which Act a vehement cause of admiration is rayed, it may in some wise be presumed, that as is like to be thought, your intention doth not tend to the ende of extirping the Schisme, yet God forbid that your holiness should circumspectly be noted of such unconscience of minde by any manner of person, whereupon the last error may be accounted worse than the first, not onely to be execrated of every Christian soule, but also to be expelled with all indignour. These things which we write, of a pure heart and vnfained faith doe procede: and therefore (benigne father) if it please you, let these things with due consideration be weyed (most blessed father) let him incline your heart, and corroborate the same in this holy worke, happily to be executed, who for peace sake, when he was the King of all, endured the forme of a servant. Written vnder our Signet, in our palace at Westminster, the 12. day of Nouember.

Thus hau I set downe the Epistle which the king sent to the Pope, that it may may appeare vnto all men how modestly he attempted to induce the Pope to performe his vow and oath, to the end the fault should not appere to be in him, that the unity of the Church was not reformed.

According to appointment the Cardinals of both Colledges, to wit, of Gregory, and of Bennet met at Wisa, effectually to intreat of the reformation of agreement, where almost all the Bishops of the whole Latin world, met together, and honourable men were elected to helpe the Cardinals in this case, who calling for the grace of the holy spirit, agreed in one, and chose one to be head of the Church, refusing the other two, and called his name Alexander the fifth, and reicard both Gregory and Benedick.

This yere was a great play at the Skinners well, nere vnto Clearchenwell besides London, which lasted eight daies, & was of matter from the creation of the world: there were to see the same, the most part of the nobles and gentles in England: and forthwith after began a copall iusting in Smithfield, betwene the Earle of Somersset and the Seneschall of Denalt, sir John Cornwal, sir Richard of Arundel, and the son of sir John Cheyney against other Frenchmen.

Thomas Bewfort knight sonne to Iohn of Gaunt was made Chancellor, and Henry Scroope was made Treasurer.

Owen Glendowerdew, though he was pardoned by the king at the request of David Holbech Esquire: yet being now diuirt to such misery, that in manner despairing of all comfort, he fled into desert places, and solitary cades, where being destitute of all reliefe and succour, byading to thew his face to any creature, and finally, lacking to sustaine nature, for pure hunger miserably pined away and died.

In a Parliament holden at London, in the Lent season, the knights and burgesses presented to the king a bil in this forme: To the most excellent Lord the king, and all the Nobles in this present Parliament assembled, your faithfull commons humbly do shew, that our Soeraigne Lord the king may haue the temporal possessions and lands, which by the Bishops, Abbots, and Priors are proudly spent and wasted in this Realme, which would suffice to find 150. Carles, 1500. Knights, 6000. Esquires, and 100. hospitals more than now be, &c. But when they went about to declare out of what places these great summes were to be leised, whereby the foresaid states should be endowed, they wanted in their account: wherefore the king commaunded them, that from henceforth they should not presume to moue any such matter.

Sir Robert Vnfeulle, Admiral of England annopied the countreys on the sea coastes of Scotland: for comming into the frith with tenne ships of warre and lying there fourtene daies together, landing euery day on the one side of the river, or on the other, taking prizes, spoiles, and prisoners, notwithstanding the Duke of Albany, and the Earle Douglas were ready there with a great power to resist him: he bent the Galliot of Scotland (being a ship of great account) with many other vessels lying the same time at the Blacknes, ouer against Liffie. At his returne from thence, he brought with him 14. shippes, and many other great prizes of clothes, both wollen and linnen,

This yeere king Henry founded a Colledge at Battale field in Shropshire, in the place where he ouerran Sir Henry Percy and other, suppressed the second of Edward the first, balaced by the yeere fiftie foure pounds, two shillings and two pence,

Iohn Prendergast knight, and William Long, kept the seas from Pirates and Kiuers, so that the passage by sea was quiet, but by the ill willers they were accused of theft and robbery themselves, whereupon the knight toke Sanctuary at Westminster, where he could not haue an house or cottage to hide his head, so that the same was forbidden by the king, so that he was forced to lie in a tent which he let up in the Church porch, and to haue men to watch him in the night season, for feare of his enemy: but his fellow William remained on the sea, untill the Admirall had prepared ships ready, and went in person to fetch him, which he could not do, till he promised him by his fidelitie, that he should haue no harme, which promise notwithstanding, William was imprisoned in the Tower of London.

The Realme of Fraunce being disquieted with the two factions of the Duke of Burgoyne, and the Duke of Dilliance, sonne to the Duke of Dilliance lately slaine (at Paris) by the procurement of the Duke of Burgoyne, the kings of Spaurre, and Aragon, the Dukes of Bituria, and Britaine, the Gascoyners, and Aquitaines, the Earles of Hups and Arminake, and many other ayding the Duke of Dilliance therein. The Duke of Burgoyne, whom the French king, and his eldest sonne, called the gouernour of France, favoured, seeing that the contrary part was very strong, sent ambassadours into England, desiring the kings aide against the Duke of Dilliance, and promised many things, amongst the which, he promised his daughter in marriage to the Prince, and a great summe of gold with her. To whom the king answered: we aduertise you not to fight with your enemy in this case, who sufficeth to bere you, for the death of his father by you procured: but as much as you lieth, endeavour your selfe to mitigate the young mans wrath, and promise to make him reasonable satisfaction according to the aduise of your friends. And if then he will not cease from persecuting you, get you to the strongest place of your dominion, and there gather such power as may be able to put off his force. If then after this, he will make warre against you, you shall haue the suffer occasion to fight with him, and in such case, we will shew you such fauour, as ye haue demanded. Thus there were sent sent ouer to his aide Thomas Earle of Arundell, Gilbert Vmframuile Earle of Angus, the Earle of Arme, Sir Robert Vmframuile knelt to the said Gilbert, Sir Iohn Oldcastle, Lord of Cobham, Sir Iohn Grey, and William Porter with twelue hundred archers, they toke shipping at Dover, and landed at Cluice, from whence they went to Arras, where they found the Duke of Burgoyne, of whom they were ioyfully receiued, and from thence he appointed them to Barlowne, where he assembled a power of his owne subsidies, marched toward Arras, and so to Marquon, where he lodges his Flemings. The Duke of Dilliance had thirty thousand fighting men, drawing towards him, and laide siege about one part thereof, there were many skirmishes, but finally they within the Towne abandoned it, and the Flemings destroyed it. From thence the Duke went to Beolle, and it was destroyed euen as it were in passing by it, from thence they went before Roy in Vermondou, which yielded to them, from thence to Montiden, &c. The Duke of Burgoyne went to Arras, from thence to Roy, from thence to Byetoune, and after to Beaunais, the Earle of Arundell was with him in his ayde with five hundred Englishmen, from thence he went to Poitoulle, from thence to Puilent, and so to Paris. The Duke of Dilliance was lodged at Saint Dionis, and at Saint Clow, with a great power. About the tenth of Nouember, Iohn Duke of Burgoyne issued out of Paris, and went to Saint Clow, where putting his people in order, the Earle of Arundell and his people made a great assault, so that they within were bounden to yield to the will of the English men, wherefore they were bountifully rewarded by the Duke of Burgoyne, and then returned into England.

King Henry created his brother Thomas Bewfort, Earle of Dorset, and his sonne Thomas of Lancaster that was steward of England and Earle of Arundell, he created Duke of Clarence.

A squire of Wales named Riccap Dee, which had long time rebelled against the king, was brought to London, and there halwen, hanged and quartered.

After the feast of All-saints, a Parliament was begun at London. The king caused a new kind of shobles to be made, which were of lesse value then the olde by foure pence in the shoble, so that fiftie shobles should wale a pound Troy weight.

Edward Duke of Poike this yeere began the foundation of the Colledge of Fodringhey in Northamptonshire, for a master, twelue priests, eight Clerkes, and thirtene Choristers, Henry the first gave landes thereunto, of Wypos allans by him suppressed, and mought open d yereley (as was valued at the suppression) foure hundred and nincty pounds, eleven shillings.

Iohn Duke of Burgoyne, hauing now the government, both of the French king and of his Realme, he persecuted the Duke of Dilliance and his complices, that at the last, the same Duke Charles, was forced to fende into Englands certain persons, as his procuratours, to offer in his name unto King Henry, and to his sonnes, certaine conditions, which were were concluded the eight day of May. The said Charles Duke of Brittain sought the King of England to send unto him 8000. men to aide him against the Duke of Burgoyne and his complices, which daily procured the French King to make war upon them.

King Henry curiously entertained the messengers, and upon consideration had of their offers, which seemed to make greatly both for his honour and profite, as Duke of Guyen, he took upon him to succour and defend them against all men, as their Lord and soveraigne, and so sending away the messengers, promised to send them aide very shortly.

King Henry
mind'd a boy-
age into France.

When said the King to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, do you not see howe the Almighty hath disposed for vs, beholde now the acceptable time, let vs goe into France, to winne with small adoe, that which is our right: And surely it was thought he would haue recovered France, at that time, if strength of body had bene answerable to his minde, but being oppressed with great sickness he could not endure, neither to go nor ride, yet he commaunded all those to come to him that held of him by knights service, as if he had meant to go over the sea, but the Lords of the Realme perswaded him to commit that charge unto his second sonne Thomas.

T. Otborne.

In the meane time Henry the Prince, sonne to the King, offended with certaine of his fathers family, which were said to solwe discorde betwixt the father and the sonne, he wrote unto all the parts of the Realme, encouraging himselfe to retell all the practises and imaginations of such detractors, and slanderous people, and to make the matter more manifest to the world, he came to the King his father about the feast of Peter and Paul, with such a number of his friends and wellwillers, as a greater had not bene seen in those daies. He was straightwaies admitted to his fathers presence, of whom this one thing he besought him of, that if such as had accused him might be considered of without accusation, that they might be punished, not according to their deserts, but yet after their lies were pioued against them, they might somewhat taste of that which they had meant, although not to the uttermost: to the which request the King seemed to graunt, but he tolde him, that he must tarry a Parliament, that such might be tried and punished by iudgement of their pères. Thus saith Thomas Otborne. So the same effected (but in more ample manner) writeth the translator of Titus Lilius (who wrote an history of Henry the first, and dedicated it to Henry the first,) as he was informed by the Earle of Wyndesore, an eye witness of the same, as followeth: During the sickness of the King (saith he) some cruel disposed people laboured to make dissention betwixt the King, and the prince his sonne, by reason whereof, and by the Aides of youth which he exercised more then meanely, and for the great recourse of people unto him, of whom his Court was at all times more abundant than his fathers, the King suspected that he would presume to blurge the Crowne. he being alive, which suspicious jealousie was occasion, that he in part withheld his affection, and singular loue from the Prince: but when the Noble Prince was aduertised of his fathers jealousie, and mistrust, by some his secret friends of the Kings counsaile, counsaile, he disguised himselfe in a gowne of blue satten, or damaske, wrought full of oplet holes, and at every oplet the needle wherewith it was made, hanging still by the like: and about his arme hee wore a dogges collar set full of S.S. of golde, and the tirets of the same also of fine golde. Thus strangely apparelled, with a great company of Lords, and other Noble men of his court, he came to the King his father, who at that time lay at Westminster, where at his comming (by commaundement of him) not one of his company aunced himselfe further then the fire in the hall, notwithstanding that they were greatly and ofte desired to the contrarye, by the Lords and great estates of the Kings Court: and this they did not onely because the weather was colde, but because the Prince had so commaunded them, to give the lesse occasion of mistrust to the King his father, but seee himselfe onely accompanied of the Kings household passed forth to the King his father, to whom (after due salutation) he desired to shew the intent of his minde in secret manner. When the King caused himselfe to be borne in his chaire into his secret chamber (because he was diseased and might not goe) where in the presence of three or foure persons, in whom the King had most confidence, he commaunded the Prince to shewe the effect of his minde: When the Prince kneeling downe before his father, said to him these words, Most redoubted Lord and father, I am this time come to your presence, as your liegeman, and as your sonne naturall, in all things to obey your grace as my soveraigne Lord and father. And whereas I understand ye haue mee suspect of my behaviour against your grace, and that ye feare I would blurpe your crowne against the pleasure of your highnesse, of my conseruation your grace knoweth that if ye were in feare of any man, of what estate soever he were, my dutie were to the endangering of my life to punish that person, thereby to raze that sore from your heart: and then how much rather ought I to suffer death to bring your grace from the feare that ye haue of me that am your naturall sonne, and your liegeman. And to that intent I haue this day by confession of my finnes and receiuing the Sacrament, prepared my selfe, and therefore most redoubted Lord and father, I beseech you in the honour of God, for the easing of your heart, heretofore your knes to lica me with this dagger, and at that worde with all reuerence hee deliuered to the King his dagger, saying, my Lord and father, my life is not so desirous to me, that I would live one day that should bee to your displeasure, nor I couer not so much my life as I doe your pleasure and welfare, and in your thus doing, here in the presence of these Lords, and tosoze God at the day of iudgement I clerely forgive you my death. At these words of the Prince, the King taken with compassion of heart, rask from him the dagger, and embracing the Prince kissed him, & with effusion of teares said unto him, My right deere and hartly beloued sonne, it is of truth that I had you partly suspect, and as I now perceive, undeserued on your partie: but seeing this your humilitie and faithfulness, I shall neither slay you, nor from henceforth haue you any more in mistrust, for no report that shall be made unto me, and thereof I assure you upon mine honour. Thus by his great wisdom was the wrongfull knighting

gaut aide to the Duke of Buliance, against the Duke of Burgoigne.

John Prendergast with thirtie shippes keeping the sea, took wimes and other victuals from y<sup>e</sup> French, which though it pleased y<sup>e</sup> Noble men little, yet it did great ease to the common people, who had all such things farre the better cheape. About the 19. of August King Henry by determination of the counsell, sent his second sonne Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of Yorke, and Thomas Earle of Dorset, and manie valiant men, with a strong power to helpe the Duke of Buliance, against the Duke of Burgoigne, & euer all the other were returned, which a while agoe went ouer with the Earle of Arundell to ayde the Duke of Burgoigne, so that many men marvelled at the sudden change, that in so small a time the Englishmen did aide the two contrary parts: notwithstanding the Nobles went forward and arrived in Normandie, where when the Duke of Buliance did not meete them at the time appointed, they bent his townes, and spoiled the countrie, taking many holdes: at length, though late, the Dukes of Clarence, and Buliance met and talked together, and the matter was so entreated of betwene them, that our men should desist from ranging through the countrie, and refraine from robbetrie, which when our men had graunted, they departed into Aquitaine, to winter there, and the Duke of Buliance went home to his countrie.

An. reg. 14.

About this time the Lord Helle Marshall of Fraunce with manie other Noble men, and men of armes, to the number of 4000. besieged a certaine holde in Aquitaine, which was in the keeping of John Blunt Knight, who with 300. that aided him, put to flight the whole armie of the Frenchmen, and took of them 12. men of name, and other gentlemen to the number of 120. and amongst other the said Monsier de Helle Marshall of Fraunce was one, who was sent ouer into England, and put in the Castle of Wiltshir in Cambridgeshire, but escaping thence, he got ouer into Fraunce, where he serued the Duke of Buliance, at the battaile of Agencourt, and was there slaine.

King Henry kept his Christmasse at his mannor of Eltham, being so sore sicke, that sometime men thought that he had been dead: notwithstanding it pleased God that he recovered strength a little, and as softly as he could, he celebrated that feast of Christmasse.

A Parliament
at London.

After Christmasse hee called the Nobles of England to a parliament at London, which began the morrow after Candlemasse day, but he liued not to the ende thereof, for he died shortly after in a chamber belonging to the abbot of Westminster, called Jerusalem, whereby the prophesie was fulfilled, as he said, that he should die there. In the time of whole languishing the King gaue to the Prince his sonne diuers notable ordinances and instructions, that not onely of him, but of euery Prince are to be holden and followed: among the which ordinations one is this: The King lieng grievously diseased, called before him the Prince his sonne, and said unto him: My sonne, I feare me soze, after my departure from this life, some discord shall grow grow and arise betwene thee, and thy brother Thomas Duke of Clarence, whereby the Realme may be brought to destruction and miserie, for I knowe thou both to be of great stomacke and courage. Wherefore I feare, that hee through his high minde will make some enterpryse against thee, intending to surse upon thee, which I knowe thy stomacke may not abide easily. And for dead bereof as oft as it is in my remembrance, I soze repent mee, that euer I charged my selfe with the crowne of this Realme. To these wordes of the King, the prince answered thus: Right redoubted lord and father, to the pleasure of God your grace shall long continue with vs, and rule vs both: but if God haue so provided that euer I shall succeede you in this Realme, I shall be no; and loue my brethren aboue all men, as long as they be to me true, faithfull and obedient, as to their soueraigne Lord: but if any of them fortune to conspire or rebell against me, I assure you, I shall assuredly execute iustice vpon one of them, as I shall vpon the worst and most simplest person within this your Realme.

The King hearing this answer, was therewith maruellously reioyced in his minde, and said: My deere and welbeloued Sonne, with this answer thou hast deliuered mee of a great and ponderous agony: and I beseech thee, and vpon my blessing charge thee, that like as thou hast sayde, so thou minister iustice equally, and in no wise suffer not them that bee oppressed long to call vpon thee for iustice, but redresse oppressions, and indifferently and without delay, so; no perswasion of flatterers, or of them that be partiall, or such as to haue their hands replenished with giftes, deferre not iustice till to morrow, if that thou mayest do iustice this day, least (peraduenture) God doe iustice on thee in the meane time, and take from thee thine authoritie: remember that the wealth of thy body, and thy soule, and of thy realme, resteth in the execution of iustice; and do not thy iustice so, that thou be called a Tyrant, but vse thy selfe meanelly betwixt iustice and mercy in those thinges that belong to thee: And betwene parties do iustice truly and extreemely, to the consolation of thy poore Subiectes that suffer iniuries, and to the punishment of them that be extortioners and doers of oppressions, that other thereby may take example: and in thus doing, thou shalt obtaine the fauour of God, and the loue and feare of thy Subiectes, and therefore also thou shalt haue thy Realme more in tranquillitie and rest, which shall bee occasion of great prosperitie within thy Realme, which English men naturally desire: so; so long as they haue wealth and riches, so long shalt thou haue obedience: and when they be poore, then they be alwayes ready at euery motion to make insurrections, and it causeth them to rebell against their Soueraigne Lord: for the nature of them is such, rather to feare losing of their goodes and worldly substance, than the jeopardding of their liues. And if thou thus keepe them in subjection mixed with loue and feare, thou shalt haue the most peaceable and fertile Countrey, and the most loving, faithfull, and manly people of the worlde, which shall bee cause of no small feare to thine aduersaries. My sonne, when I shall please God to call me to the way decreed for euery worldly Creature, to thee (as my sonne and heire)

I must leaue my crowne and my Realme, which I would not to take bainely, and as a man elate in pride, and reioyced in worldly honour, but thinke that thou art more oppressed with charge, to pursue for euery person within the Realme, than exalted in baine honour of the world. Thou shalt bee exalted vnto the crowne, for the wealth and conseruation of the Realme; and not for thy singular commoditie and auaile: My sonne, thou shalt bee a minister to thy Realme to keepe it in tranquillitie and defend it.
Like as the heart in the midst of the body is principall and chiefe thing in the body, and serueth to couer and desire that thing that is most necessarie to euery of thy members, so (my sonne) thou shalt bee amongst thy people as chiefe and principall of them to minister, imagine and acquire those things that may be most beneficiall for them. And then thy people shall be obedient to thee, to ayde and succour thee, and in all things to accomplish thy commaundements, like as thy members labour, euery one of them in their office, to acquire and get that thing that the heart desireth, and as thy heart is of no force and impotent without the ayde of thy members, so without thy people, thy Realme is nothing. My sonne, thou shalt feare and dread God aboue all things, and thou shalt loue, honour and worship him with all thy heart, thou shalt attribute and ascribe to him all things wherein thou seest thy selfe to bee well fortunate, be it victorie of thine enemies, loue of thy friends, obedience of thy subiects, strength and adiuuence of body, honour, riches, or fruitfull generations, or any other thing whatsoe-uer it be that chanceth to thy pleasure. Thou shalt not imagine that any such thing should fortune to thee, by thine aye, nor by thy desert, but thou shalt thinke that all cometh onely of the goodnesse of the Lord. Thus thou shalt with all thine heart, prayse, honour, and thanke God for all his benefites that he giueth vnto thee. And in thy selfe eschew all baine gloire and elation of heart, following the wholesome counsell of the Psalmist, which saileth, Non nobis Domine, non nobis, sed nomini tuo da gloriam, which is to say, Not vnto vs Lord, not vnto vs, but to thy holy name be giuen laud and praise. These and many other admonishments and doctrines this victorious King gaue vnto this Noble Prince his Sonne, who with esteem followed the same, after the death of his father: whereby hee obtained grace of our Lord to attaine to great victories and many glorious and incredible conquests, through the helpe and succour of our Lord, whereof he was neuer destitute. The King his father dying in his ende, after due thanks giuen, and applications made to God, gaue his benediction to the Prince his sonne, and so passed to God his spirit, the xx. of March, which was then midlent Sunday. Anno 1412. after the account of the Church of England, the yere of his age 46. whē he had reigned 13. yeres, five moneths lacking 10. Dayes. His body was conueyed by water to feuerham, and from thence by land to Canterbury, and there buried by the Lady Mary his first wife, in the monastery of Christ Church, vnder a pillar in the south Aile. This King Henry, with Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterbury had been great benefactors to this Church, in building a good part of the body thereof thereof another he had thus by Mary daughter to Humfrey Bohune Earle of Hereford and Southampton, Henry that succeeded him, Thomas Duke of Clarence, John Duke of Bedford, Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, Blanch Countesse of Bauerre, and Philip Prince of Denmarke: so by loan his second wife he had no issue.

King Henry the fifth.

Henry the fifth bozne at Monmouth, began his reigne the xx. day of March in the yere 1412. This Prince exceeded the meane stature of men, he was beautifull of visage, his necke long, body slender and leane, and his bones small: neuertheless he was of marvellous great strength, and passing swift in running, insomuch that he with two other of his Lordes, without hounds, bow, or other engine, should take a wilde bucke or Doe in a large parke: he studied at Driford in the newe colledge, vnder the government of Henry Bewford his uncle on the fathers side, then Chauncellour of Driford, after Bishop of Winchester: hee delighted in songs, meters, and musickall instruments, insomuch that in his Chappell amongst other his pinate prayers, he used our Lordes prayer, certaine psalmes of David, with diuers hymnes and canticles, all which I haue seene translated into herotcall English meter, by Iohn Lydgate Poete of Bury. He liued somewhat insolently, insomuch that whilst his father liued, being accompanied with some of his young Lordes and gentlemen, he would waite in disguised aray for his owne recreations, and distresse them of their money: and sometimes at such enterprises both he and his company were surely beaten: and when his receivers made to him their complaints how they were robbed in their coming vnto him, hee would giue them discharge of so much money as they had lost: and besides that, they should not depart from him without great rewards for their trouble and veration, especially they should be rewarded that best had resisted him and his company, and of whom he had receiued the greatest and most strokes, and for example Sir Thomas Eliot writeth thus. The renowned Prince King Henry the fifth, during the life of his father, was noted to be fierce, and of wanton courage. It hapned that one of his seruants, whom he fauored, was for reison by him committed, arraigned at the Kings bench, whereof the Prince being aduertised, and incensed by tight persons about him, in furious rage came hastily to the bar, where his seruant stood as prisoner, and commaunded him to be vnbound and set at libertie, whereat all men were abashed, referred the chiefe Justice, who humbly exhorted the Prince to be ordered according to the ancient lawes of the Realme, or if he would haue him saved from the rigor of the lawes, that he should obtaine if he might of the King his father, his gracious pardon, whereby no law or iustice should be derogate.

Henry the fifth.

With the which answer the prince nothing appeased, but rather more inflamed, indurend himselfe to take away his servant. The Judge, considering the perillous example and inconueniencie that might thereby ensue, with a valiant spirit & courage commaunded the prince upon his allegiance to leaue the prisoner, and to departe his way: with which commaundement, the prince being set all in a furie, all chased, and in a terrible manner came vp to the place of iudgment, men thinking that he would haue slaine the Judge, or haue done to him some damage, but the Judge sitting still, without moving, declaring the maiestie of the Kings place of iudgment, and with an assured bold countenance, had to the prince these wordes following:
Sir, remember your selfe, I keepe here the place of the king your soveraigne lord and father, to whom you owe double obedience, wherefore chisones in his name I charge you desist off your wilfulness and unlawfull enterpryse, I from henceforth giue god example to those which hereafter shall be your proper subiects: and now for your contempt and disobedience, goe you to the prison of the kings bench, whereunto I commit you, and remaine you there prisoner untill the pleasure of the king your father be further knowne. With which wordes, being abaied, and also wondering at the marvellous gran-tie of that worshipfull Justice, the prince laying his weapon aparte, doing reuerence, departed and went to the kings bench as he was commaunded.
Whereat his seruants disdaining, came & shewed to the king all the whole affaire. Whereat hee a while trowping, after, as a man all raniued with glories, holding his hands and eyes towards heauen, abrayd with a lowde voice: O mercifull God! how much am I bounde to thy infinite goodnes, especially for that thou hast giuen me a Judge, who feareth not to minister iustice, and also a sonne, who can suffer semblably and obey iustice. Some (saith Thomas Eliot) were a man may behold thre persons with thy memory: first a Judge, who being a subiect, feared not to execute iustice on the eldest sonne of his soveraigne Lord, and by the order of nature his succedour.
Also a prince, and sonne and heire of the k. In the middelt of his folly, more considered his euill example, and the Judges conscience in iustice, than his owne estate or wilfull appetite. Thirdly, a noble king and wise father, who contrary to the custome of parents, reioiced to see his sonne, and the beire of his crowne, to be for his disobedience by his subiect corrected: wherefore
I conclude, that nothing is more honorabell or to be desired in a prince, or noble man, than placability, as contrariwise nothing is so detestable, or to be feared in such a one as wrath and cruel malignitie. Thus much of his youthfulness: but after the decease of his father (as he that should succeed in the kingdome) he called to him a certaine monke of holy conuersation, to whom he confessed himselfe of all his offences, trespasses, and insolencies past, and after his counsaile in all things, at that time he reioined his life and manners, so that after his fathers decease was neuer no youth or wildnes that might hane place in him, but all his acts were soone changed into grauitie and discretion.

So this noble prince (by assent of the parliament) all the estates of the realme

realme, after thre daies, offered to doe fealties before hee was crowned or had solemnized his oth, well and iustly to gouerne the common weale, which offer, before was neuer found to be made to any prince of England.

The king gaue them all generally thanks, for their good minde to wardes him, and therewith exhorted them to the zeale of the publike prosperitie and honour of the realme. Many man had offended him he pardoned their trespas, and desired hartly of God, that if he should rule and doe all things well to the honour of God and the prosperous communitie of the Realme, that then God would suffer him to be crowned: but if his fortune should be to do other wise, that then God should take him to his merite, and suffer him rather to be buried than to enterpryse the charge of the Realme.

The ninth day of Aprill he was crowned at Westmynster, by Thomas Arrindel archbishop of Canterburie, after which coronation, he called vnto him all those yong lords & gentlemen that were the followers of his yong auncle, to euery one of whom he gaue rich and bounteous gifts, and then commaunded that as many as would change their manners as he intended to do should abide with him in his court, and to all that would perseuer in their former light conuersation, he gaue expresse commaundement vpon paine of their heads, neuer after that day to come in his presence.

Hauing auoyded those yong and suspicious company from his presence, he then attended to ghostly and worldly busines. And first he commaunded to exche his royal manor that then was called Bohene (and now Richmond) he also founded two monasteries vpon the Thames (not far from the said manor royall) the one of the religion of the Cartusers, which he named West-hem: the other of religious men and women, of St. Brigets order, and that he named Sion. In this house there were 60. sisters 13. priests 4. deacons and 8.
lay brethren, those neuer wore linnen but wollen, which two conents had but

The same time the fauourers of Wicliffes doctrine, did naye by sedules upon the Church doores of London, which sedules contayned that there was an hundred thousand men ready to rise against al such as could not away with their lea, for indeed (saith Walsingham) they trusted to the force, powder, and wit of a certaine knight called John Olde-castell of Coling in Kent, who for the honour of a marriage, which he had contracted with a kinswoman of a nobleman, the Lord Cobham, obtayned the name of the said Lordship, or seignorie of Cobham: this John was a strong man, and a metely good man of war, but he was a most peruerse enemy to the state of the Church at that time. In a pynode therefore being holden at London, the said Sir John Olde-castell, for diuers points touching the sacrament, befoze the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Winchester and other, was comulcated, and committed to the tower of London, out of the which he brake ouer the wals in the night, and escaped about the feast of Simon and Jude.

Conspiracie against the King.

The King keeping his Christmalle at his manor of Eltham (seuen miles from London) was warned that certaine had conspired against him, either to haue taken, or sodainly slaine him and his brethren on Twelfth day at night, whereupon the King sent word to the Mayor of London, that he should arrest all suspicious persons: the Mayor therefore caused every Alderman in his ward to kepe great watch, and about twine of the clocke at night went himselfe with a strong power, to the signe of the Axe with out Bishops Gate, where they apprehended the man of the house called John Burgate carpenter and seuen other, one of them being an Esquire belonging to Sir John Olde-castell, and sent them to Eltham, where they conferred befoze the King that they were confederate with Sir John Olde-castell, to fight against him and his Lordes in Saint Giles field about Holbozne. On the morrow after the Twelfth day, the King remoued pynly to Westminster, and because he had heard tell that the rude peoples intent was, if they did pvenale, first to destroy the monasteries of Westminster, Saint Albons, and Saint Pauls, and all the houses of friers in London: being minded to prevent such a mischief, contrary to the mindes of all that were about him, went into the field when it was little past midnight, with a great armie, for he was warned that Sir John Olde-castell, and Sir Roger Aston, would be in the same field on the next day following with 25000. people: and the same night were taken more then fourescore men in armor of the same faction, for many that came from far, not knowing the Kings campe to be in the field, were taken by the same and sent to prison, and being demanded whom they sought, made answer the Lord Cobham. The rumour of this, comming to the eares of the capitaines that were the Kings enemies, they were wonderfully discouraged, and that the more, because none came to them out of London, from whence they looked for many thousands, whereupon they fled to saue themselves, and the Kings men following them toke some, and slew other, but where their capitaine was become would not be knowne, notwithstanding that the King by proclamation promised to whomsoever could bring him with a 1000. markes besides liberties to the Citie and townes that would disclose him, but there was not one found that would betray him, so greatly was he favoured. Also the King being tolde of an ambushment gathered in Harengay parke, sent thither certaine Lordes, who toke many, among whom, was one William Mure, a rich maultman, or buyer of Wunstaple, who had his two boyes trapped with golde following him, and a paire of gilt spurs in his bosome, for he thought to haue ben made Knight on the morrow by the hands of Sir John Olde-castell. The xix. of January, 69. of them were condemned of treason at Westminster, and on the morrow after 37. of them were by a lawe from the Tower of London to Belegate, and so to Saint Giles, and there in a place called Fickets field, were all hanged, and seauen of them bzent gallowes and al. The xix. of January, were by a lawe and hanged Sir John Beuerley Byleff, John Burgate carpenter, a terti wyter in Saint Johns Stræte, and a glouer on London Bridge, and thoztyfaster, Sir Roger Aston Knight was taken, who on the tenth of februarye, was by a lawe, hanged, and buried under the Gallowes.

The twentieth of februarye, deceased Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury. Henry Chicheley borne at Wygham ferris in Northampton shire succeeded, being translated from Saint Davids in Wales.

The King taking compassion upon Henry Percie a young man (who by his grandfather Henry Percie Earle of Northumberland, was carried into Scotland, after the death of his father, who was slaine in the battell of Sherburne, when this young man was then but a child) commaunded them that were of his kinred, and nearest friends, to sollicite for his reclainging home againe out of Scotland, minding not onely to honour him by calling him home againe, but also to make him Earle of Northumberland.

King Henry kept his Lent in the Castle of Beaulieu, and caused an harber there to be plantid in the marsh, for his pleasure, amongst the thorns and bushes: where a fore had harbored, which fore he killed, being a thing then thought to prognosticate, that he should expell the craftie deceit of the French King, besides which also he there builded a most pleasant place, and caused it to be termed Le pleasant maries, or the pleasant marsh. King Henry the 8. becomed great rest in repairing Beaulieu Castle, caused the said banqueting house to be taken downe, and part of it to be set up in the base court at Beaulieu. In this Lent season, whilest the King lay at Beaulieu, messengers came to him from the Dolphin of France named Charles, with a present of Paris balles, for him to play withall, but the King wrote to him, that he would shortly send to him London balles, with the which he would breake downe the roofes of houses.

King Henry, after that all dissentions and commotions in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales were appeased, so that concord and unitie were made and established in all parts of the Kings dominion, the King deliberated upon the recovery of the Realme of France, which by iust title of inheritance was defended unto him, and at that time was inturiously withheld from him by the French King. And because he would nothing procede against the pleasure of God, he first demanded aduise, and counsell of all the discrete and learned men as well of the spiritualtie in both Uniuersities, as of the temporallie through all his Realme, if he might without offence to God lawfully recover by armes his Realme of France. Who after long deliberation thereupon among them had, of one assent, made report unto the King, that in so iust a quarrell he might lawfully vse armes, if he might by none other wayes attaine his purpose. and right of inheritance: whereupon the King, in all things insuing the aduise of his Counsell, sent Ambassadors into France, there to demand his right in the Counsell of the French, and if peradventure they would deny to accomplish his desire, his Ambassadors should giue them knowledge that he would seke his right by armes. These Ambassadors were honorably receiued in France, and for answer of their message there denounced, they brought with them nothing to report, except that within short time, the Frenchmen would send their Ambassadors into England, to declare their intent to the King of England upon his demand.

Shortly after arrived in England W. Bourcier Archbishop of Bourges, the Earle of Mandosme, Pierce Frennell Bishop of Lieur, the Lords Iury, and of Braquimount, Walter Cole secretarie to the French King, Ambassadors of France, these were men of great authority: amongst them the Archbishop was the chiefe, who in like manner were here receiued with great honor. At a time limited, the Archbishop of Bourges proposed their message, and in the ende, offered to the King lands, and a great sum of money with the daughter of the King their master in marriage, so that he would desist from that warre that he then intended to make in France. After which proposition and offer made, the Ambassadors dined with the King: and at another day limited, the King of England, by the mouth of the Archbishop of Canterbury made to them answer, to this effect: The proffers made, he said, were not sufficient recompence for the Kings rightfull inheritance in France, vniuersally detained from him, wherefore for a small answer, he would demand his right by force of armes in the best manner that he could, and that as briefly as to him were possible. When the Archbishop of Bourges, after licence obtained, said: O King, with reverence be it spoken, thinkest thou vniuersally to depose the most Christian King of France? Thinkest thou that he hath offered to thee these lands and money, with his owne daughter to be thy wife, for any dread he hath of thee: nay not so, but the same our Lord, indued with pittie, as the lover of peace, hath made to thee this offer, to the intent, that innocent blood be not spilt and destroyed: and therefore by the aide of God, he shall at all times defend himselfe, his lands, and subiects, from thy vnjust inuasions. And as to us that be his Ambassadors, we desire thee, to make to us safe conduct without damage through thy realme, and also that thou wisse to our soveraign Lord, this thine answer entirely vnder thy seale, and signe manuell: which request the King granted vnto them, and they returned into France.

In the month of May a Parliament was begun at Leicester, in the beginning whereof, there was a poster of the tower of London, drawn, hanged, and headed, whose head was sent to London, and set ouer the tower gate, for consenting to one that brake out of the tower, named Whillocke.

In this Parliament John the Kings brother was made Duke of Bedford, Humphrey his brother Duke of Gloucester, and Richard brother to the Duke of York was made Earle of Cambridge. The priories allians in England were giuen to the King, all their possessions to remaine to the King and to his heirs for euer, except land graunted to the colledge of Fodinghay, and after all these priories were suppressed to the number of more than one hundred houses. Gold waights were appoynted.

In this Parliament were deuised diuers meanes to gather money of all the commons of England, therewith to sustaine the Kings wars, and to make prouision of all things necessarie for the same, the sum whereof, leuied and gathered of the spiritualtie and temporallie amounted to the sum of 300. thousand markes English. And herewith order was taken to gather a great host of men through all the Kings dominions.

On Mary Magdalens day, in London, John Nianfer Esquire, with nine of his men, set vpon and slue John Tibbey clarke, Archdeacon of Huntingdon, and Chancelor to Quene Ioane, late wife to Henry the fourth, for the which fact, the said Esquire, and foure of his men fled to S. Annes Church within Aldersgate, where they were mured by wish word, and watched day and night till the 21. of August, on the which day, they forswore the land, and passed through the citie towards Calice in their shirts and breeches, each of them hauing a Crosse in his hand, and a purse about his necke, &c.

the second time out of France, declared to the King, that the Frenchmen did but vie fraud and deceits, wherefore the King being stirred up unto anger, and also knowing well the discord betwixt the great Lords of France, whereof hath somewhat been said before, determined to abate their scorninges, and to teach them to understand their folly, in a waking of a sleeping dog: and forthwith, the King commaunded all the prelates, and nobles of the Realme, to come to London, there to treat of weighty affaires concerning the Realme, at the which time, the Archbishop of Canterbury held a great councill, in the which were chosen certaine of the clergie of England, to goe to the generall Councell that should be holden at Constance, a citie of Germany, and so there were sent the Bishops of Salisbury, Bath, and Hereford, and with them the Abbot of Westminster, and the Prior of Worcester, and many other wise men, in company of the Earle of Warwick, whose presence did them much honour.

In that councell was put dolone thre schismaticall popes, to wit, Balchazar Cossa late Pope, John the 22. of that name: Peter de Luna, called Clement the 13. and Egellus Coraris, called Gregory 12. which being done, one Otto Colombe a noble Roman boyne, was elected to the papacie, and was named Martin the first.

In the meane space, the King like a prudent Prince thought good to take order for the resisting of the Scots, if according to their old maner, they should attempt any thing in his absence, and therefore he appointed the Earle of Westmerland, the Lord Scrope, the baron Greystocke, Sir Robert Umfraville, and divers other ballant capitaines to keepe the frontiers and marches of Scotland: which Sir Robert Umfraville on the day of Mary Magdalen, fought with the Scots at the towne of Cuderling, having in his company only 300. archers, and 140. men of armes, where after a long conflict, he slew of his enemies 60. and took 360. prisoners, and put to flight 1000. and more, whom he followed in chase about 12. miles, and so laden with preyes and prisoners, returned to the Castle of Roxborough, whereof he was then capitaine. When the king had gathered his naule together, appointed his archers, and men of armes, prepared his engins, and all things necessarie for the wars, he leaning behind him for government of the Realme, the Quene his mother in law, he commaunded all that should goe with him, to be ready against the feast of Saint Iohn Baptiste, and to mete him at Hampton.

The eighteenth day of June, King Henry with many Lords and others rode from London towards South-hampton, the spallors, Aldermen, and craftes of the Citie accompanying him on his way to the towne of Kingsstone upon Thames: whilst the King late at Southampton, where he abode for his retinue and thusse longing to the wars, fastings, prayers unto God, and almes debes of the King, and other supplications of the clergie and commons had before, he mustered his universall hoste upon the sea bankes. In the which muster or view, on the last of Iulie was discovered a great and perillous conspiracie against him by three Lords, in whom of all the rest, hee put greatest trust and confidence, the chiefest of them was

Henry Scrope, Lord treasurer: the second Richard Earle of Cambridge, brother to Edward Duke of York, and Sir Thomas Grey, a knight of the North, these had made Edmond Earle of March to sweare upon a booke, not to disclose their counsell, and then tolde him that they thought to slay the King, and to make the sayde Edmond King, the which if hee refused to take upon him, they would slay him: whereupon, the Earle prayed them to give him one houres space to take advisement what was best to doe, which being graunted, the Earle went secretly and tolde the King thereof, who caused them forthwith to be apprehended, and brought before him, where they confessed the treason, for the which on the first of August they were arraigned in the Kings presence, and the same day all thre beheaded. The Earle was buried heade and all, but the other heads were sent, the one to York, the other to Newcastle upon Tyne, and there set upon a pole. It is to be noted, that whatsoever hath bene reported of the confession of the Earle of Cambridge, certaine it is that hee was indighted by the name of Richard Earle of Cambridge of Conesburgh in the Countie of York Knight, and with him Thomas Grey of Iyeton in the Countie of Northumberland Knight, for that they the twentieth day of Iulie in the third yere of King Henry the first, at Southampton, and divers other places within the Realme had conspired together, with a power of men to them associate, without the Kings licence to have led away the Lord Edmond Earle of March into Wales, and then to have procured him to take upon him the government of the Realme, in case that King Richard the second were dead: and here with had purposed to set forth a proclamation there in Wales, in the name of the sayde Earle of March, as heire of the crowne, against King Henry by the name of Henry of Lancaster the usurper, to the ende that by such meanes they might have the more number of the Kings liege people unto the sayd Earle. And further to have conspired a banner of the armes of England, and a certaine crowne of Spaine set upon a pallet, and laid in gage to the sayde Earle of Cambridge, by the King together with the sayd Earle of March into the parts of Wales above said. And further that the sayd Earle of Cambridge, and Sir Thomas Gray had appointed certaine of the Kings liege people to repaire into Scotland, and to bring from thence, one Thomas Trumpington, also an other resembling in shape, favour and countenance King Richard, and Henry Percy together with a great multitude of people to fight with the King, and him to destroy in open felde: besides this, that they had meant to win certaine Castles in Wales, and to keepe them against the King, and many other treasons they had contrived, as by the indictment was specified, to the ende they might destroy the King and his brethren, the Dukes of Bedford, and of Gloucester, and other the great Lords and peeres of the Realme. And Henry Scrope of Spalham of flardest, in the Countie of York, was likewise indicted, as consenting to the premises, so that it appeareth their purpose was well enough then perceived, although happily not much divulged abroad, for consultations thought necessarie to have it kept hush.

King Henry having assembled his hoste at Southampton, as is aforesaid, to the intent to passe the seas, for conueyance of his bowels and artillery, were prouided and brought thither for his wages out of Holland and Zealand ships, hulkes, and other vessels to such a number, that his whole nauie at his departing from the land amounted to sixtente hundred sailles.

Normandie.

On the xiiii. of August the King took shipping, and entred the sea, and on the xliiii. at night arrived at Bebecaur in Normandie, which is betwixte Herefete and Humfete, of whose conuening, all the Cities, and Castles of those parts being advertised, were stricken with great feare. The King, the Dukes of Clarence and of Gloucester his brethren, the Duke of Poike his uncle, the Carles, Barons, Knights, gentlemen, and souldiers, cast their ankers there, and took lande without any resistance, and the King forthwith falling to the ground upon his knees devoutly prayed to God that to his honor he would giue him iustice of his enemies. He had at his landing in his hoste six thousand speares, and xliiii. thousand footemen, besides gunners, and other engineers, artificers, and laborers, of whom the king had great abundance.

The King gaue to diuers gentlemen the order of knight-hood, and assigned the bearing of his standards and banners to such men, as he knew to be of great strength and prowesse. All thing being set in good order and array, the King with all his host ascended to the top of an high hill there nigh, and there be rested the next day.

On the 16. day of August, the Duke of Clarence, leader of the forewarde in good ordinance, entred his iourney toward a towne called Herefete, distant from Bebecaur scarcely thre leagues, where he lodged his host in a field before the towne. The King at his coming, lodged himselfe nigh to the first warde, not farre from the towne in a plaine field. The Earle of Suffolke, Michaell de Poole, chiefe taine of the rereward, lodged on the other side before the towne. Other noble men that had the conduct of the two wings, lodged them, one on the right hand, the other on the left hand of the whole hoste. When the King commaunded to be proclaimed through the host, that upon paine of death, all Churches should be kept inuiolate, vnspoyled and vnbarmed, that no man should presume to take any vessel or ornament whatsoever from the Church, that they should not hurt any man of the church, whom they found without armour, nor any woman or childe, and then forthwith were sent to the towne, men of armes in great number, to see the situation thereof, who shortly returned with a great pray of cattell, and informed the King of all his demands.

Herefete is the key of the sea of all Normandie, and is situated upon the sea side, by the riuer of Seane, betwixt two hills, and through the middle thereof runneth a riuer, which not farre from the same towne entreteth into the Seane, and from thence, both those riuers in one descend into the sea, whereas a great and goodly haven is, belonging to the same towne, which haven is garnished with the defence of two faire and strong towers: and in the same haven a right great nauie of shippes may ride in safetie: and if the inhabitants of this towne inclose and keepe within the towne the course of the foresaid riuer by their sluices, as they may right well doe, then the riuer riseth without the towne so high, that it so encloseth all entrees to the walls, so that no man may approach the towne on that part. This towne is also defended with high and thicke walls and towers, and is also enuironed with broad and deepe ditches. To this towne also belongeth onely two gates for entrees, the one called Calturances, the other Mostrouillier. In this towne, besides the inhabitants thereof, for the defence of the same, were fower hundred men of armes deputed in garrison, amongst whom were these Lords, Lord Discouteuile, chiefe captaine of the towne, Lord Blauile, Lord Haqueuile, Lord Harmanuile, Lord Eancourt, Lord Gailard Bos, and diuers other Lords and men expert in warre. These Lords caused their people to breake downe the causeway betwixt Mostrouillers and Herefete, to impaire and hinder the Englishmens passage. Fewer thelesse the Englishmen at their coming, by the good conduct of their King, were not so fore oppressed, by breaking of the causeway, but that they came so nigh as to lay their siege before the towne. When the King and all his host was come before the towne, all his tents and pavilions were set up in the plaine field, wherewith that part of the towne was intirely inclosed: he also caused his great hall to be set upon an hill, at the backe of his host, to serue as a Church, there to honor and serue God. This done the King commaunding the Duke of Clarence to assaige the towne, he endozed to conuey his people ouer the riuer, in the passage whereof, he had a great skirmish with the inhabitants of the towne, but at the last his aduersaries being put to flight, recoped within the walls. The Duke conueyed ouer the riuer all his ward and companie, and because the riuer diuided the kings camp from the Dukes, they ordained a ready and sure passage ouer the same riuer betwixt both the camps, to the keeping whereof, certaine Gentlemen were appointed, so that their enemies might not endamage them neither by water nor land.

In this meane time befell a great misadventure to the frenchmen that were besieged, for the gun-powder and shot that was sent vnto them by the french King, was incountred vpon the sea by the Englishmen, and taken, to their great displeasure and damage.

Enguerrant.

The King gaue the charge of the fildes to his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloucester. On the same side the riuer that the King lay, was the Duke of Poike, high Constable of England lodged with his band. When every man was placed, the towne was so strenghtly assaiged, that all entrees and issues of the towne were stopped, so that they of the towne were in dispaire to haue any succour from the Realme of France. Many engines were railed by the English, which in short time should haue been the destruction of the walls, if they of the towne had not the fower stopped the riuer of the same towne within, whereby the water gathered and raised without the towne betwixt the King and the Duke of Clarence, to the semblance of a little sea, which caused the Englishmen to withdraw their guns, and other engines, whereby at that time the walls were saved. When the king caused to be made under the water three great mines unto the walls of the towne, which in like manner had been the cause of their ruine, if the inhabitants had not countermined them, and letted their purpose. The inhabitants of the towne perceiving themselves thus straightly assailed, as well by land as by sea, conveyed all their ships within their haven, and bounde them together with chaines, and in the two towers that were made for the defence of the haven, they put certaine garrisons, and armed men, who oftentimes attempted to invade the kings naue, but at all times they were by his ships beaten, and constrained to recule still within their haven: at the last, the captaines and inhabitants considering that by such skirmishes (as well upon the land as upon the sea) they gained nothing, took this appointment with the king, that if they were not rescued by the Frenchmen within certaine dayes limited, they should then deliver into his hands the towne, with thirtie persons of the greatest and most noble within the towne, such as the king would desire, to be ordered at the kings pleasure; and all the residue, as well men of warre, as the inhabitants of the same towne, without armour, and leaving behinde them their goods, should freely goe where they would, for the suretie of which appointment to be kept, they delivered unto the king twelve of their greatest personages for pledges. The captaines and inhabitants of the towne seeing their day of appointment to approach, and themselves utterly desperate of any succours of their people, obtained to performe their covenant at their day prefixed, which was the xxii. of September, on which day came Sir Lionell Braquemount, gouernour of the towne, unto the king, and kneeling before him, said: Most victorious Prince, behold here the keyes of this towne, which after our promise I yelde unto you, with the towne, my selfe, and my companie. When were brought to the king the Lord Coreuile, the Lord Gangcourt, and other, to the number of thirtie, and all the residue, as well souldiers, as inhabitants, were suffered unarmed to depart. When the gates of the towne were opened, and that the king approached unto them, in purpose to enter the towne, he descended from his horse without the gate, and from thence, without horse or shoes in great devotion, he went immediately to the Church of Saint Martin, Metropolitane of that towne, and there he made his prayers, and praised God his creator, for his good fortune: then hee commanded to be brought before him, all those Lords and gentlemen that were yeldest to him for prisoners, whose names he caused to be put in writing, and upon their othes to yelde themselves prisoners at Calice upon Saint Martins day next following, and so they were delivered out of the towne of Harflew, at the which day according to their appointment, they came to Calice, where they were received as prisoners, and after ransomed at great finances. After the deliuey of this towne, the foresaid two towers that defended the haven, and resisted the kings power ten dayes space, at the end whereof, because they were in despaike of succour, yeldest them to the king, and all the souldiers and inhabitants both of the towne and towers were suffered to goe freely unarmed, whither they would. The king constituted Captaine of the towne Sir Thomas Beauford Earle of Dorset his uncle, to whom he also committed two thousand souldiers, chosen men of his host. Then considering that winter drew on, as also the losse of their men, by reason of the sir then raining amongst them, by which infirmities died Michael at Poole, Earle of Suffolke, the Bishop of Exeter, the Lord Beawmont, and others, and of the commons, to the number of two thousand and about. King Henry created the sonne of Michael at Poole, Earle of Suffolke, who lived not long after.

After king Henry had remained at Harflew 15. daies, after the deliuey of the towne, and of the towers, he departed from thence towards Calice, whereof, when his enemies were aduertised, and also by what way he intended to passe, all the people of the countrey, Cities, and Townes were marvellously oppressed with feare, wherefore they hastened them to defensible places, and other that were apt to warre, took them to their houses, and assembled them together in great number, with no small company of footemen, and in all that they might they oppressed the Englishmen.

The kings host kept an easie pace, without making any haste, and when they approached the towne of Ewe, their enemies assailed them in the fields with great force and noise, where on both parties it was foughten sore and vigorously: but the Frenchmen reculed to the towne, where they were in good surety. From thence the king departed, and came to a passage of the riuer of Some, which the Frenchmen call Blanchecheoke, or Blanchetache. This passage, at the coming unto it was fired with sharpe stakes by their enemies, so that they could not passe there, but were constrained to goe further, seeking their passage, untill they came directly to haue the Citie of Amiens and the Castell of Corby on their left side, where they of the said Citie beganne with them a newe fight: but they were sone forced by the English to returne to their Citie againe. The 19. of October the king passed the riuer of Some, at the passage of Wienna, and Bethew-court, and went then to lodge him at Pouche-legach, from whence, he advanced him towards the riuer of Piramont. In the meane time, the French king and the Duke of Guyen his sonne, then Dolphin, purposing to resist the Englishmen, came to Roane, from whence, they sent three heralds to the king of England, to giue vnderstanding that he should not escape without battail: unto whom the said king answered, All things be done at the pleasure of God, I will keepe the right way towards Calice: if our aduersaries doe attempt to disturbe vs in our Iourney, we thinke they shall not doe it without their owne great daunger and perill. From thence, king Henry came unto a village called Forceville, advancing his host towards the riuer of Piramont, and the next day they passed by the Cheue, and the king lodged that night at Bonpers-le-failon. The next day the king remained unto Bangy. The next day late in the night the king came to a village named Agencourt, Enguerant saith Agencelles, where they lodged. At distance from the French host not about two hundred and fiftie spaces.

Henry the fift.

The Frenchmen fired their banners and standerts with the banner royall, whereof the Constable had the Conduict, in the field by them deuised and chosen, which was in the countie of Saint Paule, in the ground of Agencourt, by which the day following, the Englishmen should passe to goe to Cales.

The xrb. of October, after prayers and supplications of the king, his priests and people done with great deuotion, the king of England in the morning very early set forth his host in array: He commaunded that his horses and other carriages should be left in the village where he had lodged. The order of his field was thus: The middle battell whereof the king was conduictor, was set in the midst of the field, directly against the middle battell of his aduersaries. On the right side was the first battell, and therewith the right wing: and on the left side the last battell, and the left wing. And these battells lying nigh together, by the prouidence of God, prouided vnto this king a defensible place for his host, for the village wherein he was lodged before, defended his host from all inuasions on the backe, and the felds wherein he was, was defended on both sides with two small riuers.

This Noble King was armed with sure and right beautifull armour: on his head a bright helmet, whereupon was set a Crowne of golde, repleate with pearle and precious stones, marvellous rich: In his shield he bare the armes both of England & Fraunce. And thus armed, he was mounted vpon a goodly great horse, and after him were ledde certaine noble horses, with their hildes and trappers of Goldsmithes worke, and vpon them also were beate the armes of England and of Fraunce. Thus this victorious king prepared to battaile, encouraged his people to the field that approached at hande.

The night before this cruell battell, by the aduise and counsell (as it is said) of the Duke of Borke, the king had giuen commaundement through his host, that euery man should puruey him a stake sharpe at both endes, which the Englishmen fired in the ground before them in the field, to defend them from the oppression of horsemen. The Frenchmen had such confidence in the great multitude of their people, and in their great horses, that many of their great Princes and Lords leauing behinde them their souldiers, standerts and other ensignes, came towards the Englishmen in right great haste, as if they had bene assured of victorie.

The King of England forthwith aduanced his banners and standerts towards the French host, and he in person with his battaile in the same order wherein he stode, followed, exhorting and encouraging euery man to battell, notwithstanding he went to inuade his enemies, yet kept his accustomed order, that is, that the first battell went before, the second battell followed, and the third came immediately after, he commaunded his priests to abide in prayers, and diuine supplications, and his heraults in their coates of armes to attend to their offices. When euery man fell prostrate to the ground, and committing themselves to God, euery of them toke in his mouth a little peece of earth, in remembrance that they were mortall, and made of earth, as also in remembrance of the holy communion. Thus all their carriages and baggages left behinde, onely charged with their barnels, weapons, and stakes, they marched toward their enemies, with great hute and noise. They sounded their trumpets, and stroke by their drummes, which greatly encouraged the hearts of euery man. Their enemies seeing them approach, aduanced themselves also, and met them in the felds, betwixt whom was begunne a marvellous fierce and cruell battell. The battell of the Englishmen was as long as the field wherein they fought, which was greatly to their aduantage, for by that their enemies were letted to come vpon them at the sides and backe of the host. The Frenchmen had ordered their battels with two sharpe fronts, like vnto two horses, which alwayes backward was broader and broader: these sharpe battels set vpon the English middlewarde, intending to haue runne through the whole felds, but the Frenchmen were slaine and wounded by the English Archers, and by the helpe of the stakes, which the Englishmen had fired before them in the ground, whereby the horsemen were constrained to returne, or else to runne vpon the stakes, where many of them were overthrowne and wounded, and many both horses and men slaine. The battell and fight increased maruellously, by the space of thre houres, in all which tyme no man was taken prisoner, but an innumerable number were slaine, vpon whose dead bodies they that followed were throwne and slaine.

Thus after a long and cruell battell, by the demerits of their great prayde, there approached no man of the French to battell, but to death, of whom after that an innumerable company were slaine, and that the victorie surely remayned to the Englishmen, they spared to slay, and toke prisoners of the French, both Princes and Gentlemen in great number. In this most tall battell, the Noble king of England neuer failed his men, for no danger of death, but fought with his enemies with an ardent heart, as a famished Lion for his pray, receiuing on his helmet and on the residue of his armour, many and great strokes.

In this field, as the puissant Prince Humfrey Duke of Gloucester the Kings brother, fought with great courage and force, he was sore wounded in the haumes with a sword, and overthrowne, in somuch, as he lay as balfe dead in the field, his head toward the Englishmen, and his feete towards his enemies: vpon whom the King hauing a brotherly compassion, bestrode him, and with most strong battell and labour, not without his owne great perill, like a brother he defended, and succoured his brother from the enemies, and made the Duke to be boyn out of the field amongst his owne men.

At the last, the victorie obtayned, and the great hoste of the Frenchmen overcome, slaine, wounded, taken and banquished, forthwith an other hoste of Frenchmen, no lesse than the first, supposing the Englishmen to be wearied by their long trauell and fight, disposed them to beginne againe the battell anew. When the Englishmen (which had many more prisoners prisoners than they were of themselves in number) saw this new field assembled to give them battell againe, fearing in this new field, lest they should fight both against their prisoners, and their other enemies, they put to death many of their said prisoners, both noble & rich men, among whom the Duke of Brabant, who at that field was taken prisoner, was one.

The prudent king of England seeing the resemble of his adversaries sent his heralds unto them, commanding them, either forthwith to come to battell, or else immediately to depart the field, and if they delayde to depart, or to come to battell, both those of their company already taken prisoners, and also all they that should thereafter be taken, without mercie or redemption should be put to death: which message when the Frenchmen heard, fearing the strength of the Englishmen, and also the death, both of themselves, and also of their friends before taken prisoners, with great heavinesse, and with shame, they forthwith departed. When the King of England being assured of the victory, gave the greatest land and praise to God that might be.

In this battell were slaine on the French party, the Noble Dukes of Anjou, of Berry, and Saure, and the Lord Hely, the Lord Laubet chiefe Constable of France, the Archbishop of Saunce, Eight Carles, an hundred and one Barons, fiftene hundred knights, and above tenne thousand of all estates, whereof scarce fiftene hundred were souldiers or labourers, the rest were of coate armour (saily Engueant:) but Thomas Elmham saith, Archbishops, one, Dukes, thre, Carles, fve, Barons, and such like, four score and twelue, Knights, fiftene hundred, of Esquires and Gentlemen, seven thousand, whereof he nameth the Archbishoppe of Saunce, the Dukes of Brabant, Anjou, and of Bawer, the Carles of Flanders, Dauphinart, Parisiens, Grantper, Saunus, and of Dansemontaise, the Lord of Biet, Constable of Fraunce.

In this battell were taken prisoners of the Frenchmen, the Dukes of Orleans, and of Bourbon, Anjou brother to the Duke of Brabant, the Carles of Anaboline, of Cleve, and Richmond, and sir Bomcicaul Parhall of Fraunce, and many other to the number of 1500. Knights and Esquires: And of the English partie were slayne Edward Duke of York, buried at Fordinghep, Michaell de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, buried at new Elme, and to the number of an hundred persons in the vanguard, and of all estates in the English partie were not found dead above fve hundred in the feld. When night approached, the King of England returned with his host into the village, wherein they had harboured the night before, where he found his horses, and other baggages and carriages that he left behinde him there before the feld, to be stolen and caried away by the Frenchmen: where amongst many other Jewels of great price, was stolen away a sword of great balne, adorned with gold and precious stones, which was after given to Philip Earle of Charlois, sonne and heire to Iohn Duke of Brabant.

the God for his so happy a victory, causing his Priests and Chaplaines to sing the Psalme, In Exitu israel de Agypto, and commanding every man to kneele downe on the ground at this verse, Non nobis Domine, non nobis, sed nominis tui de gloriam: which being done, he caused Te Deum with certaine Anthems to be sung, giving land and praise to God, not boasting of his owne force or any humane power. This night when the King late at his recreation in the forcast village, hee was served at his boorde, of those great Lions and Prisoners that were taken in the field. That night the King appointed god and sure watchs throughout his host, for feare of sodaine invasions, but the Frenchmen were utterly divided and gone without making or intending any new business, whereby the Englishmen were suffered in peace to take their rest.

On the next day the King with his people entred his journey toward Calice: and as they passed through the fields where they had fought the day before, they found all the dead bodies dispoyle, as well of their barnesse, as of their array, by the inhabitants of the countrey, notwithstanding the bodies that might be knowne for Englishmen of any reputation, the king caused to be entered according to their estates, and so continuing his journey the King came to the Castell of Swines, and from thence he went to his Towne of Calice, with all his host and his prisoners, where he was received of his liege men, with great ioy and due honour. After the kings host was somewhat refreshed with meat, drink and sleepe, the king conferred with his wise counsellors, if it were good now to returne into Fraunce, and to pursue his enterprise begun, or else to return with his host into England, there to refresh his people, among whom it was considered that the number of his people was right small, and many of them beried with the sir, many soze grievd of their wounds which they had received at the field. Moreover, that their long staying at Calice should cause scarcity of victualles there, whereas otherwise in their owne countrey, the people should at more ease refresh themselves, and also be better cured of their wounds: finally, considering the time had not been hitherto unfortunate, but that with honour they might returne with great gaine, which they had conquered, they doubted not, but by the ayde of God the King should right well obtaine his desire in time to come, for which causes they all concurred upon their returne into England.

When with all diligence the shipp was prepared, and by the kings commandement, the Lords and great estates of the prisoners of France unto a great number, were brought into that ship, wherein the King was determined to passe the Sea. At this their passage the Sea was marvellously boisterous and rough, insomuch as two of the English shippes were perished in the floods, by reason whereof the French prisoners were so incombered and beried, that the day of their passage seemed to the no lesse bitter & terrible, than that day wherein they were taken at Agencourt, nor they could not marvell enough, how the king should have so great strengthes, so easily to resist and endure the rage and boisterousness of the Sea, without accompanance and disease of his stomacke. When the King had passed the Sea, and was come to arrive and to take land at Dover, innumerable people of Religion, Bishops, and Noblemen, and of the commons came running to meete the King in every way: and when he was arrived on the xxiii. day of November, he abode at Dover by certaine daies, to refresh and rest his Lords, and his prisoners, after his troublesome passage, and from thence he took his journey towards the Citie of London, where the Maior of London, with the Aldermen and craftes to the number of foure hundred riding in red, with haires red and white, met with the King on the Black heath coming from Eltham, and so brought him through London to Westminster, with all his prisoners of France.

The gates and streets of the Citie were garnished and apparelled with precious clothes of Arras, containing the victories, triumphes and princely Actes of the Kings of England his progenitors, which was done to the ende that the King might understand, what remembrance his people would to their posterity of these his great victories and triumphes. The Conduits through the Citie ranne none other but good sweete wines, and that abundantly. There were also made in the streets many Towers and stages, adorned richly, and upon the height of them sate small children, apparelled in semblance of Angels, with sweete tuned voices singing psalmes and laudes unto God: for the victorious King would not suffer any ditties to be made and sung of his victorie, for that he would wholly haue the praise given to God: neyther would he suffer to be carried before him, nor shew ed unto the people his helmet, whereupon his Crowne of golde was broke, and depose in the fieldes by the violence of the enemy, and great strokes that he had received, nor his other armour that in that cruell battaile was so sore broken, but as the faithfull constant champion of God, he eschewed all occasions of vaine glorie, and refused the vaine praises of the people. On the next morrow, the Maior, Aldermen and 200. of the commons presented the King with a 1000. l. in two balcons of gold, worth 500. pounds.

The first day of December, by the Kings commaundement, a great number of the bishops and Abbots of the realme, were assembled at London, there to celebrate and keepe the requies for Edward late Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Salisburie, and of other both English and French, which died in partes beyond the sea: unto these solemnities came from Barflewe, the Captaine of the same Towne, the Kings uncle Earle of Dorset, who a little before had made a roade into the borders of the countrey next adioyning, and had put them to flight, and taken prisoners 800.

In the feast of the Purification, seven dolphins of the sea came by the riuer of Thamis, and plaid there whiles foure of them were kille.

In a Parliament begun the 15. of March at Westminster, the halfeprice of Tanna (commonly called Salep halfeprice) were for bid to be used as lawfull payment among the English people.

The first of May, Sigismonde the Emperour landed at Dover, and the twentieth of May, the Maior, Aldermen, and craftes of London receiued him at Blacke-heath, and the King with his Lords met him at St. Thomas Waterings, and so brought him through London to Westminster. The Emperour returned out of England the xvi. of August, after he had laboured, but could make no peace betwene England and France.

John Benet wolman, who had in London scattered seedes full of sedition, was drawne, hanged, and beheaded on Michaelmas day. The viii. day of October, was a parchment maker of Trilwell streets, drawne, hanged, and beheaded, for that he had harboured sir John Old-castell.

King Henry of England, immediately after his returne from Caleis, sent his legats to Constance, where was kept y general counsell, as ye haue heard, which with all other legats, the Emperour being there present, laboured for the vnitie and peace of their mother the Church, and to reform the schisme that had long continued of the Popes, which counsell took effect in this manner. Their first depose all the Popes, by whom the schisme was continued, & they with the Cardinals elected unto the papacy, the Cardinal of Columpne, borne in Rome, and was named Martin the first, whose armes were a pillar of silver crowned with golde, in a field gules. At this counsell, by the assent of all nations there present, it was authorized, and ordained that England should obtaine the name of a nation, and should be said one of the five nations, that owe their deuotion to the Church of Rome, which thing untill that time, men of other nations, for enuy had delayed and letted.

In the Parliament at London, Thomas Bewfort Earle of Dorset was made Duke of Excester, and had 1000. l. the yere given him.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Kenelworth, at which time there was treason wrought against him, by a certaine Esquire of the complices of sir John Old-castell.

The morrow after Christmas day, certaine seditious persons spread abroad poisoned bile, rapping against all estates of the Church, almost in every great house, and hospital of the Townes of Saint Albons, Southampton, Reading, &c. but no man would be knowne to be the author of them: also one by his counterfeited name, called frier Tucke, with many other malefactors, committed many robberies in the countries of Surrey, and Suffre, whereupon the King sent out his writs for their apprehension.

On Easter day in the after-noon, at a Sermon in Saint Dunstons in the East of London, a great trap happened in the Church, where through many people were sore wounded, and one Thomas Petwarden fishmonger, layne out of hande, wherefore the Church was suspended, and the beginners of the trap (which was the Lord Strange, and sir John Tufsell knight, though the quarrell of their two wives) were brought to the Countee in the Waltrie: the Archbishoppe of Canterbury caused them to be recommunicate, as well at Pauls Crosse, as in all other parish Churches of the Citie. the Lord Strange and his wife, who upon the first of May following, in Pauls Church before the Archbishop, the Bishop of London, and other, submitted themselves to penance, which was intimated them, that immediately all their servants should in their shirts go before the Parson of Saint Dunstons, from Pauls, to Saint Dunstons Church, and the Lord bare heade, with his Ladie bare footed, Reignold Kenwood Archdeacon of London following them, and at the hallo wing of the Church, the Ladie should fill all the vessels with water, and also offer an ornament of tenne pound, and the Lord Strange should offer a Pire of five pound.

Carle Dowglas of Scotland came into England, and promised amitte to the king, the which he assured by oath and writing sealed, yet notwithstanding he after turned to the French, at the battail of Crecy in Perch fought by the Duke of Bedford as shall be shewed.

Titus Livius.

King Henry prepared his Paule, ordnance, and victuall for his people, and generally all other things necessary for the warres, he assembled together England such men as wel Dukes, Carles, Lords, knights and Gentlemen, and commons as he knew were good both for warre and peace: which being done, upon Saint Markes day the Evangelist, he took his journey towardes Hampton, in purpose, when the winde and sea were favourable, to goe into France: he rode through London, till he came at Pauls, where he alighted and made his offering, and in like manner he offered at Saint Georges in Southwarke, and in all his way he gave the farewell to every man, praying them all to pray to God for him.

In this meane time the Frenchmen made covenant with the Citizens of Ceane (a Citie in Italy) whereby the Italians were bound, at a certaine price for every Caricke limited for the French mens money, to prepare and furnish with armed men, as many of their greatest Carickes as the French should desire, and so prepared they should send them to the ayde of the French men, against the Englishmen, many of these Carickes so prepared, were of marvellous greatnes, yea greater then ever were seene in those parts before that time, they sailed into the mouth of the Seine, where they strongly assailed Herefaste by water, whereof when the king of England was advertised, he desired to goe unto them in his own person to remove them from this siege, but from that purpose he was letted, by the advice of his counsaile, wherefore he gave that journey to the right puissant lohn, Earle of Huntingdon, who entered the Paule, departed from the land, and had such favourable winde, that in short time he was brought unto the enemies, who assailed each other by great bigon and strength. Their ships were grappled and fought together, the more part of a summers day, but at the length the Italians oppressed by the strength of the Englishmen, were bitterly discomfited and overcome, their greatest Caricks, and also the greater part of their men were taken, the residue of the Genowaises seeing their fellows slain or taken, were stricken with feare, & their chaines or cables broken, or beewed alunder, they departed their Caricks from the English ships, and escaped by helpe of the winde and streame. This victory obtained, the noble Earle returned to Hampton, whereof when the king was advertised, he gave laud and praising for this victory unto God: and for the same he intaunted the Earle his nephew, with honour, and also with rewardes, he had fought with nine caricks and taken foure of them, with their patrons, and the Admiral of them all, that was called the Ballard of Warbon, with all the treasure that they all should have bene waged with for a quarter of a pere.

The xxviii. day of July the puissant king Henry (his Paule of 500. ships being prepared) assembled his armie to passe the seas, of his own company and pursuivance 16400. armed men, and besides that number came to him to Dover, 1020s and Gentlemen with their retinues, and the day and place for the same prefixed: first the Duke of Clarence with 240. speares, and 300. archers in his retinue: and the Duke of Gloucester with 100. speares, and 300. archers, and five Carles with 470. speares, and 1410. archers, to wit, the Earle of March 100. speares and 300. archers, the Earle of Warwick 100. speares 300. archers, the Earle of Huntington 40. speares, and 120. archers, the Earle of Suffolke 30. speares, and 90. archers, and the Earle of Salisburie 100. speares, and 300. archers, and after these Carles followed 13. estates of the Realme, with 506. speares, and 1570. archers, that is to say, the Lord Burghaun, the Lord Marquers, the Lord Fitz Hugh, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Grey, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Talbot, the Lord E. Courtney, the Lord Boucher, the Lord Rolle, the Lord Louel, the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, the Lord Harrington.

After came 87. knights, and their retinue, 940. speares, and 2852. archers. Of carpenters and other artificers the king had with him in wages to the number of 1000. and so the kings whole hoste belike labourers & artificers, amounted to the number of 25527. fighting men, of whom every fourth man was a horseman. Those things thus ordered, and the Paup for their connepance ready apparelled, the king entered his Shippe, which was royally and sumptuously adorned: the sayle thereof was of purple silke, right beautifully embordered, both with the armes of England & of France, and this ship they called the Kings chamber. He had also another the second a caricke of like apparell, which by the Kings commaundement they called the Kings hall, and these two he ordered to be the principall of all the Paup. Before he departed the Realme, he constituted lohn Duke of Bedford his brother, to be protector of his Realme of England in his absence.

On the first day of August the whole fleet arrived in Normandie, not farre from the Castell of Torque, where the king dubbed 48. knights, such as were worthe of that order. Now, when all the ships were discharged as their carriages, the king sent them againe into England, except such ships as were deputed for the carriage of guns and other engins and habilliments of warre.

This being done, the king sent men of armes on horsebacke to espye the situation and strength of the Castell of Bundeau, and other nigh unto those parts, which Gentlemen, with many prisoners returned, and great prayes of beastes. Their enemies stricken with feare, every man conveyed their goods and beastes into the Cities, Townes and Castels, not knowing which the king would first besiege: they strengthened their Townes and walles with stones, guns and other things necessary for their defence. The king took his enterprise to assaige the Towne of Tongue, whose Castell was marvellously defensible, the assaige wherof was given to the Duke of Gloucester, chiefe tennant of the kings auant guard, who constrained the frenchmen so sore, what with assaults, with guns and other engines, that within short time, to wit, the fourth day of the siege, and the ninth day of August, they promised to yeeld the Castell to the Duke, if the same were not shortly rescued by the french: but when they heard no word of succour, they yeilded the Castell to the king, and he made sir John Kikeley Captaine there.

Also the Earle of Salisbury conductor of the kings second battell whiles the Duke of Gloucester assailed the Castell of Tongue, wanne the Castell of Amblesbury, and put out the frenchmen thereof, which Castell so taken, with all that belonged thereunto, the king gaue to the same Earle. And thus this Noble Earle was the first that had any land giuen vnto him of the kings liberality in this conquest.

The Earle Marshall was sent to the Castell of Louers, which in short time he subdued, and after it was giuen to him by the king.

King Henry
besieged Cane

The eighteenth day of August, the king placed himselfe with his army before the Citie of Cane, on the south side nere vnto the Monastery of Saint Stephen, and the Duke of Clarence the kings brother was sent before with one thousand horsemen to keepe the suburbs of the Towne, that the towne men should not burne them, the Duke thus lodged on the north side, by the Monastery of Run of the holy Trinitie: the Earle Marshall lay on the left hand of the king, and the Lord Maltravers hard by him, and by him were placed the Lords Talbot and Vnheulle: and next to them the Lords Neuill and Willoughby. On the right hand of the king lay the Earle of Warwick: and the Lord John Grey, and by them the Carles of Huntingdon & of Salisbury, and the Lord Gren-Cornewall.

The kings army thus placed and set in order: the Abbe of Saint Stephen being manitied with frenchmen, when they sawe themselves to weake to resist the kings force, they took and carried away both vittualles and treasures of the house, and brought them into the Towne next adjoining, and deuised how they might set the Abbey on fire: but a certaine sponke of the place boldly put himselfe in leopordy in the dead season of the night, to creep on handes and fete, till he came to the Duke of Clarence, whom he found lying in compleate harness, in a garden vpon the grasse, with his head vpon a stone, whom he besought to preuent the ruine of his place, which he should be destroyed. For, said he, it doth specially pertaine to you to preferue our Monastery, which are defended of the king which founded our place, builded it, and indued it with possessions, wherefore take mine aduise and I will bring you into the place, and the Duke following the sponkes counsell, took scaling ladders, and came to the doore of the Abbey, which the sponke knewe was not manitied. The Duke hauing by this meanes gotten the place, brought the king into it.

Not

Not farre distant from this place was an other Monastery of women, right strong and defensible, which also that worthy Duke had receiued vnder his tuition.

The fourth day of September, at the breake of the day, the king caused all his trumpets to be sounded, and forthwith the ladders were rayled to the walles of the Towne, they fell to scaling them with great diligence, but many of them were cast backward into the ditch, and their ladders with them: the french cast great stones vpon the Englishmen, they poured on their heades scerching water, molten lead, boiling pitch, and oyle, all which would not make the Englishmen forsake the assault, amongst whom Edmond Springes lately made knight, in his armour went vpon the walles of Cane, and fought very sore, both giuing and receiuing many woundes, and yet at length was overcome and died. Notwithstanding the kings men ceased not to assault and set vpon the enemies so fiercely, on that one side, that they that were on the other side the Towne to keepe and to defend the same, were forced to leaue their standing, and to come to that side that the king assaulted. And thus when that side of the Towne was bove of defence, the Duke of Clarence, in the place which was thought most safe, scaled the wals and came vpon the backs of the frenchmen, which so suddenly assaunted them, that they knew not whether it were better to go on for ward against the king, or to turne backe to withstand the Duke.

Thus great destruction and slaughter was made of the frenchmen, for the king meeting them in their for ward, and the Duke of Clarence coming on the reuerward, took all hope of safegard from them, and thus the king got the Towne, and entred the same by the gates, that the Duke had opened for him. After which entrie of the king, he went to with great deuotion the principall Church of the Towne being of Saint Peter, there to giue landings and praises to the Almighty God, for the obtaining of this so great a victory. All they that intended to prayes were marvellously enriched, for the inhabitants of that Towne were men of great substance: but there was no man so hardy that durst presume to robbe any Church, for feare of the kings iustice, which was extreme in that case, no women in the Towne were rauished by the Englishmen, but shortly after the king commaunded all women and children to be auoyded out of the towne, and so the towne was inhabited of new possessors. The king made sir Gilbert Vnheulle Earle of Hereford, captain there, and sir Gilbert Talbot, and sir John Popham bayliffes. Peruerteblesse the Castell of Cane was not yet gotten, they held it th. & weekes after the taking of the towne. After the taking of this towne of Cane, the siege yet enduring before the Castell, the puissant Prince the Duke of Gloucester, with his battell before Bapour, they of the Towne and Castell yeilded vnto him.

The 11. day of September the Castell of Cane was deliuered by to King Henry: and in short time the Englishmen had taken the Citie of Licur, and the Castell of Hemy: and not long after, all the fortifications, were it towne, Castell or Citie within a great circulte about them, were taken and reduced to the kings obedience.

The Scots
besieging Berkeley, & Berkeley, and Berkeley.

Times Livell.

While these things were in doing in Normandie, the favourers of sir John Old-castell beganne to raged in England, who with great pfecters and promise of money, stirred by the Scots to invade the Realme in the kings absence, affirming that the same would be easily wonne, and it was said that sir John Old-castell talked with William Douglas the Scot at Pontfract, promising him a great summe of money, to perswade the people to come with him, and to bring with them, him, who was falsely called king Richard, and to set him out as king. Also indentures, and other writings were found, made betwixt sir John Old-castell, & the Duke of Albany, in the which the Scots were invited to besiege Warborough and Berkeley: whereupon the Duke of Albany besieged Berkeley by water and land on each side: and the Earle Douglas did also besiege Warborough, tarrying there xv. daies, undermining to overthrow the walles, but it happened at the same time Thomas Beauford Duke of Excester, came to Bridlington upon devotion to that place, who straight waies, so soon as he heard tidings thereof, went into these parts, gathering by the way as he went men of armes and archers. On the other side John Duke of Bedford protecced of the Realme, and other Nobles, to wit Ralph Earle of Westmerland, and Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, with 60000. warriors, the Archbishop of York Henry Bevet, which for great age might not incite to ride upon an horse, caused himselfe to be brought to the English host in his chaire, there to comfort & in courage the hearts of the people, that they should more ardently defend their countrey, his Charge being there with him, & other, remoned those sieges: for the Scots in the night leaving their tents, ladders & other engins, with shame returned into Scotland.

When these things were in good suretie toward the North, the Duke of Excester with a chosen company of men of warre, took his ships, and sailed into Normandy, where he landed, & took his journey toward Roane to the king, in the which journey, he wanne the Citie of Chobrien.

King Henry having deputed in all his towns and fortresses, Captaines and governors, into whose hands all the Frenchmen that should recurrence into the kings obedience, should give their othes of true allegiance. The first of October he departed from Cane with his people, leaving behinde him a sufficient garrison, and took his journey to the Castell of Courley, which on the third day after was yielded unto him. The first of October he went to besiege Argentine, which Towne was very defensible and strong, with a Castell of great strength, but the inhabitants of this Towne answered the kings demands, that if they were not succoured by the Frenchmen by a certaine day limited, they would deliver both the Towne and Castell unto the king without condition, to depart with their goods: and when the time limited was come, the Towne and Castell were delivered. After this, daily resorted to the king much people of Normandy, to do fealty unto him, and to live under his Emperre. The Citie of Sees which was right well peopled, and wherein were two Abbies marvellous strong and defensible, yielded unto the king: like wise many other Townes in that prouince yielded them unto the king, without assault or battell. These things thus done, the king took his voyage to ward Alancon, to receive into his dominion the Towne of Senlue, in which journey he sent a great part of his host to two strong Abbies, whereof the one was called Somolins, and the other Elsey, which if they had made resistance, he commanded to be taken by force, but they submitted themselves to the kings authority. The king came to Alancon on the 15. of October, where he first caused his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloucester to pitch his tents before the Castell, and the rest of the Towne himselfe assieged. This Towne and Castell was like wise yielded to the king in manner as the rest. The English men after this took the Towne of Bolone, and the Towne and Castell of Freswey: and shortly to recount, all the countrey by a great circuit, Cities, Townes and Castles were brought under the kings subjection. In this time, the Duke of Britaine accompanied with many great estates of his countrey came to king Henry, with whom he accorded a peace from the 17. day of October, untill the last day of September, in the yere following. The Dolphin of France also desired to treat with the king of England for peace, to whose Ambassadors the king appointed the Towne of Longue, whereunto they might safely resort for the same treaty, but there was no good done.

The king being assieged at Chalceps, which the French, to their power resisted right manfully, and made with them many battalles, and skirmishes: but in the ende the inhabitants, seeing the Englishmen more covetous of honour, then wear of paine, they countenanced with the king, that if by the second day of Januarie they were not delivered from the siege, they should freely deliver unto the king their Towne. In this meane time was taken in England sir John Old-castell, in the territory of the Lord Powelle, not without danger and hurt of some that took him: neither could he himselfe be taken before he was wounded. At the which time all the states of the Realme were called to a Parliament at London, therein to provide the king of a subsodie and aide of money, who took great paines beyond the seas. These Lords & other when they heard tell that the publicke enemy was taken, they agreed all, not to dissolve the Parliament untill he were examined, and heard to answer in the same: wherefore the Lord of Powes was sent to fetch him up with power, who brought him to London in a litter, wounded, and also a Clerk with him that was of counsell in all his secrets. As soon as the said sir John Old-castell was brought into the Parliament before the Duke of Bedford, regent and governor of the Realme, and the other estates, his indictment was read before him, of his forcible insurrection against the king in Saint Giles hie, and other treasons by him committed, the question was asked how he would excuse himselfe, and shew why he should not be deemed to die: but he seeking other talke beganne to preach of the mercies of God, and that all mortal men that would be followers of God, ought to preferre mercy above indgement, and that vengeance pertained only to the Lord, and ought not to be practised by them that worship God, but to be left to God alone: with many other wordes to detract the time, untill the chiefe Justice admonished the Regent not to suffer him to spend the time so vainely, in molesting of the Nobles of the Realme: whereupon the Earle of Bedford regent commanded him to answer formally unto the matter laid to his charge. He said sir Iohn being thus urged, at the last after deliberation taken, he said, it is the least thing that I account of, to be iudged by you, as of mans iudgement: and againe, he began to talke, but nothing to the purpose, untill the chiefe iustice commanded him againe to answer finally, and to iuryne them if he could, why he should not suffer death. To the which he stoutly answered, that he had no iudge amongst them, so long as his liege Lord King Richard was alive, and in the Realme of Scotland, which answer when he had made, because there needed no further witness, he was commanded to be drawn and hanged upon a gallows, and to be burned hanging upon the same, which iudgement was executed upon him on the xiii. day of December in Saint Giles field. Where when many honourable persons were present, the last words that he spake, was to sir Thomas of Erpingham, aduring him, that if he saw him rise from death to life againe, the third day, he would procure that his feet might be in peace and quiet: he was hanged by the necke in a chaine of iron, and after consumed with fire.

King Henry kept his feast of the Nativite of Christ at Bataur in Normandie, where when the day limited was come, they of Phalots, with gates open delivered the Towne to the King, and shortly after the Castell was yielded to him also.

The Duke of Clarence with his armed power conquered in this time the Townes and Castles of Harcourt, Fagon, Eivil, Cambysle, Courtton, and divers other, and also the strong Abbey of Whilrom, all which places, the mighty Duke, with assages, assaults, oppressions, and faire promises, especially observed, in short time he subdued, to the kings Empryce.

An. reg. 6.

The Duke of Gloucester was sent to the Ile of Constantine, in the first entrie of which iourney, he obtained the strong Castell of Caudey, from whence he went to the Towne and Castell of Aire, the inhabitants whereof yielded them with all their goods, to live under the kings obedience: the Castell of Roiney yielded to the Duke: the Town of Lew, the Castell of Saint Sauour le Secout, Claisiges, Berckcourt, and also: all these submitted them to the Duke for the king.

King Henry during this time sent of his owne company the Earle of Huntington to forsey certain defendible places, which in short time he manfully reduced under the kings obedience. The king sent also the Earle of Warwicke with another company of men of warre, to assiege the Castell of Montfront, which Castell unto him was delivered on the 22. day of June.

When the Duke of Gloucester (after he had bene with the king) had repaired his iourney towards Harbrough, the Captaine of the same having knowledge of his purpose, and other Noble men that were deputed by the Frenchmen, for the defence of that place, assembled out of all partes the strongest men of warre, in marvellous great number, for the resistance of the Englishmen, and for the defence of the Towne: the Duke approached night unto the Towne, whereunto he laid his siege, but not in all places, for the inhabitantes had broken the bridge without the Towne, whereby the Englishmen

Englishmen were deprieved of their passage ouer.

Now to returne to the king, who had persecuted the whole Lent, and also the solemnities of Easter in prayers, fastings, vigils, almesdeeds, and other works of mercy, within the Towne of Bataur: from whence after Easter he went to Cane, where he solemnly kept the feast of Saint George, at the which feast he made 15. knights of the Bath, five of them were, sir Lewes Roblar, sir Roger Saluine, sir Iohn Stewart, sir Iohn Shorebrooke, and sir Iohn Mountgomery, whom he sent to besiege divers places thereabouts. This being done, he delivered to go to Roane, the chiefe and principall City of Normandy, notwithstanding that his company was greatly diminished by the absence of the Duke of Gloucester, that then lay at Harbrough, as is afore shewed, and of the Earle of Warwicke that then besieged the Castell of Montfront. After he left the king departed from Cane the ninth of June, & took his voyage with all his people towards the Citie of Roane: in which iourney, because it was not farre out of his way, he first laid siege to the Towne of Louars, and compelled them within to yield to him upon conditions, on the eleven of Saint Iohn Baptiste.

King Henry
uars.

When the king on the 22. of June, removed his army towards Montlarche, where he laid his siege on the one side of the Towne, by the middle whereof, the river of Seine bath his course, but could haue no passage over the river to lay siege on the other side, for the bridge which was without the Towne was defended with a strong Tower, and a garrison: but king Henry commanded to make boates of wickers, and those to be closed in beastes skins, by which boates, on the first of July, the Duke of Clarence with his company passed over secretly in great number, and then besieged the other side of the Towne: but because the river of Seine divided his host, whereby if either part should haue neede of other, they could not come together for the river, the king caused to be made so many small square boates of the wicker afore said, that being tyed together, and cast into the river, he made of them a bridge. When the inhabitants and garrisons perceived them thus enuironed in all parts, they agreed with the King, that if within 15. daies they were not deliuered from this siege, they should deliuer to the King the Towne and Castell, and when the day was come, they performed promise: and this was the first bridge over the river of Seine that the King subdued to his power.

Montlarche.

After the King had thus obtained that bridge over the river of Seine, and that there was none other river or flood might let his iourney, with all the haste he might, he entred his iourney towards Roane. The Citizens hearing the approach of their enemies, and fearing least they should be lodged in the suburbs, which were much larger than the Citie was within the walls, and was also much replenished with Monasteries, Churches, and Towers, burned the same, and made all even with the ground. So this City on the thirtieth day of July this victorious King approached, against whom came the Citizens with their garrisons and men of warre, where the more part of all that day they continued in battell, and fought soze on both partes, but the Frenchmen were forced to seek their succour within the walls of the Citie, whom in their recolle the King pursued still before the Citie, where he ordered his siege in this manner. First, the King with a poble company of young and hardie men lodged himselfe before the gate of Saint Hilarie. The Duke of Clarence with his power was lodged before the gate of Caubr. The Duke of Excester, after he was come to the King, was lodged with his people before the gate of the Castell, called Beauruice. Earle Marshall was lodged before the gate called Markeuile. The Earle of Warwick, after he was come from the Castell of Donfrount, was lodged upon the hill, where the strong Monastery of Saint Katherin was. The Earles of Salisbury and Huntington, were lodged there upon the other side of the riuer of Sène: upon whom their enemies made many assaults: and because the riuer of Sène diuided the English host in two parts, the King caused to be made a strong bydige of timber ouer the same riuer, that when neede should require, they might haue free passage on foote and horse: and because their enemies should not approach vnto it, with their ships or galleies, the king caused to be made a great chaine to be dyatone ouer the riuer, betwixt the Citie and the bydige. At that time the king of Portugale cousin to the king of England, sent a paulte of ships well manned vnto the kings aide, whom the king commanded to lie betwixt the Citie and the Sea, to enclose the Citie from all succours by water. The Towne of Caubekerke fearing the danger of the time, couenanted with the king of England, that when the Citie of Roane were taken and deliuered into the kings obaysance, they in like manner would yelde them to him, without any assault, and vnder the same appointment accorded with the king, foure tene other defensible Townes and Castles that were nigh bordersers vnto Roane. After many cruell battels and assaults, the Citizens fearing at length to be famished, dayly put out of the Citie a great number of poore people and other, but the hunger encreasing, they were forced to eat their horses, dogs, cats, rats, and mice: and when such and other like things were consumed and eaten, then the plague of famine entred the Citie, so that the people for default of reliefe died, that the lining might scarcely burie the dead, whereby that poble Citie was brought into so much misery, that it is not lesse maruel than pitifull to heare.

In this meane time during this siege of Roane, the Duke of Excester besieged the Citie of Enereoy: also about the twentieth of August king Henry had thre maruellous victories in Poymandy. The first was that 100. Englishmen took thre great Lordes at a place called Balbaife, & put to flight 380. persons besides. The second was, 400. of his enemies entred within the suburbs of the Towne of Chyolens, and 11. Englishmen chased them away and took foure of them, and slue 12. and took 40. of their horses. The third was, the enemies would indeed haue taken the Towne which was called Leuers, but the Captaine of the same with an hundred of our men went out against 1000. of them, and ouercame them, and took 180. Gentlemen of the enemies. About this time also Captaine de la Bouche took the town of Pontois by Paris.

When the Citizens of Roane, perceived themselves maruellously afflicted by famine, (as is before shewed) and also to be in dispaire of succor, from the Frenchmen, now after halfe a yeres siege and more, vpon certaine conditions, they deliuered to the King of England their Citie, Castle, towne, abbayes, Churches, houses, citizens, captaines, garrisons, and generallie all things that were within the Citie, whatsoever they were. The xix. day of Januarie, there had died within this Citie (as was said) for default of victuals during this siege mo than xxx. thousand people. This noble King rather to relieue this oppressed Citie, ordeined the same to be the chiefe chamber of all Poymandie, and ordeined his exchequer, his treasure, and his coynage to be kept in the same: he also edified a strong towne behind the Castle. Whildest the King ordered his businesse at Roane, hee sent diuers Lordes with strong puissance of people, to receive the Castles of townes bordering vpon Roane, amongst whom the Duke of Clarence, in short time reduced to the King, the mightie Castle of Galiard, the town of Vernon, the town of Saunt, the Castle of Sandmount, and many other strong places and holds.

The Earle of Salisbury, with the garrison to him assigned took the town of Hounslow, the town of Spounseur de Millers, the town of Cwe, the town of Gurney, the new Castle, & generally all the places in that part.

This yere Quene Ioane mother to the Duke of Britayne, and the Kings stepmother being defamed of some wicked practise, by witchcraft, or sorcerie, that she had deuiled the Kings death, by the counsell of John Randolph Doctor of Diuinitie, of the order of the friars minors, then of the couen of Wyborsbury, hir confessor, forsaketh all hir lands and goods by Parliament, and hauing all her seruants put from hir, was committed to the custodie of John Pellam, and by him sent to the Castle of Leeds in Kent, hee appointed nine seruants to attend hir, and to bring her into the Castle of Wemsey, there to be gouerned vnder his prouidence. Friar Randolph, being apprehended in the Isle of Jersey, was conueyed to Chirbrughe and there imprisoned, and from thence was sent to the towne of London, where at length, to wit, in the yere of Christ 1429. on the first of June, he was slaine by the parson of Saint Peters Church in the tower, falling out at wordes with him, and after Quene Ioane was deliuered of hir imprisonment.

King Henry sent his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, accompanied with the Earle Marshall, and a great power of armed men, to lay siege before the town and Castle of Luoric, which town, after many assaults and battels, the Duke took by force: but the Castle thereof was not yelded, till the 13. of May. The King also sent the Earle of Huntington with a power from Saunt, to the town of Pontois, by which, if it were taken, he might haue the more sure and easie passage to Paris. Those which were sent, at the entrie of the night were come nigh vnto Pontois, where, in a wood they left their horses, and that done, in the darkness of the night, they went on foote to the ditch of the town, which then were drye, where part of them lay on the banks bankes of the ditches, with their ladders in their hands ready to scale the wals when time would serue, and the residue hid them in the vines where they might be ready to enter the towne at the opening of the gates. At the breake of the day, they of the towne changed their watch, at the which change, the walles were left without watches for the time. But the Englishmen seeing time to accomplish their intent, raised their ladders, and scaled the wals, and by that meanes, entered the towne: where, some of them forthwith brake the gate, and made entrie for the rest of their company, which, when the garrisons of the towne perceived, as men amazed, they turned themselves to flight. But not long after, they armed them, and assailed their enemies, but to the Englishmens great auaille, the Earle of Huntington with his company set spurs to their hories, and hastened them to the succour of their first company, whereby the Frenchmen as all discouraged and in despaire to saue the towne, at the sight of these new rescues that came to the Englishmen, leauing behinde them all their riches and substance endeouored themselves to escape by flight, and so the towne of Pontois, auoided of al frenchmen, was left free to the English. After these enterprises thus atchieued, the King with all his companie came to the towne of Pontois, where he abode a certaine time, from whence he sent the Duke of Clarence with a chosen powder of men to Paris, to view the situation and strength thereof, before which Citie, when he had tarried certaine dayes and had seene all that him liked, and that none of the Frenchmen would issue out of the Citie to fight with him, he returned to the King, and ascertained him of all that he had seene.

yielded.

On the viii. of August, King Henry with all his host departed from Pontois. And because the Castle of Wokimillers had done certaine inhumane cruelties to the Kings lanos that bordered thereabout, to the intent to repress their malice, the King lodged himselfe not far from thence, and sent certaine to assault the same Castle, where both the inhabitants and garrisons feared so much the King, that as men desperate of all succours, they yielded both Castle and goods. And then all the townes, Castles, and holdes within a great circuit, without abiding battaile, yielded them to the King: but that strong and mighty towne of Gysois, whereof the Castle is much more defensible than the towne, would not submit to the King, wherefore on the last day of August the King with all his host took his journey thither, and enclosed the towne with his pavilions and tents. Betwixt him and them of the towne, were many sharpe battalles and cruell assaults, but at all times the Englishmen put the Frenchmen to flight, wherefore the inhabitants and garrisons of the towne and Castle deliuered the same to the King in the xxiii. day of September.

Enguerant.

In this meane time the Dolphin assembled a host of 20000. men at Ponfrea and Faulcien, in purpose to fight with the Englishmen, and for the same by his letters he sent to Tropes in Champeigne for the Duke of Burgoyne, desiring him to haue his company in his lozney. At whose request the same Duke incontinent vpon sight of his letters, and vpon the shew of the Dolphins ors, safely to goe and come, came vnto him to the place aforesaid, where notwithstanding his former oath, against both Gods law and mans law,
